Nazis, who had operated in the open for many years. How successful are American democrats today in eradicating racial discrimination, the anti-labor lobby, the sinister might of the cartels, the influence of certain elements of the Catholic church in politics, and other factors which are a threat to American democracy? Those who blame the failure of German democracy on some frailty or special quirk of German nature are, in effect, saying, "It can't happen here," although it has happened in many "heres."

The collapse of the Weimar Republic was part of a world process which transcends race, love of uniforms, and love of discipline and regimentation. National characteristics do count, and they presumably accelerated Germany's descent into the totalitarian abyss. But the German reactionaries had to wait for their real opportunity until the world economic depression hit Germany in 1930. Fear of inflation, physical distress, six million unemployed, and the drying up of foreign credits reduced the political weight of the left and enabled the enemies of democracy to offer Hitler as a super-nationalist messiah.

The German problem is part of the world problem and can only be solved as part of the world problem. This world is at war because it was sick, and not because Germany alone was sick. Fascism is a universal disease which halts before no barriers of race or geography. It has attacked Germany, Italy, Japan, Spain, Portugal, Poland, Greece, several Latin American states, and numerous Americans who vote in democratic elections. Fascism has taken particularly brutal forms in Germany. But dictatorship everywhere is brutal.

Before this war all major dictatorships engaged in aggression. Only dictatorships engaged in aggression. No democracy engaged in aggression. The road to peace is through universal democracy. Democracy, however, must be fortified by the elimination of the factors that have caused it to crumble under the assaults of totalitarianism. This poses a problem which includes but is much larger than the German problem. Germany cannot solve its economic, social, and political problems without reference to the outside world. No nation can.

This is the answer to those who cry, Ruin Germany. Robert Menzies, the former Prime Minister of Australia, says, "We cannot have a prosperous world if Germany is in a state of disorder and poverty or if Japan is excluded from international economic and political relations" (PM, February 3, 1944). Foreign Secretary Eden said on July 29, 1941, "A starving and bankrupt Germany in the midst of Europe would poison all of us who are her neighbors. That is not sentiment. That is common sense." In other words, what we do to others we likewise do to ourselves.

The advocates of a "Germany Must Be Destroyed" policy recall that after the punitive Carthaginian peace the world had no trouble from Carthage. No, but plenty of trouble from Rome. In other words, what kind of Europe, what kind of world will the peace terms produce?

Within six years of the Kaiser's complete surrender, Russia was helping Germany to rearm, America was putting Germany back on its economic feet, and Britain was shielding Germany against Fronch vengeance. They did so, not because they loved Germany more, but because the Versailles settlement soon became an embarrassment to their own national interests. The peace settlement must be devised not with an eye only on the third or fifth year after the war. For five or ten years after this war there will be peace, peace through exhaustion. In this early period, therefore, punitive measures will be least needed. Yet psychologically it is the period in which the victors are most likely to undertake punitive action. A reasonable approach to the peace would require the victorious powers to devote, say, the first five or eight post-war years to removing the causes of war. If that fails, they could subject Germany to strict control. Instead, we may do just the opposite: we may sit tightly on a prostrate, semi-ruined Germany and find that it gets us nowhere. Then we may tire of the modern Catoism which is Vansittartism and look around for a cure.

The peace settlement should be so framed that its creators will wish to apply it not only in the red heat of hate immediately after the war but also in the cool light of reason a decade later. In launching and maintaining Britain's policy of appeasement, Prime Ministers Stanley Baldwin and Neville Chamberlain were able to exploit the shame which countless decent Englishmen felt toward their own handiwork, the Versailles peace system. So many Britons regarded the separation of Danzig and Austria from Germany, the creation of the Polish Corridor, and the demilitarization of the Rhineland as sins against Germany and Europe that they could not rouse themselves to oppose Hitler when he proceeded to scrap those arrangements. No Carthaginian peace that causes prolonged privation and suffering to millions of persons yet unborn when Hitler became history's ugliest marauder will find permanent justification in the eyes of the civilized world. The peacemakers must see their work in terms of 1960 and beyond.

One final comment on the Ruin Germany doctrine: To blame only Germany means that nobody else is to blame and therefore everything will be all right with the world after Germany is punished. Vansittartism is a plea for the status quo. In the mouth of a conservative the condemnation of Germany alone is really a defense of the existing social and economic systems in the democracies. If Germany is remolded by the victors while the rest of the world remains unchanged, we might as well start preparing for the Third World War.

REEDUCATION BY DEFEAT

What, then, is to be done with Germany?

The proposals heard in various quarters can be grouped under the headings of Reeducation, Disarmament, Dismemberment, and Economic Controls.

Reeducation of the German people by foreign teachers and foreign textbooks and curricula is arrogant nonsense. It would never work even if Germany were crushed and controlled. Germans, even in defeat, would no more submit to foreign schooling than would the citizens of Iowa or California. Bayonets will not make children study.

To reeducate German children, mentally to "delouse" them, in Jan Masaryk's phrase, it is necessary, first, to have a new, anti-Nazi German political regime, for it is the political regime of a country that runs the schools. Secondly, the social and economic environment in Germany must be altered. Children mirror their schools, their environment, and their parents. They cannot change their parents, but their parents can be changed. Germany's parents and Germany's children are being changed and reeducated every day. They were reeducated last night and the night before—by bombs instead of by books.

At his press conference in New York on August 27, 1943, Brendan Bracken, Britain's Minister of Information, referred to Air Chief Marshal Sir Arthur T. Harris, head of the R.A.F. Bomber Command, as Germany's "best educator." Predicting intensified raids, Mr. Bracken stated that Germans "are going to get such a dose in the next months that a lot of people in Germany are going to believe there is a great deal of soundness in the Quaker religion." Bombs, in other words, can make pacifists out of Germans.

I first went to Germany in 1921 and lived there for years thereafter. The defeat of the Kaiser's Germany had made "Quakers" of millions of Germans. In the 20's the most popular slogan in numerous German street demonstrations was "Nie Wieder Krieg," Never Another War. Defeat a second time, at stupendous cost in lives and wealth, may teach the bulk of the German nation that war does not pay. I think it is conceivable that Germany will become a pacifist country after its complete military defeat by the United Nations. This result would be contingent, however, on the ability of the people to depose their war-making caste. The victorious Allies could help Germany do that; they might also prevent it.

Russia is administering the most impressive program of German reeducation. The greatest single fact of this war is the emergence of Russia as a mighty fighting nation. To Russia's vast spaces and rich man-power resources has now been added the demonstrated capacity to make and use machines. This is an epochal development, and the history lesson has been brought home to every German family in the shape of a dead son or brother, or a maimed father or husband or uncle. It has been burned into Germany's flesh and brain that there is a new Russia.

In the past, when German militarists contemplated a war, they could see the prospect of aggrandizement in Africa and Asia at the expense, chiefly, of England and France, and of expansion in the direction of Russia. The First World War showed that Britain and its allies can bar Germany's path to colonial empire; in "Mein Kampf" and in subsequent speeches Hitler—apt pupil—therefore opposed the quest for overseas colonies. He preferred the Ukraine. Now Russia has showed that Germany cannot have the Ukraine.

Blocked in two wars, Germany may very well realize—at last—that it cannot solve its problems by warlike means. It may therefore not only divest itself of militaristic psychology; it may try to get rid of its militaristic ruling groups. At least, there is a chance that this will happen, and the victors should encourage the change, for it is the best hope of world peace.

What is the outlook for German disarmament?

The Allies partially disarmed their defeated foes after 1918. But they did not disarm Japan and Italy, for Japan and Italy were their friends, partners in the First World War. Japan and Italy were therefore in a position to start this world war—Japan by its aggression in China beginning in 1931, Italy by its adventures in Abyssinia in 1935 and in Spain in 1936. So that it is not enough to disarm your defeated enemies; there is no guaranty that some other nation, not now your enemy, may not start another war. The task of preventing Germany, and Japan, from making another war is really part of a much larger task: preventing anybody from making another war. For what does it profit us if we keep Germany from launching a third global conflict when Exland or Wyland can commit the same crime?

Germany must be disarmed after this war. How? All Germany's available stocks of arms and ammunition will be collected and removed or destroyed. But the world has gaped in astonishment and the Axis has watched with mounting fear as America, caught unprepared for war, rapidly mobilized its industries after Pearl Harbor. Today, lipstick manufacturers are making bullets, toothpaste companies are producing munition fuses, wallpaper factories are turning out cannon shells, furniture workshops are making gliders, picklers of vegetables are stamping airplane parts, and, of course, automobile plants are supplying our armed forces with everything from bombers to jeeps, tanks, and steel helmets.

Will Germany, after disarmament, be allowed to produce baby carriages, telephones, trolley cars, radios? These are surely necessary civilian supplies. The factories that made them could be converted to munitions making. Would Germany be permitted to produce medicines, dyes, paints? Those plants could quickly be transformed into makers of explosives. Assuming Germany's will to rearm, the victors must either occupy and control it forever—for the more prolonged the control the more the Germans will resent it and the greater the need for further control—or it must be ruined industrially and reduced to an economic desert unfit for habitation. This would be disastrous to world prosperity and normal life.

In the modern age the only real way to disarm a country is to kill it or to kill its will to arm.

Germany's disarmament during a period of post-war policing and supervision will smooth the path to the elimination of its feudal, anti-democratic oligarchies that have lived by making and using arms. Will the United Nations encourage that social change? Disarmament would be conclusively effective only if the occupying nations regarded it as part of an economic restratification and social revolution which Germany has needed for a long time.

Mental, social, and physical disarmament would make Germany's dismemberment superfluous; such disarmament can be a sufficient guaranty against future wars. However, in any preview of the coming Germany it is better to mix what one would like to see with what is likely to be. We know that dismemberment is under official consideration.

FRONTIERS AND PEACE

Reporting to the House of Commons on February 22, 1944, Prime Minister Churchill, after denying that "the German people will be enslaved or destroyed," stated that the Atlantic Charter does not preclude "territorial transferences or adjustments in enemy territories." It most definitely does. It declares unambiguously that the nations which accepted the Atlantic Charter will seek "no aggrandizement, territorial or otherwise," and that they want "no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned." This means no annexations of German or Japanese territory by Poland, China, Russia, or anybody without honest plebiscites. That has now been thrown overboard. There will be territorial amputations of Japan—they were decided upon at Cairo. There will be territorial "transferences" at the expense of Germany—they were decided upon at Teheran; Churchill has said so. In that same report on February 22, 1944, he revealed that at Teheran he had discussed the future of Poland with Stalin. They both felt that Russia should acquire a stretch of Poland. "Marshal Stalin and I," Churchill continued, "also spoke and agreed upon the need for Poland to obtain compensation at the expense of Germany both in the north and in the west."

Thus Russia's territorial ambitions have made it necessary to scrap the no-annexations provision of the Atlantic Charter. The question is how far the fragmentation of Germany is to go. James B. Reston, London correspondent of the New York Times, has twice wired through the British censorship that Russia is asking for Königsberg, the most important city of East Prussia. Will Poland gain East Prussia but without East Prussia's biggest city? Königsberg might then be the Russian "Danzig" in a Polish East Prussia; a short corridor would connect it with Lithuania, which Stalin has publicly demanded. Moreover, Churchill's "in the north and in the west" would also give Poland parts, at least, of Silesia as well as Pomerania to the Oder River. Russia, conceivably, might want the rest of Germany to be undivided, but could England remain indifferent to Russian influence on the Oder? One begins to see the specter of another Versailles Europe.

No man-made frontier is sacrosanct and many frontiers are crazy. But the Atlantic Charter ruled out territorial aggrandizement because new frontiers are likely to be as insane as old ones and to cause as much trouble. The best cure for this age-long European headache is to make frontiers less important by establishing customs unions, abolishing tariffs, allowing visa-less travel, and fitting Europe into an economic and political world unity.

Obviously, however, Germany's frontiers will be altered. How will this process affect Europe and peace? The dismemberment of Germany will start a squabble for the possession or domination of the members. When Prime Minister Ian Smuts anticipates that Russia will become "mistress of Europe," he urges Britain to fortify its own position by forging special ties with the nations of Western Europe. When the Allies take over the Italian fleet, Stalin claims a third of it. This is natural in the present state of international affairs, and it is natural, therefore, to expect that if Russia and Poland attach parts of Germany other nations will covet other parts. The disruption of Germany will accentuate the trend, already clear and disturbing, to divide Europe into rival spheres of influence. If Germany is split up, the British and Russian spheres of influence will be nearer to one another and therefore nearer to conflict.

A united Germany, rehabilitated and reformed, could, on the other hand, prevent east and west from clashing. Germany purged of war criminals, warmongers, and warmakers could stand as a guaranty of European peace. But if Germany were torn asunder, the struggle for control over the parts would last for years, and while it lasted international organization for peace would be an impossibility or a mere formality covering up strife. For even if the competing spheres of influence were plainly demarcated by agreement, the suspicions and tensions and the poisoned rump of Germany between the spheres would not conduce to an atmosphere of peace.

Russia's emergence as a very great power looking and moving westward is the outstanding new fact in European politics. It is sure to arouse hopes among many people. These hopes will arouse fears elsewhere. This situation is already casting its shadow before. Unless Germany continues to exist as a national entity, the situation might easily lead Europe to catastrophe.

The independent existence of the German and Japanese nations would emphasize the necessity of forming an international organization for peace in which they would be integrated and which would endeavor to eliminate the cause of war through social, political, and economic change, whereas the destruction of the defeated enemies would create the illusion that the causes of war had disappeared and that an instrument to prevent war was no longer urgently required.

GERMANY IN THE WORLD REVOLUTION

Finally, what about the economic future of Germany?

The bombings, the huge human and property losses in battle, the physical exhaustion of the population, and the wear and tear on industrial equipment will leave Germany very much weaker after this war. The same is true of Russia's economic system. One of the chief motives behind the drive for a Soviet sphere of influence is Stalin's desire to recruit half of Europe for the task of rebuilding Russia quickly. Russia has lived under an almost uninterrupted strain ever since 1916. The people have showed remarkable endurance, and the country has demonstrated remarkable resilience and powers of recuperation. But the Soviet government, naturally, wishes to shorten the period of suffering and sacrifice during the post-war rehabilitation, and an attempt will be made to orient the economy of Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Germany on Russia. An authoritative Moscow economist has already advocated the importation by Russia of millions of German workingmen over an extended term to help rebuild what Germans ravaged. It would not be surprising if Moscow demanded the transfer to Russia of German machinery or of the products of German industry.

Russia's eagerness to control the German economy will grow if the Kremlin discovers even the slightest tendency in England and America to exact political concessions or put political pressure on Russia in return for their participation in Soviet reconstruction, Russia will half encircle Germany after the war by reason of its prestige and influence in Czechoslovakia, its domination over all of Poland, and the acquisition of Lithuania and of bits of East Prussia. Russia can and doubtless will exploit this advantage economically. Those in Western countries who may object to such a development would face two alternatives: (1) ruin German economy so that Russia cannot benefit from it; or (2) find Germany a substitute for the Russian market. The substitute might be markets in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, or the domestic markets of the United States, Great Britain, and lands on the European continent.

Under Stalin, Russia has moved very far from socialist life. Russian nationalism, pan-Slavism, a state-aided church, nd separate schools for girls and military schools for boys re not socialism. But economically Russia is more socialted and collectivized than ever. In a number of East Euroean countries farm collectives are sure to be regarded, fter the war, as a solution of age-long agrarian problems, nd the pull toward state-operated industry will be strong verywhere in Europe, everywhere in the world, in fact.

Germany, accordingly, may become the vast arena of an pochal, decisive struggle between the West, mainly America nd Britain, anxious to save Germany from socialism, and tussia, bent on extending the scope of socialist economy.

German interests and German opinions will play a trenendous role in the outcome of this contest. A socialist conomy may—we do not quite know—provide jobs for all and economic security. But it creates the likelihood of an omnipotent state in the face of which the individual has no quaranteed rights, no redress, and no personal freedom. After the torments that Europe has undergone in recent years, however, Europeans may choose jobs at the expense of their freedom—unless the democratic system offers both.

To the extent that the people of Germany are permitted any choice in the matter, they will prefer the Russian system if England and America do not, by solving the problems of democracy at home, present an example of something that looks better to Europe than the Russian system. The future of Germany thus depends on the outcome of the worldwide revolution that is rocking the planet. The war and the peace settlement with Germany are parts of this revolution.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

To IS doubtful that the aerial bombing of Germany has destroyed many buildings whose cultural value was such that they were irreplaceable. The country is not particularly rich in such edifices, and the most valuable are in small cities. However, there has lately been an extremely tragic destruction of cultural buildings of a different kind. In the December 3 attack on Leipzig it appears that the world-famous publishing and printing district of that city was wiped out. Details are mentioned in a letter published by the Swiss Basler Nachrichten on January 28:

The destruction of the Leipzig publishing district can only be compared with the burning of the library of Alexandria. The consequences for scientific and cultural life, not only in Germany but internationally, are in fact incalculable. A great deal of what has been destroyed is altogether irreplaceable, because not only books but standing matrices, blocks, castings, etc., are gone. The shortage of standard scientific works, dictionaries, atlases, textbooks, etc., will soon make itself felt—and not only in Germany. Study and research in the fields of medicine, engineering, and philology will be greatly hindered for a long time to come. The blew is particularly painful for musicians and music lovers. As is well known, parts and scores of virtually the whole of musical literature were published in Leipzig. The majority of the plates have been destroyed.

It is painful to read by way of contrast, in the Svenska Dagbladet of February 25, the report of the Swedish embassy that though "most office buildings" in Berlin were damaged, the headquarters of Hitler and Göring—the Reich Chancellery and the Air Ministry—are still standing. And the most prominent monuments of Prussian military glory—the Brandenburger Tor, the Victory Column, and "the Armory," the museum of the Prussian army and its victories—are "completely unscathed."

Among the astonishing stories an American internee at Baden Baden cabled home after his release was one about the excellent food situation in Germany. He was told—he could hardly have observed it himself—that German families always had "plenty of butter on their tables," and no lack of "other fats" and "good white bread."

But on precisely the same day, February 15, the Berlin correspondent of the Swiss newspaper St. Galler Tagblatt published a long, thorough analysis of the German food situation. He reported that fats of all kinds—butter, cooking fat, margarine, and oil—are limited to a combined total of 965 grams per person for four weeks—a little more than two pounds. This doesn't make it easy to have "plenty of butter on the table." Even the ration of two pounds for four weeks is not guaranteed. On the contrary, an official proclamation declares that part of the two pounds of "fat" will be replaced by pork meat. And the quality of all fats is miserable. "Margarine smells of fish-oil in the frying pan," wrote the Swiss correspondent:

People, however, have ceased to be squeamish. Workers steal parafin oil from the factories to use as salad oil, and gun grease to cook vegetables. It has become necessary to warn publicly against the consumption of industrial fats.

So much for the plenitude of butter. As for the good white bread, it should be noted first of all that Germany has always eaten dark bread. Approximately eighty per cent of the grain grown in the country is rye, not wheat. During the war the bread has grown steadily darker as the rye has been ground more thoroughly and more chaff has got into the flour. But lately a further deterioration has taken place.

The quality of the bread has become poorer since the proportion of rye flour was raised to 90 per cent last October, the remaining 10 per cent consisting not of wheat but of so-called "bread flour," which is said to contain ground beechnuts and pine bark. There have been some cases of bread poisoning.

In the opinion of the Swiss analyst the civilian population, though not the army, receives less than the physiological minimum requirements:

The situation has definitely assumed the character of mass undernourishment. This has led to symptoms of exhaustion in the working population, which business is trying to combat by distributing large quantities of vitamin tablets. There is also some talk about supplementary distribution of calcium preparations. For the time being, however, the only supplementary distribution is of Labor Front leaflets containing the advice to "eat a little something between meals more frequently than usual, in view of the present food situation." Good advice. People are so worn out that they often fall asleep on the way to and from work. And sometimes they suddenly collapse while working and must be carried away.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Lonigan, Lonergan, and New York's Finest

THE New York Police Department may be suffering from a shortage of man-power, but several of its officers had time last week to investigate "Studs Lonigan," a trilogy written by me and published by the Vanguard Press in 1035

On February 28 two police officers in civilian clothes visited the offices of the Vanguard Press and questioned James Henle, president of the firm. They told him that a complaint charging "Studs Lonigan" with immorality had been received from a woman in Brooklyn—she remains anonymous. They asked routine questions concerning the book—when it was published and how many copies had been sold. Mr. Henle answered these questions as precisely as he could and gave the officers one of the last two office copies of the work, which is temporarily out of stock. He was given to understand that the investigation was merely routine and that nothing more was likely to be heard of it.

Two days later a Sergeant Timothy Sullivan visited the Vanguard Press. He also was investigating "Studs Lonigan" on the same complaint. He asked Mr. Henle the same questions as the other officers had and received the same answers.

It was Sergeant Sullivan who introduced a new note into the proceedings, which indicates that the New York Police Department is short of other things besides man-power. Sergeant Sullivan seemed to be convinced that there was more than a phonetic connection between "Studs Lonigan" and the Lonergan murder case!

Mr. Henle attempted to disabuse the sergeant of this suspicion. He pointed out that neither he nor I had murdered Mrs. Patricia Lonergan but that even if we had it was inconceivable that I could have written and he could have published, in 1935, a book predicting how the murder was to be committed. But this argument, weighty as it seems, was apparently not conclusive. In the course of their talk Mr. Henle went through "Studs Lonigan" with Sergeant Timothy Sullivan, pointing out the titles of the separate volumes of the trilogy: "Young Lonigan," "The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan," and "Judgment Day"; and when they came to the last title, Sergeant Sullivan made a remark to the effect that I had finally got away from the Lonergan case. I do not know whether Sergeant Sullivan has made any further investigation of the suspicious similarity between Lonigan and Lonergan, but at least Mr. Henle and I have not been arrested, as yet, in connection with the sensational murder.

On March 4 another police officer, in uniform, visited the Vanguard Press. In the absence of Mr. Henle he questioned an employee of the firm. He asked essentially the same old questions and received the same answers. He, however, did not mention the Lonergan case.

On the same day a police squad car stopped in front of the Sutton Manor Book Shop, a small bookstore and rental library on First Avenue near Fifty-third Street. One of the two officers in the car asked Mrs. Mitchell Kennerley, the owner of the shop, if she had a copy of "Studs Lonigan." She said that it was temporarily out of stock but that she could furnish other books of mine. They were interested only in "Studs Lonigan." According to the New York Times reporter who interviewed Mrs. Kennerley, the officer said he was making a literary survey. Also either he or his fellow-officer made some remark about the Lonergan case.

As long as the police were merely visiting the Vanguard Press neither Mr. Henle nor I did anything about their investigation. However, when we received definite evidence that bookstores were also being visited we released the story to the press. It was printed in the New York Times and mentioned in radio broadcasts. But when reporters made inquiries at the New York Police Department, officials professed to be ignorant of the matter. No order, it was said, had been given for such an investigation. One newspaper was even told that the Sutton Manor Book Shop had not been visited, although Mrs. Kennerley and at least one witness, a soldier, confirmed the story of the visit. It is hardly likely that the imposing figure of an officer in uniform, which two people assert they saw, was merely a ghost.

The investigation of "Studs Lonigan" will undoubtedly go no farther. But the New York Police Department should explain this fantastic foray. If the investigation was merely routine, why were so many presumably busy officers detailed to it in the course of a week? And how was it possible for their superiors to know nothing about it? What or who was behind it?

Whatever the answers may be, the intimidation implicit in the behavior of the police is obvious. It is significant that they chose to visit, not large book shops or department stores where "Studs Lonigan" is also on sale, but a small bookstore which would be least able to defend itself in case of a raid and prosecution on charges of obscenity—if that was what the police contemplated.

For all its Gilbert and Sullivan trappings, this latest police investigation of a serious book is far from funny.

JAMES T. FARRELL

The Balkans

THE LONG BALKAN NIGHT. By Leigh White. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

BELIEVE that Mr. White has written the best book on the Balkans to appear during this war. The intelligence and feeling with which he writes about that important part of the world have aroused not a little nostalgia in one who was a Balkan correspondent for eighteen years. And the fact that I was able to recognize almost every person that he describes is a measure of the truthfulness and accuracy of his reporting. The Hungarian newspaperman must have been so-and-so; the British secret agent with the Czechoslovak passport who died in a concentration camp of the Gestapo ed to come to the cafe table of the American journalists Vienna; the hotel porter of the Serbski Kral in Belgrade d the figures in the Athenee Palace in Bucharest were all ling persons whom I had met and would have recognized en if Mr. White had omitted their names.

Because it is so excellent a book, I regret that it must ercome two handicaps if it is to have the wide reading it serves. It appears three years after the events it describes, d it was preceded two years ago by another dramatic deription of the same region, Robert St. John's "From the and of the Silent People." St. John is the better writer; t White has a much clearer understanding of the problems the Balkans. St. John, of course, made no pretense of beg more than a reporter. Leigh White tries to explain to the intricate political, ethnographic, and linguistic probms of this most heterogeneous and tradition-bound part of e world. He spent only two years in the Balkans but he arned an amazing amount, and the record of his convertions with politicians, statesmen, secret agents, newspaperen, soldiers, and workers in Hungary, Rumania, Yugoavia, Bulgaria, and Greece are most revealing.

He exposes the various fascist and Nazi spies and "collabrationists," and from his book I learned what became of ome of the people who shadowed the foreign correspondents the various countries. One of these was Louis Matzhold. 1 1937 the Associated Press was using Matzhold as one of s local correspondents in Vienna. Liberal-minded Amerian correspondents suspected Matzhold of being a spy of ne Gestapo and resented his connection with the A. P. since gave him entry into our midst. Now White reports that it was long before we discovered that Heinrich Himmler ad appointed Matzhold chief of the Hungarian section of he Gestapo. Soon afterward it became impossible for Amerian journalists to work in Budapest (our telephone service vas always interrupted). . . . " And this man was employed s a paid assistant by a leading American news agency!

Mr. White relates simply and effectively his experiences n the various bombed Balkan capitals. He was always accompanied by Maricruz, a Spanish loyalist refugee who became his wife. Apparently her spirit deeply affected his thinking.

His book is imbued with a truly liberal spirit. And thereore I was all the more interested to note that this man who aps the Magyar fascists, the Rumanian Nazis, the Greek king and his Metaxist friends, takes an attitude toward the Yugolav situation which is different from the accepted liberal view in this country. On the basis of his experience he warns as that the present Yugoslav division is not a simple ideological rift but also a Serb-Croat feud, and he comes to the conclusion that only a federal solution can save Yugoslavia. He also disagrees with Louis Adamic that "sovietization" is the "only alternative to the disreputable dynasties of which our Metternichs of the State Department and Foreign Office are apparently so enamored." He is not convinced that Russian imperialism would be any more acceptable to the Balkan peoples than the Anglo-Saxon variety.

Mr. White's book is readable, truthful, liberal, courageous, and sincere. And the American public should read it, for though the events it covers occurred three years ago, the problems it discusses are those of tomorrow.

M. W. FODOR

What Is Faith?

THE PRIMACY OF FAITH. By Richard Kroner. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

N THESE days when there is much loose talk about the duty of religion to save the world, it clears the air to have some informed discussion of theology. Not that the nineteenth century wasted its time criticizing dogma and revelation, or that we must undo its work; simply that by now the stripping process has reached the core of any articulate faith and destroyed it. People can talk of religion and mean nothing in particular except the opposite of a widespread suspicion of belief. Compared with some religious enthusiasts of today, Rousseau's Savoyard Vicar would sound like a hair-splitting scholastic and Matthew Arnold would be accounted a precisian.

Fortunately, the Gifford Lectures, founded half a century ago with a "scientific aim" in view, continue to create occasions for reflective thought on matters religious and even theological. Inspired by the task of giving these lectures, Professor Niebuhr prepared his monumental "Nature and Destiny of Man," and shortly before, Professor Richard Kroner, formerly of Kiel and now of Union Theological Seminary, delivered the substance of the present volume, "The Primacy of Faith."

Mr. Kroner starts with the traditional inquiry, Can we know divinity, and if so, how? He shows in rapid order the limitations of a natural theology and the impossibility of a rational faith, even when the rationalism is that of Kant, who transferred the reason of faith from the theoretical to the practical realm. There is a gap, according to Professor Kroner, between any knowledge we may have of nature and the knowledge we may hope to have of God. But that gap cannot be filled by an act of pure will, amounting to a determination that there shall be a God.

Faith alone can bridge that gap. Very well; so much is traditional, but what is faith? Professor Kroner answers, it is the act of the religious imagination. "Imagination," he says, "binds together what the thinking mind separates; or more precisely, it maintains the original unity." That unity in man can be analyzed into soul, mind, body. In universal terms, it is nature, reason, and God. God and the soul are mysteries which only the imagination-and Mr. Kroner is not afraid to name the poet as the true describer of the unity of life-can grasp and possess without resolving. "Therefore, faith is necessarily imaginative."

This again is traditional, but in another sense. It belongs to the grand nineteenth-century tradition. With all its rationalism, naturalism, higher criticism, and agnosticism, the nineteenth century seldom failed to recognize the role of intuition, springing from reason, which was its characteristic discovery after the excessive simplicities of the previous age. After Rousseau came Hegel and Coleridge; after them Kierkegaard, William James, and Samuel Butler hung on to the central perception that life is an element, inevitably destroyed by analysis. Imagination for them was the faculty of keeping together the inner and the outer aspects of a single fact. What this implies as to religious beliefs and practices is another question, yet a question that cannot be touched until this fundamental premise is either adopted or rejected. Professor Kroner addresses himself to the task of persuading us to adopt it; he argues its congeniality with the nature of man and its fruitfulness for man, without, however, meeting the pragmatists more than halfway. But he is uncompromising in his insistence on restricting reason to its proper sphere. He thus occupies a middle position between Kant and James along one diagonal, and between Hegel and Kierkegaard along the other.

His book, particularly after the opening chapter, is compactly and lucidly written, in a tone pleasantly modest yet sufficiently affirmative. It puts the question of a faith for moderns in clear technical terms. What it calls for, by way of supplement, is a full historical account, in equally clear descriptive words, of the wanderings of the religious spirit since Coleridge's "Aids to Reflection."

The War: GHO and GI

TARAWA. THE STORY OF A BATTLE. By Robert Sherrod. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.

D DAY, WHAT PRECEDED IT; WHAT FOLLOWED.

By John Gunther, Harper and Brothers. $3.

THE CURTAIN RISES. By Quentin Reynolds. Random House. $2.75.

ALTHOUGH they might not relish the remark, both John Gunther and Quentin Reynolds belong to the older generation of war correspondents; their reputations were well established before the United States entered the war. Because of their status they don't have to perform the grubby tasks that befall the spot-news reporters who must stick with the troops month in and month out. Reynolds flits about for Collier's to any place he thinks a big story will break. Gunther, interrupting his broadcasting, popped over for ten weeks last summer to have a look at the war. Less celebrated correspondents who have yet to establish their reputations do not enjoy such professional luxury.

The result is that Gunther and Reynolds devote a good deal of space to being entertaining about a war which they thoroughly enjoy. They tell what they ate and drank in odd corners of the earth, and they talk about all the famous people—whom they call by their first names—that they ran across in unexpected places. To them the war takes on certain aspects of a gay, mobile Stork Club. Mr. Reynolds especially reminds one of an Elsa Maxwell at the front.

Mr. Gunther's book is not all cakes and ale, for he has genuine zeal to find out what's going on, and he works hard at it. His picture of General Eisenhower before and during the descent on Sicily is illuminating. Eisenhower's modesty seemed genuine; that is, he had none of that grotesque Mac-Arthurian yen for self-advertisement which so often overtakes generals who have lived in peace-time obscurity all their lives and suddenly find themselves pitched into the big headlines. Eisenhower had a deeper wisdom; he realized that his principal public-relations task was to overcome the centrifugal psychological forces which so often make allies fly apart. He insisted on intertwining Americans and Britons in the command organization in order to weave the two nationalities into a single fighting force. Perhaps that awareness is one reason why Eisenhower was selected to be the first general since the Middle Ages to attempt the spanning of that momentous moat the English Channel.

Mr. Gunther also picked up some nuggets about the situation in Germany's Balkan satellites—Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary. The Nazis have not occupied them extensively, and they are free to the extent that they read many copies of Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down." The people of these nations which are fighting the Allies hope for an Allied victory, to save them from (a) their ally, Germany; and (b) Russia. Their governments, however, hesitate to desert the Axis because Hitler has shrewdly shifted Balkan boundaries to keep them in line.

In a sense war correspondents not only record contemporary history but also influence the course of events. Their opinions help to form the mental paths of many persons in the United States. However transitory their books may be, it is a healthy sign that both Gunther and Reynolds have a liberal outlook which may leaven the views of stay-at-homes. Gunther in particular thinks along the same lines as Leland Stowe—that the war sliguld be an upheaval that will make men freer throughout the world, and not just an imperialist scramble.

Correspondents also shape events because, in their capacity as the eyes of the people at home, they are partly responsible for American morale. In this respect some of the work being done by the newer generation of war correspondents may be more useful than the chatty product of the Gunther-Reynolds school. The men who are now building their reputations are apt to have more contacts with G. I. than with G. H. Q. Take, for instance, the tough, realistic account of Tarawa by Robert Sherrod, a Time reporter. In his book war is not pretty, not fun. Here is the whistling of shells, and the ghastly smell of the dead. One sees how young Americans behave in their last hours of life. This is about as near as you can get, in an armchair, to being in the midst of battle.

On the way to Tarawa the officers and men talked themselves into thinking the conquest would be a cinch; it might take a few hours, or maybe the Japanese had fled entirely as they had from Kiska. But Tarawa turned out to be the bloodiest battle in the history of the Marine Corps. The first thing that went wrong was the failure of the Higgins landing boats to surmount the offshore coral reef. That meant the men had to wade ashore a distance of three or four city blocks under machine-gun fire. The Japanese still were present and alive on Tarawa and scarcely hurt by our inadequate plane and sea bombardment. Mr. Sherrod waded in with the second wave and saw men hit all around him. The assault battalions were knocked to pieces in the landing; perhaps a third of their officers and men were casualties. The Americans who did reach the beach established themselves on a few yards of sand between the sea wall and the water. At first they huddled under the sea wall. Gradually they became accustomed to death and walked upright; then they swarmed over the sea wall to kill the Japanese that were killing them. They took Tarawa, although the Japanese had thought a million men couldn't do it.

Mr. Sherrod is bitter about soft, pleasant accounts of the war. Such stories "gave the impression that any American could lick any twenty Japs." They may have impressed folks back home, "but they sometimes did not impress the miserable, bloody soldiers in the front lines where the action had taken place." Many Americans, he says, "have not been prepared psychologically to accept the cruel facts of war." He tells of a bomber pilot who went home on leave: "When I told my mother what the war was really like, and how long it was going to take, she sat down and cried."

But if your heart is sick with longing for some special boy . . . remember this and find comfort . . . wherever he may be, in the frozen wastes of Iceland or the jungles of New Guinea . . . you can reach out and give your boy some little comforts that speak of home.

Mr. Sherrod tells what the war is really like.

Fiction in Review

LTHOUGH neither its theme nor its setting is new to A fiction, Lillian Smith's first novel, "Strange Fruit" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.75), is a newly moving and unusual book. There is something very comforting in the singlemindedness with which we are in the habit of approaching the "Negro problem," but Miss Smith is anything but comforting or single-minded. In her hands the Negro problem turns out to be not only the problem of the whole South but, by implication, of all modern society. To say, for instance, that "Strange Fruit" anatomizes a small Georgia town at the end of the last war would be to regionalize and to particularize in time a social study which is applicable to any number of other American communities and moments; or to say that Miss Smith's book is concerned with racial conflicts would be to ignore her knowledge that in the degree that race is set against race, man is set against himself. "Strange Fruit" is so wide in its human understanding that its Negro tragedy becomes the tragedy of anyone who lives in a world in which minorities suffer; when it ends in a lynching, we are as sorry and frightened for the lynchers as for the victim. Indeed, we are terrified, for ourselves, at the realization that this is what we have made of our human possibility-a rare effect for the problem novel to produce. Yet Miss Smith's novel is no more than a problem novel; it is simply a very good

Of all race situations, I suppose the situation of miscegenation is the touchiest. Even the liberal Northern imagination shrinks from the question, "Would you want your sister to marry a Negro?" and I think it took special courage and passion for Miss Smith to hang her novel on the main thread of the love of a white boy and a colored girl. However, Tracy Dean is not the usual scion of Southern aristocratic blood that is running thin; he is the son of the rather nice white doctor of the town, and if he is weak, it is because it served his mother's complicated emotional needs to make him weak. Nor is Nonnie Anderson the conventional highspirited Negro girl; she is college-educated and refined, by her mother's excessive pride, beyond the point where she can ever hope to find a workable way of life in a bigoted society. Perhaps, that is, these two people are doomed even apart from the question of their marriage. They never do marry, of course; and Miss Smith knows they never could marry; actually she never says they should marry. Yet as their love story unfolds, the issue forces itself upon us: why in the world can they not marry? What is this difference in color which is admittedly no bar to love but so unassailably a bar to marriage? And even our vaunted Northern liberalism begins to look unpleasantly like hypocrisy.

Indeed, the prime merit of Miss Smith's novel is that it refuses to give quarter to an easy tolerance. It would be a very complacent Northerner who could take any real comfort from the fact that "Strange Fruit" is a novel about the South. Sam, Miss Smith's Negro doctor, is at some pains to explain that there are some nice white people in Maxwell, Georgia, too; among them he specifies Mr. Harris, owner of the sawmill and one of the town's most substantial citizens. Well, Mr. Harris is a liberal and he risks his life to try to save the Negro who is being lynched. But it is also Mr. Harris who never pays quite as much as the union scale, and some of his underpaid workers are of the lynching party; Mr. Harris is also strong in support of a church which not only blinks at lynching but considers itself above saving black souls in the same revival tent with white. Clearly "Strange Fruit" is concerned with contradictions, within any one person and within the social group, which have their parallels above the Mason and Dixon Line and in fields other than those of racial conflict.

Just as the town of Maxwell is divided between its colored section and its white section, Miss Smith's story divides itself between its white characters and its colored characters. But I think Miss Smith does a better creative job with her white people than with her Negroes. In conflict with each other, or in family or affectional relationships, her Negroes carry great psychological conviction, but when Miss Smith is inside their minds or trying to characterize them as personalities, they tend to fade or fall into stereotypes. It is a common failing in books about Negroes by white people. With the best will, it seems to be impossible for a member of the dominant group to imagine the way of thinking and feeling of a people who for so many generations have been taught to hide their thinking and feeling.

It was an odd experience to read Ramón J. Sender's "Chronicle of Dawn" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50) in the same week with "Strange Fruit." Miss Smith's book so bravely rushes head-on into the tragic confusions of modern life, and Mr. Sender's book so tragically turns its back on the world. Written in the first person, "Chronicle of Dawn" purports to be the diary of a Spanish Loyalist dying in a French concentration camp; because there is no longer any hope for his side, Pepe has refused rescue, and he spends his last days recalling his childhood. But it is only a very short period of his boyhood that he records—the few months, when he was ten, in which he learned to love the girl whom he evidently still loves and in which he also learned the meaning of heroism. And no doubt Mr. Sender intends that this connection between love and heroism as well as the meaning of his hero's self-willed death shall be explained by this brief reminiscence. However, they are not explained, and the inclusion of a long parable of heroism makes the explanation only the more obscure; at its supposedly most meaningful moments I found "Chronicle of Dawn" least revealing. And even as a straight recollection of Spanish boyhood. Pepe's reminiscence, for all Mr. Sender's good prose, was marred for me by the fatal coyness with which Mr. Sender reproduces the mind of a ten-year-old.

IN BRIEF

NEWS OF THE NATION: A NEWS-PAPER HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By Sylvan Hoffman, editor, and C. Hartley Grattan, associate editor. Foreword by Allan Nevins. Garden City Publishing Company. $3.49.

Witchcraft Deaths Rise to Nineteen, Zenger Vindicated by Jury in Free Press Test Case, Hanging Ends Kidd's Career—these are sample headlines culled at random from this fascinating file of forty-one issues of tabloid history, starting with Columbus Discovery Rocks Continent and ending with the attack on Pearl Harbor. As a device for making the learning of history attractive, this is one that depends overwhelmingly on its execution. Fortunately the ingenuity, intelligence, and accuracy with which the project has been carried out are fully equal to the objective. Students will find in these papers, which presumably will be issued to them one by one, not only an exciting and journalistic running account of the principal developments of American history, but a wealth of absorbing detail on the art, styles, books, and social by-play of each period as well. The death of Wild Bill Hickok, the establishment of the first soda fountains, and the founding of the Police Gazette are the sort of items that give "News of the Nation" a richness not to be found in the conventional history text. Controversial matters are ably handled in editorials and cartoons, the illustrative material is amusing, and the spirit of contemporary excitement has been so effectively caught that you are sure to come away from this file as indignant over the steal of the election of 1876 as over the steal of the soldier vote in 1944.

THE FRENCH RIGHT AND NAZI GERMANY, 1933-1939: A STUDY OF PUBLIC OPINION. By Charles A. Micaud. Duke University Press. $3.50.

It is a great pity that the educated public has such a horror of scholarly books. Here, with the learned apparatus of a thesis, and in a spirit of scientific research, is a study which tells us more about the downfall of France than all the backstairs gossip about Madame Hélène de Portes. Dr. Micaud's findings are summed up in this sentence: "In their eyes [the rightists'] domestic and foreign policy could no longer be separated; victory over Italy, over th rebels in Spain, even over German meant to them a victory of the workin classes in France and of Soviet Russi in Europe, and this victory had to b opposed whatever the effect upon na tional security." In terse and familia terms: "Rather Hitler than Blum!" is the knell of nationalism, in the cour try and in the class where nationalist had once been most ardently supported The danger of an ideological conflict: not over, as Dr. Micaud warns us in h closing sentence. All earnest students of European affairs will need this quiet vigorous book: I am not prophesyin extensive sales. It ought to be require reading for the Big Four: "Et nun Reges, intelligite; erduimini, qui jud catis terram."

GREAT AMERICAN PAINTINGS FROM SMIBERT TO BELLOW: 1729-1924. By John Walker an Macgill James. Oxford Universit Press. $5.

The twenty-page introduction to the book of fine black-and-white reproduc tions (the few in color are of uncertai quality and mar the effect of the whole provides a résumé of the history of American painting that is all the mor illuminating because it is biased. Th main line, the authors say, has been particularly uncompromising and nativ kind of realism. Consequently, the earl Copley, Stuart, Sully, Homer, Eakins and Bellows are allotted the greates space, while Whistler, Cassatt, and Sai gent are the only non-realists in thi sense to receive more than two plate each. And of course, Ryder. But Blake lock is not represented at all, nor New man, nor the Hudson River and th panoramic schools. And only one o Washington Allston's canvases is repre duced. The authors push their thesis little too far.

FILMS

ALTHOUGH it lasts just ninetee minutes, "With the Marines at Tarawa" gave me, in that time, a sharpe realization of combat than any othe film I have seen. I also respected it craftsmanship and its taste, barring a ill-timed utterance of the line "thei lives mean nothing to them" whil the camera is examining Japanes corpses. It interests me that color, s harmless to musical fantasies and s generally fatal to films which deal, eve nominally, with peace-time realism ds a lot to the power and immediacy these war scenes. A man who was at rawa tells me that it is impossible to plicate the sounds of such an operaon, and that with such material as was hotographed, the editors have pulled punches, as I suspected they might ve; the cameras simply failed to get wn some of the things we read of in e newspapers. This eyewitness-he is a correspondent there—thought the cture a good job but was, I could see, little amused that it had moved and cited me so intensely. I don't wonder was. But I think it can be highly commended to anyone who, like my-If, needs to diminish so far as he can e astronomical abyss which exists beeen the experienced and the inexpericed in war. The faces of individual arines, at the end, are even more imbling and more instructive than the orst of the records of combat.

"See Here, Private Hargrove" suffers proper disadvantage, compared with l'arawa." It is callow, puppyish, whimcally amusing-to those who can easily vallow that contradiction-and uninrested in telling the truth even about aining. Taken within its own modest mic intentions it is harmless enough, suppose, and reasonably entertaining it may perhaps genuinely amuse men training camps-and there are good erformances by Bill Phillips and eenan Wynn. But there is something apleasantly cuddly about it-a sort of between "Stalky" and the pansyuck-driver sort of New Yorker humor. "Voice in the Wind," a heartfelt loestring quickie shot in thirteen days, a pretty awful moving picture, I reale, but I was touched by its sincerity I by a number of things in it, and as sympathetically interested in a good eal more. It is being advertised as "a range new kind of moving picture," nd that makes me realize, as the exciteent over the "originality" of "Citizen ane" used to, that already I belong to grizzling generation. The picture is ke a middle-thirties French melodrama renched in the Rembrandt-and-mosses manner of German "art" films f the early to middle twenties. Even ithin those terms it is much less good nan it might be, solemn, unimaginave, thinly detailed; but it is also richly ostalgic if you have any affection for ad period art. (I have an idea that the ss discriminating among the German efugees will go crazy over it.) Also I njoyed hearing a piece of Chopin layed without interruption and with propriate oversensitivity, while the tragedy came to a standstill, sniffling and wiping its eyes. It takes a lot of anti-commercial courage to do that in a film; and however wrong most of it goes, "Voice in the Wind" has a great deal of that sort of courage.

"The Impostor" is a piece of anxious manufacture about Jean Gabin as a fugitive killer, masquerading as a Free French hero, in Equatorial Africa. Gabin himself, artificiality and all, is good. The rest of the show sadly proves just how nearly possible it is to make a French film in Hollywood, or anywhere else except France.

MUSIC

77 HAT the advocates of opera in English want, and what the Metropolitan failed to achieve with its "Falstaff" in English, the Nine O'Clock Opera Company succeeded in achieving with its performance of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," which was presented in New York recently in the Town Hall Endowment Fund series: a play on the stage, of which almost every word could be heard, which was therefore completely intelligible and entertaining even to an audience with no advance knowledge of what it was about, and which the engaging members of the company made highly enjoyable. But the cost of this success was even greater losses than those of the Metropolitan's "Falstaff."

The words could be heard and understood so well because the singers were singing in a small hall and had no orchestra between them and the audience, but only an accompanying piano offstage; and the loss of all that the orchestra contributes to "Figaro" was the first musical cost. Then the play was cut down and simplified; and with some of the complications and the characters involved in them there was eliminated some of the music-some rather good music like Bartolo's La vendetta! and the first-act Susanna-Marcellina duet. Bu: additional music was eliminated even where characters and action were retained; and this included both of the Countess's great arias, Porgi amor and Dove sono. And of the music that was retained, what was not slow-moving and large-spanned melody like Voi che sapele and Deb vieni, non tardar was hurried over in a way that made it ineffective, unclear, difficult for the mind to get hold of-even if this mind were not too concentrated on the quick succession of words to give any attention to the music.

In addition to these musical losses there was one which I pointed out last week. The audience listening to Non piu andrai sung in English could hear and understand Figaro's ironic statements to Cherubino. But if his audience had read the English translation in advance and were listening to the aria sung in Italian it would have had notonly the same knowledge of what Figaro was saying but the additional enjoyment of the delicious effect, with Mozart's music, of the Italian words and rhymes of Per montagne, per valloni, Con le nevi e i sollioni. Al concerto di tromboni, Di bombarde, di cannoni, Che le palle in tutti i tuoni. And this is, of course, only one example of what was true throughout the performance.

At New York's new City Center of Music and Drama I attended the first performance of Bizet's "Carmen." I cannot recall ever having heard the title role sung as beautifully as it was sung by Jennie Tourel-with such loveliness of vocal sound and such musical phrasing. But I also cannot recall anyone whose physical appearance did more damage to her credibility in the role, and wno had less sense for the stage with which to overcome that initial handicap. For lack of this sense, which would have built up and projected a continuous line of pose and movement and through this an impression of dramatic character, her impersonation was a collection of discontinuous mannerisms-the traditional Carmen mannerisms, and additional prima donna mannerisms, which were made even more absurd by the absence of the alluring appearance and personality that they presumed.

There was the same contrast between musical excellence and dramatic absurdity in the entire performance. The orchestra was poor; but most of the leading singers-Mario Berini (lose). Mary Martha Briney (Micaela), Regina Resnick (Frasquita), Rosalind Nadell (Mercedes), but not George Czaplicki (Escamillo)-sang well, except for a few constricted high tones from Berini and Briney; the chorus sang superbly: and Laszlo Halasz conducted very well. On the other hand not even the dignified entrance processions of pot-bellied noblemen and dumpy noble ladies in the Metropolitan's "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" are as funny as what the chorus of women in that "Carmen" performance looked like and did; and even more explosive were the appearance and antics of Resnick and Nadell, Hans Wolmut, the stage director, could not help what these people-and some others-looked like; but he could have controlled what they did. He seems to have set out to think things out freshly -but only half the time; as a result there were some new details of staging that made dramatic sense, along with some of the traditional ones that make no sense at all. The factory girls, for example, came out of the factory in the first act, as they should; but Carmen preserved her right to a prima donnal entrance from somewhere in Seville. Or some of the men were provided with a dramatic purpose for being on the stage by being made to pass bales of merchandise from the factory for loading; but one man was allowed to sit at the back of the stage during the Micaela-Jose duet and distract attention by little movements of personal boredom, physical discomfort, and so on. Moreover the identical bales turned up in the third act-most of them borne on bent-over backs, but one of them carried by the string as though it were a birdcage just bought at Macy's.

Virgil Thomson, however, who at times is so much more exacting than I, found the performance "acceptable (by present standards) dramatically." This was in a Sunday article which included some more of his extraordinarily shrewd and well-expressed observations on the Metropolitan-this time on its "repertory out of all proportion to the season's length. . . . No repertory can be effective if it is larger than the plant that houses it can handle in terms of scenery storage, music and stage rehearsals, lighting arrangements, and the regular employment of dependable artists. The Metropolitan has a roster of 106 soloists, some of whom never sing at all and others of whom sing infrequently. This season's repertory includes, to be played within twenty weeks, thirty-one different operas. In addition, it is rarely that all the performances of any opera are given with the same cast that has rehearsed for its opening. This means that nothing is ever properly rehearsed and that nothing ever gets played often enough, once it is produced, to acquire finish." For its twenty weeks, he concludes, the Metropolitan should use a company of fifty resident soloists in no more than twenty works. Sound advice, to which you may be sure the Metropolitan will pay no attention.

Ppublic Versus Monarchy

r Sirs: In his article Legitimismw Style in your issue of February 19 fessor Vambery expresses the opinthat a modern pretender seeking oration of his throne was playing rn an "illegitimate legitimism" by ring to enlist the support of the masses ough advocating a "peasant and ker state." He states that the preeler would lose the support of the servative elements and not win that whose who stand for agrarian reform. w does he know? A situation is quite cceivable wherein the conservative elenats might consider themselves enily lost unless ceding the bulk of Ir rights and privileges, and wherein masses might prefer a "moderator" ceing left at the mercy of all sorts of it or left pressures. Masses are someies very reluctant to assume the reansibility and self-sacrifice of leaderb. Karl Marx knew this as his corcondence proves, but some modern Lerals seem to be blissfully unaware of am amazed that nobody ever seems a consider the possibility of just everyy in Europe being deadly tired of nting after the war. Old loyalties w suddenly prove extremely strong, active, and convincing. Symbols of past like the double eagle which fessor Vambery not very delicately s an "ambiguous bird" might be unectedly powerful. Nostalgia for ngs past is also a political force, little some historians seem to admit it. hile the old leaders of the masses y still consider the question of reolic versus monarchy a question of nciple—in spite of the fact that the ial Democratic parties in monarchies e fared better than in most repubthe masses themselves may feel q te differently. They may agree with (certainly not reactionary) "Enlopedia of Social Sciences" and coner the form of government one of venience. Neither the republican nor monarchical form of government is tself reactionary or progressive. Both e shown great elasticity. I certainly d not cite examples to prove my nt. It would therefore be as well for ple, if they are Europeans, to cease prand the ghost of 1848, and if they Americans, to identify every king with George III. After all, we find, for instance, among the Hapsburgs, Joseph II, the only revolutionary emperor the Western world has ever seen, and among the British rulers not every king was a George III. And even he did not look exactly as ugly to the British as to the Americans. The whole idea of identification of monarchy with reaction and clericalism or even fascism belongs to the dustbin and is unworthy of any conscientious political thinker. I quote Macaulay from memory; it is the circumstances which do not count with some gentlemen that decide in every single case the merit or demerit of a given proposal.

Sorry if I am so undogmatic.

An old, very authentic, and tested anti-fascist:

EGON RANSHOFEN-WERTHEIMER Washington, D. C., February 18

But Hapsburgs Are Hapsburgs

Dear Sirs: Although I doubt that "conservative elements" might voluntarily cede "the bulk of their rights and privileges" I do not repeat Mr. Ranshofen-Wertheimer's question does he know?" not only because I am unaware of a single instance in history "conservative elements" renounced their privileges and still less their estates at a pretender's request, but because if they did they would cease to be 'conservatives." Nor do historical events prove that people were ever so tired of fighting as not to start a civil war after their defeat rather than restore a pretender to the lost throne of the dynasty. Nostalgia for the past may prove, indeed, a strong political force, but only for those admirers of the past who indulge in the hopeless pastime of undoing history. It is true that republic versus monarchy is not necessarily a question of principle, but I venture to disbelieve that Social Democratic parties have fared better under the Romanovs, the Hohenzollerns, or in Hapsburg Hungary (where until 1918 socialism and prostitution were handled by the same police department) than in Switzerland, France, or the Weimar Republic.

By referring to Joseph II, whose liberal despotism ended in lamentable failure, and to George III my critic confirms the thesis that each dynasty has to be appraised on its merits and traditions. The fact alone that Mr. Ranshofen-Wentheimer found but one progressive-minded Hapsburg and but one reactionary ruler of England seems to determine the relative value of both dynasties. I fully agree with my critic that we must not identify monarchy with reaction and clericalism, but the Hapsburg tradition we cannot separate from either. This is apparently the stumbling block on which the identity of our view splits. Mr. Ranshofen-Wertheimer signs as a "very authentic and tested anti fascist." No one who has read his "Victory Is Not Enough" will question the authenticity of his anti-Nazism, but one might not concur in his appraisal of Marshal Pétain (pp. 63, 95) or indorse his opinion that with the Cagoulards, the Croix de Feu. and the royalist conventicles an "intense revival of spiritual values set in." Religion is a wonderful thing, but it must not degenerate into politics. Violence remains violence and authoritarianism remains despotism even if they claim to make the people happy under the auspices of a holy church. An out-of-date Beelzebub is scarcely fit to expel a young and vigorous Satan.

Our Village Is Dead

[The letter which appears below was written by a Serb who is now a prisoner in Germany to his brother in Canada.]

Dear Brother: I am alive and well. wishing you every good from the Lord and my heart. Yesterday I received your address from Milos so I can tell you what happened to us in this war. All we had is gone and most are dead Brothers Tanasiya, Dusan, Milisha, Marko, and Milisha's Stevan were killed, with 700 others, at the town hall of Grabovce. The goods were taken and the houses burned. Women and children were taken to camps, and no one knows what happened to them. My wife is working in Berlin and was separated from our children at Gradisca. Milos wrote that my Danica died in camp in Jaska near Zagreb. About the other two I know nothing. Partisans have taken little Stanko and we don't know what happened to him.

The Shape of Things

WHO IS TO ADMINISTER FRANCE AFTER THE invasion? The President stated last week that he had reached a decision on this subject but refused to say what it was. According to persistent reports in Washington, which unfortunately are backed by a good deal of indirect evidence, the plan is to give General Eisenhower the responsibility of allowing or not allowing the French Committee of National Liberation to reorganize civil affairs in France. He will be free, it is said, to deal with the committee or any other group according to the requirements of military expediency. If such a plan is really put into effect, it will be an invitation to anarchy. Allied headquarters will become the fount of political power attracting a swarm of thirsty intriguers and selfseekers with the Vichy functionaries well to the fore. Such groups will be hoping to get an opportunity to carry on the political and business rackets in which they have engaged under German protection. But they have nothing to offer us and to treat with them would be to arouse a violent reaction from the men who have been fighting and suffering to free France. We shall badly need the support of an orderly civil administration and the only authority with popular credentials is the National Committee of Liberation. In his speech on March 18 to the Consultative Assembly at Algiers, General de Gaulle said: "Every effort to maintain the Vichy power either in partial or camouflaged form or to maintain any artiment (the National Committee) would be intolerable and condemned in advance." Is it "expedient" to ignore this warning?

THE UKRAINIAN HARVEST WILL NO DOUBT be below normal next fall but it will be a harvest reaped by Russians for Russians. The great German looting expedition to the East is drawing to a close as the beaten German soldiers retreat beyond the Dniester and drag themselves through the Bessarabian mud. Their sojourn in the promised land has proved brief and bloody. By Hitler's orders they held on desperately, and too long, to their last strongholds in the South, but as the Red Army cut one line of communications after another they were forced into disorderly retreat. Now they are leaving behind them forever the rich farms and orchards of the Ukraine, the coal, iron ore, and manganese on which German industry was to wax fat. We wonder what will be the effect on morale when the German people realize that there is nothing to show for their millions of dead and maimed; that there is going to be no Lebensraum in the East, no future butter to compensate for twelve years of cannon. It is not surprising that the German peace offensive should be reopening. Hitler's only remaining hope is to split the United Nations, and to this end he is probably putting out feelers East and West simultaneously.

THE REPLIES COMING IN FROM GOVERNORS to the President's questions on the Eastland-Rankin bill as passed by Congress are confused and confusing, but they make one thing clear. The anti-Roosevelt brigade is determined to make it as difficult as possible for soldiers to vote in 1944 lest they vote for the President. If the states'-rights cry against the original Green-Lucas bill was genuine, one would expect the Governors to show their sincerity by calling special sessions to permit use of the alternative federal short ballot permitted by the Eastland-Rankin bill. But judging from the replies of many Governors, the silence of others, and the monstrosity passed at Albany under Governor Dewey's direction, Republican and anti-New Deal Governors are not interested in exercising those well-advertised states' rights to insure a soldier vote. Fewer than half a dozen states have given statutory recognition to the federal ballot provided in the bill, and not more than half a dozen more seem prepared to do so. The President has said that if replies from the Governors indicate that fewer soldiers are likely to vote under the Eastland-Rankin bill than under the Soldiers' Vote Act of 1942, he will veto the bill. The act of 1942, for all its shortcomings, at least waives registration and poll-tax provisions on soldier ballots.

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE'S LATEST ATTACK IS directed at Australia. "Rather than carping about the pay of American soldiers," it declared in a recent editorial, "the Australians had better be getting into the Pacific war themselves. They still retain severe restrictions against sending drafted troops beyond the area of Australia's direct interest." Australians naturally have resented this insult, but they may comfort themselves with the reflection that they are in good company. For when it comes to ally-baiting, Colonel McCormick plays no favorites: they are all enemies to him. To anyone who knows anything about Australia's war record the suggestion that it is not yet in the war is so outrageous as to be almost funny. Out of a population of little over 7,000,000 it has 858,960 men in its fighting services -practically two out of every three males between eighteen and forty years. The equivalent figure for this country would be more than 16,000,000 and we are a long way short of that. It is true that drafted men may not be sent outside the Commonwealth unless they volunteer, but no fewer than 86 per cent have volunteered for service anywhere. Up to the end of 1943, the Australian army, excluding the air force and the navy, had suffered 65,890 casualties. An equivalent figure for the American army, on a comparative population basis, would be in excess of 1,200,000. Our actual total through February 23, as reported by Secretary of War Stimson, is 121,458. We are sure that General MacArthur appreciates these facts and would not indorse the Tribune slander. He knows, although the American public is not aware of it, that a large part of the burden of the campaign in the New Guinea jungles has been borne by Australians, who far outnumber the American troops employed there.

REPRESENTATIVE JESSIE SUMNER MIGHT BE annoyed if we called her an isolationist, and, indeed, she is so nearly ready to declare war on Russia that the description is no longer appropriate. But she surely would not object to being called a constitutionalist, since she, in common with her America First friends, is always attacking the President as a betrayer of the Constitution. We would like to suggest, however, that she might be better equipped for her task if she were to study our organic law a little more carefully. For she seems to be ignorant of the fact that under the Constitution the . President is empowered to act as commander-in-chief of the armed forces. This power cannot be usurped by the legislative branch. Nevertheless, Miss Sumner has introduced two bills, one directing a postponement of the invasion of Europe, the other ordering the coordination of all American forces in the war against Japan under the command of General MacArthur. This second measure further provides that no forces shall be withdrawn from this theater without the General's consent and that all men and materials he requests shall be turned over to him. We hardly suppose that Congress will give these bills another thought since they trespass so blatantly on the province of the Executive. But if they ever get to the committee stage we hope Admiral Nimitz is summoned as a witness. We should like to hear his unvarnished and probably unprintable comments on the second bill.

SHORTAGE OF MAN-POWER ON THE EVE OF invasion will doubtless come as a rude shock to those who have opposed national service on the ground that we were over the hump so far as man-power was concerned. It is true that the shortage is concentrated in relatively few areas, chiefly on the West Coast, and that in other parts of the country cutbacks have created a temporary labor surplus. But in the absence of a national-service law the man-power authorities have no means of compelling people to leave the areas of surplus to seek jobs where they are needed. And employers complain of increasing difficulty in persuading women to take war jobs. As the prospect for victory increases, this problem is bound to become more serious. Already tens of thousands of men and women are reported to have quit war work in order to have first chance at what they hope will be a permanent occupation. Local chambers of commerce have tried to revive local consumer-goods industries in order to prevent workers released by cutbacks from seeking war jobs in other cities. Each day's favorable war news brings an intensification of business-as-usual pressure, from both employers and workers. The singleness of mind which made the conversion to war production possible without national service is no longer a dominant factor. Thus we may expect our home-front difficulties to become increasingly acute at a moment when many people have been looking forward to some easing of the pressure.

X

THE LACK OF A CLEAR SELECTIVE-SERVICE policy has been highlighted recently by a series of seemingly conflicting orders regarding the deferment of essential workers in war industries. An order calling for a review of all occupational deferments was followed by another virtually suspending deferments for men under twenty-six but permitting men over that age to remain in their present classifications. At first these orders were interpreted as relaxing somewhat the pressure for the induction of fathers, but later statements by General Hershey indicate that more fathers than ever are needed to fill draft quotas. The most unfortunate aspect of the situation seems to be the disappearance of any effort to dovetail the requirements of war industries with those of the military services. The steel industry has been warned that the army and navy will no longer permit deferments even if it means curtailing war production. Complaints from the West Coast indicate that draft boards are taking highly skilled men, such as aeronautical engineers, who are "completely irreplaceable." Some of the blame for the existing confusion should be placed on the War Manpower Commission for its failure to insist on the training of suitable substitutes for the men now being drafted. The local draft boards should also be held accountable for their failure to draft pre-Pearl Harbor fathers on schedule, thus increasing the pressure on occupational deferments. But the chief culprit in the present crisis is Congress, which light-heartedly sabotaged the War Manpower Commission's efforts to direct pre-Pearl Harbor fathers into the war industries. And as a result of a blanket Congressional exemption for farm labor, some 570,000 young men in the eighteen-to-twenty-six group are kept out of the service at a time when highly skilled men of similar age are being drawn from the war plants,

Stalin and Badoglio

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

STALIN'S recognition of the Badoglio government must mean something or other. The Soviet government does not act inconsequentially; indeed, its severest critics concede—or charge—that its policy is dictated by a degree of calculating self-interest seldom reached by other governments. But just how Russia's interests have been served by its recognition of Badoglio's decrepit regime, nobody seems to know. One thing alone is certain. By his latest diplomatic maneuver Stalin has pleased neither the British-American authorities who set up the Italian puppet government nor the democratic elements who oppose it.

Several writers have suggested that Russia's move may be less important than it looks from this side of the world. For many years the State Department has used recognition as a diplomatic weapon, an instrument of intervention, a way of achieving political ends without committing an overt act. The Soviet Union is more matter of fact. It has consistently maintained relations with any de facto government which wished to have relations with it. Badoglio's government, however feeble, is the only going concern in Italy; it is the only thing one can do business with. And Russia intends to do business in Italy. By establishing diplomatic representation in Italy Stalin will have an independent agency through which he can exercise whatever influence or get whatever information seems to him desirable. The British and Americans obviously resent such premature and unilateral diplomacy. But it is hard to see how they can openly object. Badoglio is their man. Nobody else chose him; nobody else wants him; and they have turned over to him the administration of the entire liberated territory.

But while Stalin's desire to have a say in Italy may be a factor in his recognition of Badoglio, I cannot believe it is the chief one. The whole sequence of events points to other, more serious motives. In the long run Stalin cannot want a reactionary regime in Italy any more than he wants Pétain in France or Franco in Spain. One of the surest guaranties of a new war against Russia would be the establishment of a bloc of clerical-fascist states in Western Europe to serve as the nucleus of an anti-Soviet European policy. Stalin's best bet in Italy is the republican elements represented in the six parties now united against the Badoglio government. To repudiate this political force would be an irresponsible act if no more lay behind it than a desire to play a bigger role in Italy.

European democrats with whom I have talked are puzzled. Most of them feel let down and alarmed. So certain were they that Russia would continue to back popular elements in Europe that the recognition of Badoglio is looked upon as a form of treason. One of the strongest and best of the Italian anti-fascist leaders, Randolfo Pacciardi, put his opinion in writing. He pointed out that the British were now the dominating element in the Mediterranean. Political decisions are still subordinated to military ones, and the military command is in the hands of the British. Stalin's move, he said, might be an attempt to thrust himself into the situation, or it might serve to confirm an agreement made at Teheran. Pacciardi went on:

The Italian anti-Fascists unanimously protested against Churchill's speech of February 22, which recognized as "legitimate" the government of Badoglio and the King. A strike was organized at Naples which was later transformed into a meeting of protest. The day after the meeting Stalin officially recognized the Badoglio government. The slap given to the anti-Fascist parties-Communists included-is evident. Churchill's plan for a "legitimate" government has been reinforced despite American objections. . . . There is no doubt that in the complicated game of international competition the discredited regime of the King and Badoglio threatens to establish itself. Russia's gesture cannot help but create discouragement and disorientation among the Italian democratic forces, which consider the suspension of the monarchy and the creation of a provisional government essential for the rebirth of the nation. The united front of the forces of the left will go on if the Communists are able to continue their anti-monarchical action in Italy in spite of Russia's act. There is no doubt that the Republicans and Socialists will intensify their agitation against the monarchy.

Russia is supremely capable of pursuing two or more apparently conflicting policies at once; this was demonstrated during the period of the pact with Hitler. In the light of all the events since Teheran it seems probable that the Soviet government is again performing a double if not a triple play. It is edging closer into the Italian situation; at the same time it has acknowledged British-American supremacy there, in exchange for Britain's acceptance of Russia's preeminence in the Balkans (this mutual understanding would not rule out Stalin's interest in Italy any more than it prevents Churchill from attempting to graft Peter onto the Tito regime in Yugoslavia); at the same time Russia may well be encouraging, sub terra, a continued popular opposition to Badoglio, or at least be looking forward to his overthrow when northern Italy is reconquered. All these ingredients may be present in the intricate mixture which makes up the foreign policy of the Soviet government, but one fact, stressed by Colonel Pacciardi, emerges above all the speculative possibilities. By recognizing Badoglio Stalin has strengthened the reaction and undermined the anti-Fascist forces; he has done this just at the moment when the resistance to the monarchy most desperately needed reinforcement. If this is the price he had to pay for acceptance of his claims in the Balkans, one can only say that inflation in Italy has reached a new high.

A Guild Victory

REEDOM of the press is one of our most important constitutional guaranties, but it does not place publishers above the law. That truth ought perhaps to be self-evident, but it has once again had to be reaffirmed by the War Labor Board under a ruling to the effect that an order under the War Labor Disputes Act providing for maintenance of union membership as a condition of employment is not an abridgment of freedom of the press in contravention of the First Amendment to the Constitution.

The issue arose in the course of hearings before a WLB panel on a union security-contract dispute between the American Newspaper Guild and the Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, Patriot, and was referred to the full board for decision as a test case. Intervening as interested parties were, among others, the New York Times, the Washington Star, the New York World-Telegram, and Time, Life and Fortune.

In arguing their case, the publishers could not contend that membership maintenance or even a closed shop violated the First Amendment, for dozens of them have signed contracts in the past containing these provisions. They had to rely, therefore, on the theory that union maintenance became a danger to freedom of the press when enforced by order of a government agency. Chairman William H. Davis of the board made short work of this contention in writing the majority opinion, signed by all the public and labor members. He pointed out that the question whether Congress had power to vest in a government agency any control over conditions of newspaper employment was settled by the Supreme Court in 1937 when the Associated Press lost its appeal against a NLRB decision.

Mr. Davis also dealt faithfully with the publishers' claim that a maintenance-of-membership clause "would give the guild power to have a member discharged from his job and so would increase the power of the guild to influence the opinions and professional writings of the editorial employee or reporter." In this connection Mr. Davis quoted the Guild's constitution, which provides that no eligible person can be barred from membership or otherwise penalized because of his convictions "or because of anything he writes for publication." Such a provision, he continued, becomes a standard of judgment for the impartial arbitrator provided for in the board's maintenance-of membership clause. Moreover, as he pointed out, the clause in no way alters a publisher's rights to hire, fire, and wield a blue pencil. However, as an additional safeguard, the board's order declared that any maintenance-of-membership clause in the publishing industry must include a provision giving any member who claims he has been expelled or penalized by the Guild on account of his convictions or writings the absolute right to present his case to the impartial arbitrator.

While concurring in the decision, the labor members of the board in a separate opinion deplored this precaution as both unnecessary and dangerous in tendency. They also attacked sharply the dissenting opinion of the industry members who had suggested that "few Guild members could fail to unconsciously slant their writing regarding their own or another union. The labor members observed tartly that they "would be deeply grateful if many newspaper publishers were as careful to print labor news as impartially as their reporters write it."

There, indeed, they put a finger on the real danger to the First Amendment today—control of the press by a small group of men who are nearly all on one side of the economic fence. Freedom is not lost when newspapermen are protected in their employment, but it can be smothered by a monopoly of news and opinion.

Peace Terms for Japan II. ECONOMIC

In DISCUSSING the military aspects of the peace terms to be imposed upon Japan, we noted that there is little difference of opinion regarding the necessity for military safeguards to minimize the danger of a new drive for world domination in twenty or thirty years. But military precautions will mean little unless they are accompanied by economic and political measures designed to undercut the power of the military clique and redirect Japan's energies along peaceful lines.

For security reasons some experts advocate that Japanese industry either be destroyed altogether or be shipped to China to aid that country in its reconstruction. Others would leave the industrial structure virtually intact, but try to encourage its conversion to the production of civilian goods.

Neither proposal is practicable. The population of Japan cannot possibly be supported by an agricultural and handicraft economy alone. At present at least 60 per cent of Japan's 75,000,000 people are urban, and it is reliably estimated that abolition of Japanese industries would condemn at least a quarter of the population to death by starvation. Before submitting to such terms, the Japanese would undoubtedly fight to the last man.

On the other hand, Japan's present industrial establishment is ill adapted to peace-time requirements. The development of heavy industries to meet war needs has thrown the whole economy badly out of balance. Only if Japan is permitted to retain its naval and military establishment, or is encouraged to play a dominant economic role in Asiatic industrial development, could these heavy industries be maintained. Since either course would play into the hands of the militarists, it is evident that Japan's economy must be subjected to drastic reorganization.

The extent of this reorganization will depend partly on the degree to which Japanese industry is destroyed by bombing. If, as seems not unlikely, all the essential war industries are pulverized before the Japanese government capitulates, no drastic industrial terms will be needed in the peace treaty. Deprived of the sources of cheap raw materials in the empire and of an assured market in the Japanese army and navy, and facing the competition of new Chinese industries in Manchuria, Japan could hardly reconstruct its heavy industries. But if they survive the war relatively intact, steps will have to be taken to force a dismantling of at least part of them. For reasons of security we shall have to demand that all facilities for airplane or warship construction be destroyed. Ultimately, the overexpanded Japanese steel and machine industries will have to be reduced, preferably by control over exports, to a size that can be justified by domestic civilian requirements. These restrictions might, however, be imposed gradually. For the first two years, while Japanese industry is in process of conversion, some plants might be used to provide China with machinery, rails, and transport equipment as reparation for the destruction inflicted by the Japanese armies, And as unused factories are closed down, their facilities, instead of being destroyed, might be shipped to China, the Philippines, and the East Indies to speed up the industrialization of those countries. Enough heavy industry should be left to supply an expanding consumer-goods industry.

Although some such readjustment in Japanese industry is essential to the development of a sound peace economy in Japan, more positive economic measures will be needed to encourage the growth of democratic forces inside the country. There may be a fairly extended period in which the United Nations will have to give food and other assistance to the victims of this forced reconversion. But the main emphasis of our policies must be upon helping the Japanese to develop a welfare economy in place of their present war economy. They must be given an opportunity to improve their living standards so as to remove the feeling that they are being oppressed by the Western powers. This will necessitate some concessions on our part. If, as is generally agreed, the Japanese Empire is dissolved, steps must be taken to see that Japan is guaranteed full access to the raw materials it needs for its consumer-goods industries. And it must be assured a market for its products so that it may obtain foreign exchange with which to buy necessary supplies from abroad. This means that many of the pre-war laws discriminating against Japanese consumer products must be repealed.

Without doubt there will be complaints that cheap Japanese labor will offer unfair competition. These can be silenced, however, if a provision is inserted in the peace treaty compelling Japanese industrialists to accept minimum standards of wages, hours, working conditions, and guaranties of the rights of collective bargaining as drawn up by the International Labor Organization. Such a requirement would tend to break down the rigid class structure of Japan, thus undermining the peculiarly unhealthy conditions which led to the rise of Japanese imperialism. And by increasing working-class purchasing power it should strengthen the democratic element in the country and bring to the pinched masses more prosperity than militarism has ever provided.

Millionaires' Beveridge Plan

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 17

THIS Much Gained: The March issue of the National City Bank's excellent monthly letter makes an important observation in discussing the Baruch-Hancock report on War and Post-War Adjustment Policies and the Senate's George committee report on Post-War Economic Policy and Planning. The bank points out that nothing comparable to these studies was prepared during or after the First World War. "If there had been," the bank says, "it is likely that the wide swings in production, employment, and prices between 1919 and 1922 might have been moderated."

The Baruch-Hancock report reflects (1) the hold that the idea of planning has taken on the entire community and (2) the determination of Wall Street and big business to do the planning. Now that the National Resources Planning Board has been safely interred and largely forgotten, the old campaign to disparage planning has died out, and the right wing in both Congress and the Executive branch has taken over the job.

Planning Still Limited. Planning, as envisaged by big business, is still of the most elementary sort, and covers only the job of winding up the economic side of the war. Big business would provide an umbrella in the transition from war to peace but isn't prepared to make any but the most trivial repairs in the leaky roof of our peace-time economy. "With peace . . ," the report says, "each has the right to make what he pleases. Governmental direction and aid disappear. The markets become free"; that is, free from governmental but not from private restriction.

The Baruch-Hancock report plans first for the difficult but relatively minor job of contract termination. While it is very important not to bog business men down in red tape and to pay them as quickly as possible, it would also seem important to protect the government from inflated claims. The report approaches this problem from the business side. It says that audit of claims by the Comptroller General would "quibble the nation into a panic." The report would limit the Comptroller General's review powers to cases of fraud. Fraud is a narrow legal concept, and review of such cases is inadequate protection in dealing with the complex accounting items involved in warcontract claims. This loose arrangement, plus the 6 per cent profit allowed on uncompleted work and the 2 per cent on unprocessed inventory (material on which no work at all has been done), would seem to open the door to millions in extra and undeserved profits.

Although at one point the report proposes direct payments to subcontractors at the discretion of procurement agencies, the principal procedure it recommends would seem to leave the big prime contractors "free to make their own settlements with subcontractors." The payment of subcontractors is not an easy problem, but a report reflecting the point of view of small rather than big business would have tried to work out ways to protect the subcontractor and speed payment to him.

Reconversion. Considering the deflated condition of the machine-tool industry, the recommendation that manufacturers be allowed in advance to obtain the tools: needed for reconversion would seem to be sound. Baruch would place great power in the hands of the Industry Advisory Committees, in reconversion as in the disposal of surplus property. These committees have not been too representative in the past. The report suggests that the "advice" of the Smaller War Plants Corporation "should be drawn upon to make certain that small business is effectively represented on the Industry Advisory Committees." This pious injunction is likely to be ignored. Why not give the Smaller War Plants Corporation power to nominate small-business representatives to every Business Advisory Committee? One of the most important and dangerous recommendations in the report is that wartime suspension of the anti-trust laws be extended to the reconversion period to protect these committees. If they meet to plan the expansion of production, no such protection is needed; the anti-trust laws only forbid restraint of trade. If they meet to plan the restriction of production, no such protection should be granted.

The Heart of the Report. I leave to more trusting souls the task of dwelling on the social demagogy in the report, on what the boys in the poolroom would call its rich coating of applesauce, and come now to the heart of it, the disposal of surplus property.

The background of the problem is this: The New Deal has provided no safeguards against a post-war depression; social insurance won't do here what it failed to do in Britain and Germany. War-time spending has concealed our fundamental economic difficulties, and war-time technological progress has intensified them by enormously increasing the productivity of labor. The basic change is the huge expansion of productive plant and the fact that most of this is government-owned. In a sane production-for-use economy this increased plant would automatically raise living standards to unprecedented levels. In a sensible capitalist economy, actually concerned with the preservation of free enterprise, government-owned plants would be used as competitive market, a task two generations of trust-busting has been unable to accomplish.

The Baruch-Hancock recommendations, the executive order setting up the Surplus War Property Policy Board, and the man chosen as Surplus War Property Administrator are a triple-plated guaranty that no such use will be made of government plants. Will Clayton, the man picked as administrator, is an old associate of Jesse Jones, an international operator in cotton, an ex-Liberty Leaguer. The War Property Board, made up of top officials, has only advisory power under the executive order, and the Baruch-Hancock report firmly closes the door on any possible yardstick use of government plants. Jesse Jones emerges as the most important figure in the setup. His lieutenant is the administrator; Jones himself sits on the policy board; and the actual disposal of government plants is delegated to the RFC.

The speed with which the Baruch-Hancock report was released, and implemented by executive orders and appointments, all within the space of a single week-end, had the earmarks of a kind of right-wing economic coup to head off action by Congress on the Murray-George bill for an Office of Economic Demobilization. There isn't much to choose between Baruch and George, but the bill would provide a little more protection for the public interest. Under the bill the Attorney General would have some actual power to check monopolistic disposal of plants; aircraft, synthetic-rubber, aluminum, and magnesium plants would be placed in a special category on which action would await further discussion in Congress; no surplus property could be destroyed without a two-thirds' vote of the proposed seven-man National Demobilization Board. The George report, bad as it is, calls for consultation with labor and agriculture as well as with business in the handling of all demobilization problems; neither has a place in the Baruch-Hancock recommendations.

The Work Director. The biggest phony in this setup is the office of Work Director. This is supposed to be the place where the returning soldier "can go in dignity and where he can be told of his rights and how he can get them." The Work Director is supposed to be a man "of proven executive capacity . . . business sagacity . . .

character . . . great courage." I can see no resemblance whatsoever between this portrait and the man chosen. Brigadier General F. T. Hines is a mediocre reactionary, a hangover from the Coolidge-Hoover era, and notorious in Washington for his opposition to work relief. His appointment makes the job a kind of cruel joke.

T IS WORTH RECORDING that an extremely liberal constitution for the German republic has passed its second reading in the Weimar Assembly; that a coalition Cabinet of seven Socialists, three Democrats, and three Centrists has been elected; that Herr Ebert, almost without opposition, has been chosen President.—March 1, 1919.

FROM THE RHINE to the Yellow River the world is in a state of unrest and revolution. The next step in the German development none can tell. Russia is a vast experiment station for half a hundred new economic and social undertakings. From the Caucasus and Central Asia we hear reports of violent outbreaks. The Emir of Afghanistan has just been murdered. India, which is kept hidden from our curious gaze by the high defensive wall of a strict censorship, suffers from vast strikes, the first sign of a concerted nationalistic movement, while China is maintaining a perilous balance between Japanese aggression and revolutionary separatism.—March 8, 1919.

THE DISQUIETING NEWS comes from Paris that the statesmen there assembled have definitely resolved to crush Bolshevism in Russia by force of arms. . . . Have they not yet discovered that the intervention of last August in Russia only strengthened the Soviet authority?—March 8, 1919.

THE THIRTY-SEVEN SENATORS who signed the Lodge resolution against the League of Nations, we now learn, are not diehard opponents of any League, and the resolution was a political trick wittingly turned to embarrass the President and to misrepresent the nation before European eyes. . . The Republicans probably hope that by the time elections come around such despicable machinations will be forgotten.—March 15, 1919.

ZEALOUS PATRIOTS among our lawmakers are attempting now in ten or twelve states to enact legislation, first, to prohibit the use of any foreign language in elementary grades, and, second, to bring all parochial and private schools under the jurisdiction of the state in order to enforce the first ruling.—March 22, 1919.

THE RECORDS OF UNEMPLOYMENT in America are mounting steadily. We are passing today through the initial stages of a process of readjustment which by the middle of the summer inevitably will develop into a serious situation. # World War III Ahead?

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

HERE is little connection between the ideals of liberal internationalists and the sorry realities of the contemporary international scene. While the idealists still hope for some kind of world government, or at least for an international police force under a world federation, the real issue is whether the great powers, now united in conflict, can reach enough agreement with each other to avoid new rivalries out of which a new war will inevitably be bred. Despite the Moscow and Teheran conferences, signs multiply that no great advance has been taken toward a genuine system of mutual security. If no basic accord is reached, the failure will be obscured by an agreement to disagree. The obvious form of such an agreement would be the division of Europe and Asia into "spheres of influence," which would probably be known as "regional federations" and which would represent the outer ramparts of the schemes of unilateral defense of the various great powers.

Obviously such a solution of the problem confronting the nations of the world is only a palliative for the disease of international anarchy. By defining the "spheres" in which each of the powers would undertake not to poach on the preserves of the others, the great powers would avoid immediate conflict; but ultimate conflict would not long be postponed. Such an arrangement would certainly not solve the problem of the "no man's land" lying between the various spheres of influence, in which each of the powers would seek to extend its influence. No partitioning of Europe, for instance, would solve the problem of either France's or Germany's relation to the total structure of Europe. The destruction of Germany, offered by charlatans and some misguided "idealists" as a solution for the problem of world security, might accentuate the problem, by increasing the economic chaos of Europe. Furthermore, the dismembered portions of Germany would become fair sport for rival powers, each of which would seek to bring some portion of the vanquished nation under its dominion. (The recent protest of the London Times against rumored plans for the dismemberment of Germany would lead one to suspect that Britain at least is opposed to such a policy.) If the world remains unorganized, there is even the possibility that the most ruthless plans of destruction will not be carried out, for a shrewd vanquished nation might well escape its fate by courting one of the victors and playing it off against the others. Ruthlessness toward the vanquished can no more give us security than vindictiveness toward bandits and pirates can achieve ordered government in those regions of land and sea where lack of civil authority invites lawless men to flourish.

The world, in short, needs order. Yet there is little prospect of a fully developed system of constitutional order—of a world government or even of a fully elaborated federation of the world. The great powers, the nucleus of a global alliance which will win a global war and thereby become the embryo of a world community, show no inclination toward any delegation of their authority to a world government. At the moment, even the prospects for something much more modest are not too bright. This more modest something would be a partner-ship in which a system of genuine mutual security would overcome the fears by which allies are turned into potential foes, each covertly preparing for the next war by seeking strategic advantages against the others.

Though not bright, the prospect of such a partner-ship still belongs to the realm of political possibilities; the prospect of a world government is quite beyond that realm. For world government requires the explicit abridgment of sovereignty and the creation of a universal political authority by a sheer act of will and reason. The coalescence of new and larger human communities usually does not take place in such explicit terms. The alternative requires only the implicit abridgment of sovereignty through the creation of agencies for the fulfilment of common tasks, and through mutual commitments; the smaller powers would necessarily be drawn into the general agreements because these agreements would not be possible without their cooperation.

The possibility of a global alliance of the big powers, containing quasi-constitutional checks and security for the smaller powers, rests at least on some historical foundation. Nations are fighting in a common cause, and they have made commitments in conducting the struggle. They cannot even liquidate the war without participating in various relief and rehabilitation agencies, though it must be observed that it is not yet at all certain that there will be common armies of occupation. The defeat of a common foe does of course destroy a part of the force of cohesion. But, on the other hand, there are a historical partnership and an organic coalescence of power upon which new political structures can be built if the fear of anarchy can, to some degree, supplant fear of a concrete foe. It is generally understood that the great powers are adverse to the organization of Europe because they fear that European unity would ultimately result in the hegemony of Germany upon the Continent. Yet the danger of a powerful Germany grew in an unorganized Continent, and will grow again if there is no greater unity between the powers than is now contemplated.

The justifications which some liberals find in the Russian counter-measures, and the support of the conservatives for our counter-measures are both beside the point. Both sides may be justified, and it would be difficult to determine what overt action or attitude initiated the vicious circle. The important point is that if we do not break through the circle, a third world war cannot be avoided. Neither we nor Russia will finally tolerate the domination of Europe by the other side.

The most significant mark of a real agreement among the great powers as distinct from a bogus agreement to disagree will be its provision for the reorganization of Europe and Asia. The reorganizations of Europe and of Asia cannot proceed independently of each other since the effective power is held today by three, possibly four, great powers, none of which, except China, is either purely European or purely Asiatic. Continental federations must therefore stand under the aegis of the great powers. But they must be achieved, because without them no stable agreement between the great powers is conceivable. The logic of world events thus points to a global alliance rather than a purely constitutional world order, but to constitutional commitments on the second, that is, continental level of organization.

Consider the case of Europe. We are afraid, not without reason, that Russia may seek to dominate the Continent. Russia is afraid, not without justification, that we are seeking to dominate the Continent against it. The impulse to domination is in each case partly a defensive strategy against the supposed or real peril of domination by the other side. This is precisely the kind of vicious circle of fears from which wars arise. It must be observed that if this game is going to be played, Russia has more cards than we and is more likely to win. But such success or failure is also irrelevant to the main issue. The success of either Russia or the Western powers upon the Continent would not prevent another world war. The war would in fact break out before the complete triumph of one party or the other and would be prompted by the desire of the losing side to frustrate the triumph.

Liberals have concentrated their criticism on the flitations with reactionary forces carried on by our own State Department and the Churchill government. They have been quite right in pointing to the catastrophic effects of this policy, both in the dismay and confusion it has brought to the democratic forces of the Continent and in its effect upon our relations with Russia. But they have not emphasized sufficiently that the first prerequisite of a truly democratic policy is an over-all agreement with Russia, which can quite obviously not be achieved without a total plan for the democratic reorganization of Europe. If such an agreement is not reached, the futile effort to reorganize Europe through reactionary, fascist, and semi-fascist forces will continue, no matter how strongly criticized. It will continue because the fear of Russia's domination of the Continent will prompt and seem to justify these measures. Only an agreement which will overcome these mutual fears will make it possible to give the democratic forces in Europe genuine support and such an agreement can be successful only if support of the democratic forces is made integral to a plan for the reorganization and unification of the Continent.

Any plan for the reorganization of Europe must include provisions for a total reorganization of its economic life in which the irrelevancies of national tariffs will be overcome and in which a common credit and money policy will facilitate the free flow of goods. The political unity of Europe will, furthermore, facilitate disposition of the difficult problems arising from the Nazi expropriation of German, French, and other property. The property system of Europe has gone through the "meatchopper" of a total war, and there is no possibility of restoring it to a semblance of the past or in conformity with the British and American property system. Any effort to do so would mean either the support of reactionary political movements in the hope that they would protect "liberal" economic reorganization or the formation of a cartel system which would make the Continent a colony of the hegemonic powers. Either course would force the masses of the Continent to the side of Russia, even though their hope of genuine emancipation through Russia may be quite illusory.

On the other hand, bitter experience has taught us how the peril of totalitarianism lurks in a program of complete socialization. There is a possibility of working out a synthesis between socialized and individual property on the Continent which might well make a creative contribution to the solution of the property problem in the whole world. Furthermore, such a synthesis could become an instrument of reconciliation between Russia and the West and thus transform Europe, economically as well as politically, into a meeting ground, rather than a battle ground, of rival powers.

Any such plan would be good for the Continent because it would offer it economic order rather than chaos. But it would not be adopted primarily for that reason; the hegemonic powers, even though they call themselves the "peace-loving nations," are not as magnainmous as that. If adopted at all it will be because the great powers can solve their mutual problems only upon that basis. The case of Asia is similar, though in some respects it is more complex and less immediately urgent.

The reorganization of Europe and Asia can only take place under the aegis of the great powers, but it cannot take place at all without giving the smaller powers constitutional rights and authority within the total framework of the agreements. It is at this point that constitutional justice must be introduced into the system of global alliance. The possibility of its being introduced lies not so much in any scruples the great powers may have about misuse of their strength as in their inability to achieve any order in the continental realms which lie between them without drawing the smaller nations into the system of agreements.

While self-interest places such agreements within the realm of political possibility, they are not in the realm of probability for the simple reason that the so-called democratic nations are still dominated by groups which seek the preservation and extension of their economic power—the more desperately because they have an uneasy feeling that it is doomed. The opposition of these forces to an organized and partly socialized Europe may be too stubborn and blind and also too powerful to be overcome in time. But there is a bare chance that it can be overcome because the alternative policies presented by the opposition so obviously lead to another war. If this opposition is to be defeated, however, the democratic forces in Britain and America must be armed with a policy which is in the realm of political possibility. Democratic energy must not be dissipated by consideration of abstract plans which belong to the millennium.

It must be observed in conclusion that however vexatious may be the problems arising from the plans of various nations for strategic security, they are subordinate to the main issue. Russia's desire for a strong strategic frontier, Britain's hope of drawing some of the Low Countries into its Commonwealth system, and America's interest in a big navy and in naval and aerial bases are all in the same category. It is inevitable that all nations should seek for some provisional unilateral security. But if there is no over-all agreement among them, their plans will turn into schemes for merely unilateral security.

All of them must become, increasingly, counsels of despair, because they are plans for the relative security of this or that nation in the event of another war. None of them will be plans for the security of the world against the peril of war.

The Future of Japan's Islands

BY WILLARD PRICE

OW that we have begun to occupy Japanese-mandated islands, the question of their future becomes a matter for urgent consideration. The vast archipelago of Micronesia, comprising the 1,400 islands of the Marshalls, Carolines, and Marianas, is, as we have painfully learned, the key to the western Pacific. With it Japan unlocked the treasures of the Indies and the Philippines. It made possible the sneak attack on Pearl Harbor and the southward advance toward Australia. Without it Japan would hardly have dared to dream of conquering America.

The Cairo conference made it clear that Micronesia would not be returned to Japan. Who, then, is to hold this pivotal position, which controls the islands of the Pacific and the shores of Asia? Although the United States is pledged to a peace of "no annexations," the assumption is being made in influential quarters that we shall take over Micronesia as a matter of course. Hugh Byas, former New York Times Tokyo correspondent, writes, for instance: "The mandate now held by Japan should be summarily transferred to the United States."

While greatly respecting the opinions of this veteran newspaperman, I would suggest that we have no warrant to deal "summarily" with peaceful and law-abiding populations, no matter how small. They cannot be passed about as one would pass the butter. True, they have been. Neither the Spaniards, the Germans, nor the Japanese consulted the natives before seizing their lands. The United States should be the nation to stop such violation of ordinary human rights. Nothing would do more to allay the suspicions of Asiatics, who, prompted by Japan, fear that America and Britain mean to extend their imperialism over all Asia.

Unlimited self-determination is, of course, impossible. If each island of two or three thousand people were to constitute its own government we should have a myriad sovereign nations in the Pacific: the result—chaos and constant war. The Micronesian is perhaps a little more advanced than we in his social thinking. He realizes the inadvisability of self-government if by that is meant separate rule for each island or even each small group. During my visit to the islands, managed with difficulty in the days when Japan was preparing them for their role in the war to come, I asked many chiefs about this. Their views were pretty well summed up in the opinion of a Ponape chief: "When we ruled ourselves, every chief was at war with every other. It is better to have some higher authority."

A plebiscite might be held to learn the desire of the Micronesians as to what that higher authority should be. At the time of the Versailles conference an American missionary who had served in the Marshalls stated his belief that if a plebiscite were taken, the people of the Marshall and Caroline Islands would ask to be placed under American administration.

That may be the solution of the problem. It would not be entirely satisfactory. The United States cannot afford the taint of imperialism if it is to get on well with Asia in the post-war era and avert a world-destroying color war. Asiatics would suspect that the plebiscite had been "fixed." Dissenting islanders might rise in rebellion, as in the Philippines in 1898, and we should have to use American troops to put them down.

Moreover, there is no warrant for regarding the western Pacific as an American ocean. Micronesia is four thousand miles from our West Coast. It is much closer to China, to a colonial Holland more important than Holland itself, to French Indo-China, and to the soon-tobe-independent Philippines, not to mention British possessions and Australian mandates in the southwest Pacific. In the event of war it is the strategic center of the western Pacific.

Inevitably the fate of Micronesia is of international concern. Why should it not be internationally controlled as a benefit to all and threat to none? During the interim between the capture of the archipelago and the end of the war Micronesia will be governed under the authority of the United Nations. What could be more natural at the peace conference than the transference of that authority to whatever world organization may then be established? Japan would not immediately be a member of such world council and would therefore have no part in the management of the manadate. Only after a long period of probation would Japan be admitted to the association of nations and share in its responsibilities.

Whether the island mandate is held by one nation or by all, the worrisome question arises: What is to be done with the Japanese? There are now 100,000 of them in the mandated islands as against only 40,000 natives. And the high birth rate of the Japanese means that, even if no more were admitted, the Japanese population in the islands would steadily and swiftly increase. We know enough about the Japanese to be sure that they would try to rule any land in which they were numerically predominant. Japan would champion its colonists. The situation would invite a new war.

The obvious remedy may seem drastic, but it is probably unavoidable if there is to be any chance of enduring peace in the Pacific. Every Japanese person—man, woman, and child—in Micronesia should be sent back to Japan. This is not so colossal an undertaking as it might at first seem. The movement of 100,000 persons to Japan would not compare for a moment with the migration in 1922-24 of 1,350,000 Greeks from Asia Minor to Macedonia and Thrace. That dislocation, painful enough at the time, has resulted in great satisfaction to both Turkey and Greece.

The argument that Japan is too crowded to accommodate these nationals is not valid. One hundred thousand Japanese will hardly begin to take the place of the three million men Japan is estimated to have lost in war since 1937. In a population of seventy-five million so small a number as one hundred thousand can be easily absorbed.

While the Japanese have complained of lack of space, they have declined to populate their own island of Hokkaido. It is north of the main island of Honshu and a bit cool—rather like Wyoming. It does not have the rather precious miniature beauty of the Honshu landscape. The Japanese, who like small things, do not feel at home there. But it is a richly fertile country of broad plains suited to large-scale agriculture. It has an area of thirty thousand square miles, a population of only two and a half million, and room, according to Japanese authorities themselves, for twenty million.

How should the brown men of the islands be governed after the Japanese regime is finished? We should not be too proud to learn from our enemies. The Japanese system of administration, which is very similar to that set up in the other Pacific mandates, has worked pretty well. It is to govern the natives through their own kings, whom the people respect and obey as persons with a hereditary right to rule. The Japanese designate the kings as soncho, or district heads, and pay them a salary.

The structure of the Japanese South Seas government is, in brief, as follows. At the base are the natives, with a degree of self-government through their own kings or soncho, under a Japanese police officer. The entire mandated area is divided into six "Branch Bureaus," each supervising a group of islands. The six governors of the Branch Bureaus are responsible to the Governor General of the South Seas Bureau, who is stationed at Palau. And the South Seas Bureau, in turn, is superintended by the Minister of Greater East Asia in Tokyo.

The new administration might well follow a similar pattern. The natives should be allowed to keep their kings. Some kind of administrative grouping is almost essential because of the wide separation of the islands and the difficulty of communication. If the control is international, the governors of the different divisions should be chosen regardless of nationality: British, American, Australian, New Zealand, Canadian, Chinese, French, Russian. Micronesians themselves should certainly be eligible for this position. The only criterion should be merit and ability to confer with colleagues in a common language. An over-all governor general might be appointed for a definite period by the United Nations or whatever world association may take its place.

The question of a common language might be raised at this point. To suggest that this should be English is to risk charges of "linguistic imperialism." We should respect the native culture, many people will argue, and encourage the Kanakas to use their own language.

There is, however, no Kanaka language. Or, rather, there is a different language for the Kanakas of every island. Saipan cannot understand Yap; nor Yap, Palau; nor Palau, Truk; nor Truk, Ponape; nor Ponape, Kusaie; nor Kusaie, Jaluit. Democratic unity is of course impossible with such diversity of tongues. The printed word is denied to islanders for the simple reason that it would not pay a publisher to print the world's literature in a language read by only two or three thousand people. Mental expansion is difficult in a limited language. There are only 6,000 words in the Palau tongue, 3,000 in Truk, 1,000 in Yap; there are 600,000 in English.

But, assuming that the schools of the Pacific teach the islanders a common language, why should it be English? Why not Japanese, Chinese, or Malay?

Malay is not a great world language. Chinese is, but it comes in nine different dialects and is very difficult to learn. It would draw the Pacific toward China but would cut it off linguistically from the rest of the world. Japanese is also a very difficult and exceedingly provincial language. The English language is spoken by 260,000,000 people. It is preeminently the language of world communication, and as Christopher Hollis has said, it "is the language, far more than any other, in which the story of freedom is told." That is of importance if we look forward to ultimate democracy in the Pacific.

And in the far future the Micronesian islands may emerge from mandate status into a complete democratic self-government, perhaps in conjunction with other island groups of the Pacific. This cannot happen now, not because the native is an ignorant savage—he is not, and his knowledge of democratic ways is surprising—but because the islands are so isolated from one another. Yap and Truk are more distinct than the United States and Russia. A Chamorro family in Saipan talked to me about Broadway in New York and Piccadilly in London but could tell me nothing about the Marshalls.

This situation will change in time. The sea separates islands; the air will unite them. The impetus given to aviation by the war, the building of airfields on the islands. the suitability of lagoons as landing places for seaplanes, all forecast the day when every chief or well-to-do copra farmer will have his plane. Instead of waiting a month for a boat from Truk to Yap and then taking four days for the trip, he may get off at any time and make the trip in two hours. What seems fanciful now will be commonplace in fifty years. Daily postal service between the islands will integrate them, and the improvement of the radio and the radio-telephone will have the same effect. A newspaper, either printed in one place and distributed through the entire area by plane or transmitted page by page by wire photo and printed locally, would help all the diversified peoples of the Pacific to have the same information every morning. And it is only when people begin to think together that they will act together.

Hendrik van Loon

[Last week Hendrik van Loon died at his home in Old Greenwich, Connecticut. Mr. van Loon was one of the most generous and most talented of The Nation's friends, and we read with satisfaction all the warm appreciations of his personality and his work. Reading them, we recalled the very earliest days of The Nation's separate existence, after Mr. Villard sold the New-York Evening Post in 1918, when Hendrik van Loon wrote unsigned contributions to the column headed In the Driftway, and the later days when be contributed occasional articles and many funny pointed drawings. And we decided that the best small tribute we could pay our old friend would be the publication this week of a few reminiscent examples of his versatile talent. We present them berewith.—EUTORS THE NATION.

THE Drifter looked out of the window across the dreary court. It was raining. In many of the offices the electric light was burning and busy girls were hammering away at their machines. The whole building was buying and sell-

He stopped before a door, took off his coat, and put his hat on the window-sill. Then he began to scrape. One by one the gilded letters telling the curious that this was the private entrance to So and So's, who dealt in This and That, were quickly removed, the glass was washed, the door made ready for further pictorial operations. The little man took a stick in his left hand. He worked very fast, and the letters of the new occupant grew with astonishing rapidity. Within half an hour there they stood neatly done in black and gold upon the gray background of the glass panel:

In the midst of steel and automobiles and soap and oils and skins and the concrete mechanism of our modern world of trade and business a miracle had happened. A new nation had been born. Some day that door will be in the museum at Prague, and from all parts of Bohemia people will travel to see the handiwork of the little old man with his pot of paint.—IN THE DRIFTWAY, December 7, 1918.

At last a classical word has reached the Drifter's ear from Paris. Switzerland, that house of mercy to the sick and weary of all the world, which fed the Allied prisoners from its own meager larder, which served as letter carrier extraordinary to all prisoners of war and performed a thousand unrecognized services, maintained an army of half a million to maintain rigorously the "no-trespassing" edict against all neighbors. During the Armistice it was necessary for the President of the Swiss Republic to visit Paris, on which occasion M. Ador called upon M. Clemenceau. The unsophisticated Drifter would have looked for an appreciation of Gallic flavor, but quadrilateral internationalism is not Gallic, nor is it grateful. The Tiger's greeting to his Swiss confrère was typical of the Allied attitude toward the neutral. "M. le Président," he remarked, "votre neutralité m'a embêté." It "made him tired." The words are veritably Napoleonic. They will be contradicted, but they will live.—July 5, 1919.

Try and imagine the setting of the stage for this gigantic piece of hokum. On the one hand we have a candidate who has as much personality as last year's time-table. On the other hand we have the most powerful and the richest and the most glorious and the grandest country in the world. And a small piece of this nation, in freedom conceived, is going to name a man for whom not one-third of one per cent of the sum total of the delegates feel one-third of one per cent of personal liking or admiration or even respect. And five months from now their henchmen just as deliberately are going to try to vote this same candidate back into the White House for four years more of mush and maple sugar.—THE NORDIC JUBILEE, June 25, 1924.

THE MARCH 17 ISSUE of Yank, the army magazine, publishes letters on the soldier-vote controversy by fifty-seven soldiers. Fifty-six want a federal ballot; one wants no ballot at all; none are interested in states' rights.

THE UNITED STATES Chamber of Commerce approves of American participation in the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration—on this condition: "Care should be taken that, under the heading of rehabilitation, commitments for post-war reconstruction are not authorized."

OPPOSITION to a national-service act is expressed by the Worth Street Forecast, an organ of the cotton-textile business, in these terms: "History will record the guileless candor of native-born Americans predominantly Anglo-Saxon developing a land inordinately rich in resources and extending the helping hand to myriad others to whom freedom was unthinkable and unworkable. These hordes have spawned on the American shores, mistaking liberty under law for license and eventually destroying the law itself."

PRINTERS' INK, an advertising magazine, reports that a group of grocers and tobacco distributors, "hitherto highly articulate and bitter against OPA," has recommended that Congress "pass legislation continuing OPA as an after-thewar agency to establish minimum prices below which merchandise could not be sold."

FESTUNG EUROPA: They tell it in Norway: The Nazi mayor of Asker had a young pig of which he was extremely fond. He named him Truls, a good Norwegian name. He even resorted to the black market to get the best of feed for the animal. But one morning shortly before Christmas the pig was missing. There were blood stains on the snow, and tacked to the pigsty was a placard bearing a drawing of the iron cross with which German soldiers' graves are marked and this inscription: "TRULS. 12/17/43. He Fell in the Fight Against Bolshevism."

I must request space for a brief reply to Mr. Wolman's articles in the World-Telegram of February 7, ¶ and 9, which label THE PROTESTANT, its Textbook Commission to Eliminate Anti-Semitic Statements in American Textbooks, and myself, ■ being "anti-Jewish."

Mr. Wollman charges me with being anti-Semitic because I attack the American Jewish Committee and the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

Finally Mr. Wolman "proves" that I am an "apologist for Communism" because I demanded a diplomatic break with Spain and a resocation of the deportation order against Harry Bridges. I am anti-Catholic, according to Mr. Woltman, because I called Archbishop Spellman "the dainty servant of Vatican intrigue."

In his smear attack on myself and the organization I represent Mr. Woltman goes to great pains to areate the impression that by my criticism of the American Jewish Committee and the National Conference of Christians and Jews I am guilty of anti-Semitism. But Mr. Woltman very carefully omits to mention the reason for my attack against those bodies.

Watch Mexico

BY FRANK JELLINEK

Mexico City, March 1 HE Bolivian coup and the confusion surrounding its origins made the Mexican government acutely aware that similar dangers threaten Mexico. While there was no concrete evidence that the agents of the Berlin-Madrid-Buenos Aires axis were directly interfering in Mexican affairs, certain elements common to nearly all Latin American countries were undoubtedly at work, and President Manuel Avila Camacho took immediate action to forestall a crisis. By a series of moves he gave warning to the forces of the right that further infiltration would not be tolerated, and that ambitious politicians would be playing with fire if they tried to carry his own appeasement policies too far. He did not move to the left; he merely played off the left against a right offensive.

The extraordinary indirection of Camacho's defensive strategy was fairly typical of his whole policy, which is based fundamentally upon the economic rather than the political situation in Mexico. Mexico is undergoing an inflation that is not only bringing misery to large parts of the population but creating tremendous instability in the comparatively limited circle of its beneficiaries. Exports of raw materials are at the highest peak in history, but imports are limited mainly to cash, since war requirements of the United States have cut off the influx of machinery, replacements, and consumer goods. The imported cash is not used for productive investment but for speculation or hoarding. Hoarding is, in fact, officially encouraged by the free sale of gold. But efforts to reduce the money in circulation or to distribute it more widely have had little success. A 220,000,000-peso internal loan was taken up chiefly by the banks and big business houses; there has been no attempt to sell war bonds to the general public.

Despite a Presidential decree ordering wage increases ranging from 50 per cent for a weekly wage of 7 pesos to 12 per cent for the large wage of 84 pesos, the disparity between wages and prices widens constantly, and actual starvation is averted only because most Mexican families have a little land for subsistence farming. A labor shortage in certain semi-skilled trades, such as building, has created a small group of comparatively prosperous artisans, but their work is so inefficient that normal times must inevitably bring their downfall. They then will become excellent fascist material.

In a period of fourteen months the Ministry of Economy evolved no fewer than twenty-eight schemes to control prices. Each was followed by a new rise. The total increase cannot be accurately stated owing to fluctuations in different districts and the operations of the black market, but it is estimated to be 28 per cent since 1940.

Politically, the difficulties of control are almost insuperable. The question was never squarely faced by Cárdenas, even when he had the means of enforcement. Now, any broad program would arouse the opposition of the war profiteers, who are rapidly becoming conscious of their status as a new native bourgeoisie. A scheme of control based on an extension of the Cárdenas reforms and a clean-up of the administrative machinery would drive the profiteers, the government fears, to join those who plot the overthrow of the democratic structure.

The forces of the left have been entirely ineffective in combating the present situation. Their initial mistake was to characterize Avila Camacho as "the continuer of the Mexican Revolution." When the war came in May, 1942, the labor unions declared for a policy of national unity. But all attempts to obtain real cooperation, such as labor-management committees, a national production board, even a unified labor central, collapsed. Protests by left leaders against abuses, corruption, and intolerable living standards were at once held against them as violations of their own pledge to effect unity. Defeatism, opportunism, and open corruption attacked large sections of the laboring masses, for whom the organized movement had accomplished practically nothing. The disappointed workers began to turn against the government itself. Labor gangsters made a glorious comeback amid the cheers of the reactionary press.

Cárdenism, however, remains a latent force, though Cárdenas himself has kept his pledge not to intervene in politics and has occupied himself with reorganizing the army. It is doubtful whether the majors and the colonels share his political views. But the army still plays a decisive role in Mexican politics: no politician could maintain himself in power if the army were against him.

There has been a good deal of talk about a Mexican expeditionary force. Avila Camacho has said that one will be sent if the United Nations ask for it, but that it would prefer to fight under its own flag and as an army of liberation, perhaps in the Philippines. If the force is sent, it will mean that the government has become strong enough to disregard the right's continuing utterance of non-interventionist slogans.

The Sinarchists, the most outspoken group of the opposition, have recently discovered a huge red plot to seize power. It is headed, they say, by Cárdenas, Vicente Lombardo Toledano, president of the Latin American Federation of Labor (CTAL), Soviet Ambassador Constantin A. Oumansky, the mild Friends of the Soviet Union, and the Protestant missionaries. To accuse your enemies of an ambition to do something you want to do yourself is an old fascist trick—the "preventiverising" propaganda was used by Franco in Spain. It would suit the right very well to see Cárdenas provoked into breaking his pledge. His movement would be called a "Communist rising," and any effort the right might make to quell it would be regarded with far less skepticism in Washington than was the Bolivian coup.

There is, of course, no question of Mexico backing out of the war, though widespread enthusiasm for it is not at present a dominating emotion. Civilian war activities have more or less stopped. There are no more blackouts or mass voluntary drills, no sale of war bonds, no rationing. No large proportion of the people actually favor Hitler or Franco now, because no one wants to be on the losing side, but it is not uncommon to hear a business man admit rather coyly that he is a "Germanophile." The definitely pro-Nazi papers, Omega and Hombre Libre, have a fairly large circulation among the middle class. The distance between coolness toward Hitler and enthusiasm for the United Nations, though Mexico is one of them, is still greater than Allied propaganda agencies seem to realize. It is not lessened by the prominence given in the Mexican press to columnists like Hearst's Karl von Wiegand and Howard's William Philip Simms.

Professions of friendship for the United States or the United Nations do not necessarily mean more than an attempt to maintain and increase political power at home. And the United States has many facets. Very often friendship for it is friendship for persons like Monsignor Fulton J. Sheen and other outstanding foes of the Soviet Union. Even the Sinarchists, whom Sheen recently supported as Father Coughlin had supported them before, resolved to suppress open attacks on the United States after a recent semi-secret meeting of regional and national "chiefs." The present aim of the Sinarchists is to appear as an "element of order." Since they stress Christianity as their guiding principle, their claims have met with some success, especially among the less politicalminded members of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. They are moving away from Hispanidad, the Phalangist slogan for restoration of Spain's "spiritual" empire in the Americas, and toward Hispanismo, the stressing of the "Spanish element" in the American republics. Hispanismo's center appears to be Buenos Aires. It attacks Jews, "Communists," Protestants, Free Masons.

The Roman Catholic church is undoubtedly sharing in the usual war-time religious revival. In many places the church hierarchy deprecates the political exploitation of religion if only out of fear that an anti-clerical response will be aroused. This is true in the United States, where Cardinal Mundelein disowned Coughlin, in Argentina and Colombia, and in Mexico, where Archbishop Luis Martínez has advised Catholics to support the government. Nevertheless, Catholicism, with its long tradition of rule and its legend of paternalism, has the kind of appeal to the masses that the word "socialism" had in Hitler's National Socialism. Significantly, it appeals mainly to the most wretched and to the wealthiest, both of which groups oppose the "materialism" of the newly rich and the "socialist" leaders who were unable to improve living standards.

The demand for a New Christian Order is strong just because so many honest persons are unwilling to oppose it. It is spreading, too, because most of the left is going to the opposite extreme and attacking, not the perversion and penetration of the Catholic hierarchy, but Catholicism as a whole. The attitude adopted by the Mexican government, which fears a revival of the old church-state struggle, has been to appease both elements in the church and to play for safety.

Whether the growth of New Christian Order ideas, spreading from Madrid and Detroit to Buenos Aires and Mexico, is the result of a far-reaching plan is uncertain as yet, although strange coincidences are to be noted. A serious phenomenon is the widespread emergence of the Jesuits, who have been outlawed for years. Father Eduardo Iglesias, S. J., is closely connected with the Sinarchists and with high society in Mexico. Father Wilkinson, S. J., is reported to be the brains behind the Argentine military group. Members of the Society have high connections in Washington and Whitehall. A recent supplement to Excelsior advertised the Jesuits' contribution to Mexico and included attacks on "corrosive Judaism," Protestantism, and English piracy. American officials who see some good in the Sinarchist movement fear Jesuit penetration.

United States official observers have shown no keen understanding of the Mexican crisis. The official policy is non-intervention in Mexican affairs. This policy is carried so far that even schemes bound to be of permanent benefit to Mexico-for example, for the prevention of tropical diseases—are kept secret. Since most Mexicans believe that intervention is the monopoly of Ambassador George S. Messersmith and his six hundred employees at the embassy and its annexes, this secrecy defeats its own ends. Senator Hugh Butler's charges that the United States is "coddling" Latin America met with little approval in Mexico, where the general opinion is that the United States needs certain materials and will come to get them regardless of price. But the left did see that Butler and Sheen are representative of trends which constitute the remains of United States imperialism.

The danger facing Mexico is very similar to the one which erupted in Bolivia. It derives from a possible combination of disillusioned democrats, starving masses, diversionist Catholics, and owners (not producers) of export goods—the elements upon whom the Nazis count for "reinsurance" after military defeat in Europe. While the Berlin-Madrid-Buenos Aires axis can hardly cause a spectacular crisis in Mexico immediately, the prospect is not unlikely when the end of the war pricks the present boom. The last Mexican civil war lasted ten years.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

SEVERAL million more workers will be needed by German war industries this year, according to the Bremer Nachrichten of February 13. And as these millions cannot be found in Germany, "they will have to be imported from the occupied territories and the countries of our allies." This announcement was the first mtimation that another enormous importation of slave labor was contemplated.

Three days later it was revealed that the matter was to be handled in a new and original way. On February 16 the Gauleiter of Hesse-Nassau received a batch of French workers from the departments of Marne-et-Loire, Sarthe, and Indre-et-Loire and honored them with an address. He told them that the German province of Hesse-Nassau had "adopted" the three French departments from which they came; Hesse-Nassau was to be their Pate, or godfather, and take them under its wing. And in order to make the arrangement quite clear, he said the "godfather's" duties had been intrusted to the Labor Office of the Gau. Apparently France, as a reservoir of man-power, has been divided among the Labor Offices of the various German provinces. As Pate of a certain section, each has now its own hunting grounds.

The subject was embellished with poetry and philosophy some two weeks later when a prominent functionary in the Reich Labor Office, a Dr. Stothfang, described it in the Hamburger Fremdenblatt of March 4:

Now that this war has become for Europe a life-or-death struggle, it is absolutely necessary to mobilize all Europeans in defense of the Occident. Incomparably more must be done than has been done in past years. The phrase "Europe's community of fate" must be implemented by a tremendous common effort, military and economic, on the part of all European nations. Germany has shown what can be done. As champion and leader in this war Germany has a moral right, and as the chief protagonist of a sound and just New European Order it has a moral duty, to see that Europe's whole labor force is mobilized for the war effort.

If within the framework of this increased mobilization of European labor [the Doctor concluded] Germany must now insist on employing more foreign workers on its own soil, the demand is not unfair considering the blood sacrifices of German soldiers. It must not be looked upon as something to be complied with under duress but as fulfilment of an obvious duty imposed by Europe's fateful struggle.

During the last war a type known as Frontschwein (front pig) appeared in Germany and played a considerable role. A Frontschwein was a soldier who no longer had any respect for anything. Feeling himself an alien in civilian life and even above military discipline, he was a curious combination of warrior and outcast. The reappearance of "front pigs" in Germany today was the subject of some interesting remarks in the Journal de Genève of March 6:

The Frontschweine who were so well known in the First World War have appeared again, and as in 1918 are beginning to leave their mark on the national life. Soldiers from the eastern front are distinguished from others by a red ribbon worn on the tunic. In the streets, in trains, and in public buildings these red-ribbon soldiers make no pretense of saluting their officers, and the officers themselves do not demand it. Nobody likes to come in contact with men from the eastern front—they always make themselves masters of a situation. The Nazi Party, too, knows what a force the red-ribbon men constitute.

The reporter then described a scene he had observed in the South German city of Augsburg:

On February 23 Augsburg had an air raid shortly after mid-day. The shelter where I sought refuge when the sirens sounded was full. All the tables were occupied, and a large number of men, including many officers, were standing. At one table with six chairs, four were occupied by red-ribbon men-a corporal and three privates. Two chairs were vacant, but no one dared to approach the table. Finally a smartly dressed air commander entered, saw the empty chairs, and asked the corporal courteously if he might use one of them. Without rising or saluting, the corporal looked the commander up and down, then said in a tone admitting no contradiction, "Can't you see that this table is occupied? We are keeping these two chairs for our comrades." Without a word the commander walked awayin his beautifully polished boots.

In the opinion of the narrator, this attitude of the red-ribbon soldiers has become so general that practically nothing can be done about it. "Of course," he admitted, "these men could be arrested, but what then? You can't arrest thousands of fighters when every one is needed." So "power has become impotent," and an element is growing up in the population which may develop into no one knows what. In 1918 some Frontschweine became rebels and revolutionaries; a larger number, marauders, free-lance soldiers, secret-society murderers, adventurers, Nazis.

BOOKS and the ARTS

What Price Art?

THE SILENCE OF THE SEA" by Vercors (Macmillan, $1) is a tiny book—scarcely longer than a short story—with a dramatic genesis and history. We are told that it was written in Nazi-occupied France in the fall of 1941, published in that country by an underground publishing organization called Les Editions de Minuit, and then smuggled to England, where, translated by Cyril Connolly, it was brought out under the title "Put Out the Light." We are further told that it is the first in a series of such French underground publications which are to be known as "Les Cahiers du Silence." The name Vercors is of course a pseudonym.

Naturally one comes to such a volume much prejudiced in its favor. It is not only that we know that many of the distinguished writers of modern France are still living in that country; whether the author of this story is someone with whose work we are already familiar or an unknown writer, we are eager to greet any work that has survived the occupation. But whatever our good-will, "The Silence of the Sea" unfortunately turns out to be far from a great short story; perhaps, indeed, only the greatest short story could possibly live up to so dramatic a birth. It is sophisticated in conception and sure-handed in the writing, but its interest is distinctly political rather than literary.

Told in the first person by a cultivated Frenchman-by indication a writer—the story describes the developing relationship between himself, the niece with whom he lives, and a German occupation officer who is billeted in their home. The German, in civilian life a composer, is handsome and cultivated; he is sensitive to the hostility of his unwilling hosts and even respects it. He never intrudes into the part of the house in which they live except for a short visit each evening, when he knocks on their sitting-room door-only to enter without being asked to. Then, while the old Frenchman sits on one side of the fireplace sipping his coffee and the niece sits on the other side of the fireplace knitting or sewing, both of them coldly silent, the officer talks to them of his life and ideas. It seems that he is in love with French culture, the culture represented by the long rows of books that line this room in which he is so unwelcome; he sees the conquest of France as a marriage between the beautiful soul of France and the strong body of Germany, and he even carries this image to the point of describing the native betrayers of France as the disreputable matchmakers of an inevitable and fruitful union. And as he talks it becomes clear that the Nazi officer is purposefully addressing himself to the young niece, symbol of the French spirit; it also becomes clear that his charm and passion are beginning to affect his listeners profoundly despite the fact that they maintain their hostile silence. But one day the officer goes on leave to Paris, and upon his return his hosts realize that the evening intrusions have ceased. We watch them wait in increasing tension for the accustomed knock at the door. At last the evening arrives when it is heard again: for the first time the Frenchman calls loudly, "Come in," and even adds, "Sir." The German is markedly disturbed; he has come to explain his absence. While on leave in Paris he has visited German headquarters and had a shattering experience; he has learned that Germany intends to destroy French culture for a thousand years, not to woo it as he had imagined. Under such circumstances he can no longer serve as an occupation officer and he has applied for military duty; he has come this evening to say goodby. At the news the niece for the first time raises her eyes to the German and for the first time addresses him. In the attitude of a deserted lover, she utters a tortured farewell.

I think that even in outline the ambiguity of such a story must suggest itself. When one also takes into account details of the narrative which I haven't space to report here, "The Silence of the Sea" becomes even more puzzling; obviously it is susceptible to a variety of interpretations. In the only sense, however, in which its direction is clear to me—I could hope to be mistaken—I find it one of the thoroughly disconcerting documents, if not of the war, then of an aspect of contemporary intellectual life. For what Vercors seems to be saying is that if Nazism would only promise to preserve French culture, it could or would or should be made acceptable to the French; and by French culture he means purely and simply French art, the good French literature which the officer catalogues as he stands before his host's bookshelves.

There are no people in the story except the characters I have mentioned and one or two people to whom the officer refers; there are no French people except the narrator and his niece. By implication, there is no starvation or exploitation or murder or forced labor in the train of Nazism; there is only the outraged dignity of the spirit of French culture waiting to be properly appreciated. By further implication, there is no importance in the power of a political system over the multitudes of uncultivated people, there is even no connection between a nation's culture and its uncultivated people. In short, the intellectual class lives alone in a vacuum, and its sole purpose is the creation of more and more thought in a vacuum. By my reading, "The Silence of the Sea" is a reductio ad absurdum of the plea for the intellectual's position of special privilege.

Yet if a reductio ad absurdum can be valuable, this seems to me to be a valuable one. For here is a story which states boldly a point of view that lies deep in the attitude of certain sections of our intellectual life; it allows us to see the political folly to which the logic of this point of view must lead. Basically, that is, the isolationism-in-thought of "The Silence of the Sea" is identical with the isolationism-in-thought of those of our intellectuals and artists who insist that they have no share in the running of government or in the making and waging of wars. Have they then no share in the outcome of government and wars? If they have not, they must logically be prepared to welcome any political system so long as it allows them to function—even fascism. And this is a bitter irony; for if there is one thing which would horrify such intellectuals it is the accusation that they are reactionaries. Because they revere the internationalism of art and have no respect for the political units which are nations, even because they don't care enough about society to be bothered with its forms, they are able to masquerade to themselves as political liberals, even political radicals. But perhaps a story like "The Silence of the Sea" will suggest to them the way in which the notion of a cultural aristocracy can work out to be as strong an arm of political reaction as a hereditary social aristocracy.

Faith, Hope, and Gusto

UNDER THE BRIDGE. By Ferris Greenslet. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

EVERY man and every book," Hippolyte Taine once wrote, "can be summed up in three pages, and those three pages can be summed up in three lines."

That remark, however sound it may seem to a literary editor in a time of paper shortage, looks wildly absurd to reviewer who has in hand the autobiography of Ferris Greenslet-author, publisher, fisherman, traveler, raconteur, scholar, business man, bon vivant, gentleman, and artist. It would look absurd to Ferris Greenslet himself, although he too is a vigorous pruner of the vine of language. During the several years at the turn of the century in which he sat on the reviewing stand of The Nation, trying to "sum up" scores of poets, essayists, biographers, and historians as they hurried by, he learned the skill of literary compression. Undoubtedly, however, his hardest assignments were those in which he had to characterize just such books, if there were any, as this that he has now written-books with no predominant theme or topic, books about the "number of things" with which the world is proverbially replete, books in which the chief binding element was their "charm." Books of that kind refuse to be summed up in any fewer words than they contain. They are not meant for reviewers but for whatsoever seasoned and leisurely readers there may be left in this distracted world.

'Under the Bridge" shows that Ferris Greenslet has had an excellent style from which to refrain during the three decades in which he has published almost nothing of his own. That fact was long ago made clear by his study of Joseph Glanvill-a better book than he seems to realize. There, however, and to some extent in his later studies of Lowell, Aldrich, and Pater, one occasionally heard a languid echo of the eighteen-nineties, a rhythm or a euphony caressed for its own sake. Thus it was not entirely without reason that he was considered, on his first visit to London, "a child of the literary loins of Walter Pater." But now all the roses and raptures, the languors and lilies, are gone from his page, and he writes a prose, as pellucid as gin, which differs from the jog-trot of ordinary journalese in being more exact, more nimble, and easier on the educated ear. The beauty of the writing in his present book is unsought and intrinsic. In a phrase which he applies to another writer, he is now "a master of the magical word too few."

Ferris Greenslet got his literary training from Winchester of Wesleyan, Woodberry of Columbia, Wendell Phillips Garrison of The Nation, Bliss Perry of the Atlantic Monthly. and Charles Eliot Norton of Shady Hill. Under such tutelage, not to mention the great exemplars of the past which he more than most writers of our day keeps in mind, he could not fail to be a "stylist," good or bad. But a highly trained sense of style commonly brings a writer many more hours of torment than minutes of triumph. The weariness of his interminable fumbling not merely for the right word but for the precisely right rhythm and cadence, the pain of continually proffering unacceptable cacophonies to an ear grown morbidly sensitive and also tyrannical, is more than any but the martyrs of style such as Conrad and Flaubert can long endure. Does this suggest a reason why Ferris Greenslet turned aside from the writer's task thirty years ago and became a business man of letters? Or should one say that what might have been his literary career went down when the familiar essay, during the early months of the First World War, was spurlos versenkt?

An essayist he is, by gift and training, as almost any page of this autobiography will show. The color and climate of his mind suffuse the most heterogeneous objects, places, and persons. He has the quick sympathy and warmth of notice, the married wisdom and wit, the speed of thought issuing from leisure, of which good essays are made. He has both zest and taste—two diverse qualities brought together by Hazlitt's favorite word, gusto.

It has been said that "the corruption of a poet is the making of a critic," and perhaps one might hazard a similar suggestion about essayists and publishers. At any rate, the qualities of mind that make "Under the Bridge" a thoroughly delightful book are precisely those that a man would use in the discovery and promotion of books by other hands. For publishing, of course, besides being a business, is also an art and a hazardous form of sport. One of the main qualifications for success in it is a cautious and hard-headed gusto. And Ferris Greenslet has succeeded.

He seems to have been about equally concerned, during the last three decades, with fishing for trout and angling for manuscripts. Now both of these occupations require faith, hope, and gusto; but the greatest of these is gusto. "Under the Bridge" contains, in one paragraph, altogether the most amazing fisherman's yarn that the present reviewer has ever heard or read-and a peculiarity of it is that it must be true because no one could have imagined it. Another tale, equally astonishing and veracious, is that concerning the way in which Ferris Greenslet stalked the wily old bottom-hugging and weed-loving Henry Adams, trying him with all manner of wet flies, dry flies, and rolling casts until "The Education" lay in Houghton Mifflin's capacious creel, a veritable fourpounder. (The fact seems to be, however, that Adams never really rose to any fly that Greenslet tossed him. One fears that he was "snagged.")

Gusto backed by intelligence will take a man a long way. It has taken Ferris Greenslet many times across the Atlantic, has given him the freedom of London as well as of Boston, has led him up—not down—the amber brawl of a hundred brooks and rivers, has brought him the friend-ship of many people who write books, or try to write them, or have written them in the echoing past. writing of English during the last thirty years, he has known. Among other things, therefore, his book is a gallery of portraits, or rather of sketches swiftly but accurately drawn. For example, who could better this one sentence about Brander Matthews: "His cup was small, but he drank from his cup"?

Clearly, too, gusto can last a long while. It can survive the reading of fifty thousand manuscripts, most of them bad, and come up at the end with such a glowing tribute to one book as Ferris Greenslet here pays to Willa Cather's "Shadows on the Rock." It can make a man who is nearing seventy feel sure that the writing of our day is better than that which he knew in his youth, and also that the American writing of the years just ahead will be better still.

The unquestionable success of the life recorded in "Under the Bridge" has been due, one guesses, to the fact that Ferris Greenslet has always done pretty much what he wanted to do, and so has done it well. Good fortune has helped him, no doubt; but intelligent choice has played its part. His lines have been cast in pleasant places, but he has chosen his own streams and pools. And success, we know, is the reward of success. All his life he has tossed his flies into beauty, so that now it is right and just that he should be drawing them back over waters of peace where the striped bass come in with the tides of summer among the sedgy sea-meadows of Ipswich.

Diary of Tomorrow

TOMORROW ALWAYS COMES. By Vernon Bartlett. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

READERS of The Nation have already appreciated Vernon Bartlett's ingenious Diary of the Future. They will want to have it in full, with introduction and conclusion. There is nothing fanciful about the book but the form and a few irrelevant details. No Utopia, but sober, and sobering, realism. Bartlett expresses the same misgivings as Motherwell, Brant, and a score of others; he has chosen to do so through a conscious pastiche of Harold Nicolson's "Peacemaking." Alas, that after twenty-five years we should still be so unsure of the morrow!

The common man everywhere wants the right thing—peace within the nations and among the nations through the abolition of privilege. For privilege can maintain itself only by force, and has to be challenged by force. The governments, "realistically," are utterly confused. "Unconditional surrender" is a perfect slogan, provided it is not an excuse for moral cowardice. After unconditional surrender, what? This we must ask ourselves and, in rough outline at least, tell our enemies. For our terms ought to be synonymous with what we are fighting for.

Bartlett sees three dangers ahead. The first is distrust among the major Allies. We have no confidence in the Russians, because they are Communists; but we have even less confidence in the British, because they are capitalists. What is to prevent them from doing exactly what we are planning to do—use the world crisis to win trade and establish supremacy?

The second danger is that the English-speaking powers are working insidiously but constantly in favor of the European tories. "Legitimacy" and the fear of revolution are the excuses. Pershing, no radical himself, denounced that danger a quarter of a century ago. In Great Britain we find still in high places appeasers, partisans of Franco, and admirers of the late Mussolini. Our long amity with Vichy, our deal with Darlan, the unhappy Giraud-Peyrouton interlude are frankly ominous. To cap it all came the Little King-Badoglio imbroglio. Bartlett may be too optimistic when he believes that a tory regime, backed by American machine-guns, could not maintain itself for six months in Europe. What can unarmed mobs do against an organized force?

Of the third danger Bartlett is undoubtedly conscious; yet his thought remains a trifle vague. That danger is the Big Three (or Four) fallacy. It is bound to ruin the peace, for it is Machtpolitik naked and unashamed. Why should a second-rater be given a position of influence in the Council of the Nations, instead of, for instance, Benes or Hambro? If we have a common ideal, let us place at the top the men who can understand and serve it best. The Big Four system is sheer imperialism—the desire to impose (benevolently!) our will upon the little fellows. Imperialism must be resisted; but that resistance breeds nationalism, which, as Borgese puts it, is "of all heresies the deadliest." In an atmosphere of justice and reason nationalism loses its sting, turns into harmless cultural autonomy. Under the threat of force it becomes virulent again, with at least a semblance of holy wrath. I should hate to see nationalism, through our fault, flare up again as a fanatical faith.

The snubbing of the "little" nations will arouse—is arousing—hatred against us. To the average American, who does not understand how offensive our policy is, this resentment will appear as the blackest ingratitude. We shall once more wash our hands of an incorrigible Europe—until a new European conflagration reaches our shores again.

Many of the details are graphic and ingenious. There is a good plea, for instance, for a United Nations flag. Bartlett gives Hitler a useful hint: it is reported that the Führer has been flung into a great caldron of molten metal; thus identification will be impossible, and Adolf may walk off with shorn moustache. Bartlett revives the old cliché about the English lack of imagination-which would make Shakespeare, Dickens, Disraeli, Cecil Rhodes, and not a few others un-English. If the British did not despair in 1940, it is not because they were too dull-witted to know that they were licked but because they had imaginative faith in a phantom, the empire: "Now we are alone—the five hundred million of us!" The empire could not have saved England; but it gave her faith, and faith gained time. Time for America to wake up; time for Hitler to start his suicidal attack on Russia. Jules Romains has a great theory of "la mystification créatrice." A myth may win a day; it takes truth to win the day.

A generous, an entrancing book; and a wise one, although a little hesitant in tackling the main cause of evil. Bartlett himself is not quite free from the "global insularity" that goes with English speech. At any rate, he is vastly ahead of our governments.

DRAMA

THE central character of "Jacobow-sky and the Colonel" (Martin Beck Theater) has been making his way through the world for a long time. He is the eternal refugee, the "wandering Jew," one of those men I was told about as a child—men who had been alive since the time of Christ and would continue to pace the earth until the Last Judgment. He is a folk figure created out of who knows what desires, needs, beliefs. He is a great temptation to writers, and he can be an awful bore and a worse fraud, especially in the hands of a sentimentalist.

In the present play he is incarnated as a Polish Jew fleeing from the Germans, a man named Jacobowsky, for whom there are always "two possibilities." The part was outlined, I presume, by Franz Werfel, since the piece is based on a play by Werfel; it was filled in by S. N. Behrman; it is portrayed by Oscar Karlweis. And as a result of this lucky combination of sugar and salt and the magic of good acting the ancient character seems not so much created as released. Mr. Karlweis, by means of an unobtrusive skill and strong feeling, brings him to life; the plot gives him scope; and that old usurer, the age we live in, lends him an extra measure of intense reality-at the prevailing high Jacobowsky is the most interesting character on Broadway at the moment, with the possible exception of Iago. Unfortunately the company he keeps is not as good as it should be. In general, the casting, the acting, and the direction must be marked down as another set of hazards which the eternal wanderer has to overcome with his sharp wit and his old wisdom. The aristocratic Polish colonel, to whom he gives safe conduct to St. Jean de Luz because he, Jacobowsky, can't drive the car he manages to obtain, has neither the elegance nor the afflatus of "one of the finest minds of the fifteenth century." Louis Calhern looks and acts about as much like a Polish nobleman as the football players in "Rackety-Rax." As a result many of Mr. Behrman's best lines are muffed, and the rich possibilities of the contrast between S. L. Jacobowsky and Colonel (Don Quixote) Tadeusz Boleslav Stjerbinsky are largely unrealized-except in the champing imagination of the spectator. Annabella, as the French sweetheart of the Count, is quite colorless. The lisping Gestapo official borders on burlesque, but even so he is much more convincing than the Broadway Nazi played straight, and he is also amusing.

A good portion of the large cast is left behind in Paris in the first act, and that is just as well, for the French "types" are conceived and drawn with amazing gaucherie. Indeed, most of the first act might better have been abandoned altogether.

As for the play itself: at one point someone makes the old observation that the situation is hopeless but not serious. But that mood, which is the right mood, is not sustained. At intervals, as if the authors had not quite the courage to sustain it, they interrupt the play with solemn speeches, thereby diluting its essential seriousness—which is crystallized in its funniest lines.

UNISIAN VICTORY" is bound to be compared with "Desert Victory." That it suffers by comparison is by no means entirely the fault of the Englishmen and Americans who made it. "Desert Victory" started with great advantages, and took highly intelligent further advantage of each of them. History imposed upon the film a grand and simple form; it was possible to personify anonymous forces in two, rather than two dozen, opposing leaders who had the further advantage of being psychologically provocative figures; and the film was made under a single, focused control and for a single purpose. "Tunisian Victory" had to tell of a campaign much more complex, in political as well as military respects; it was apparently necessary to highlight, and bow and scrape to, every half-sized military wig in sight; the film suffered the liabilities of "full collaboration"; it evidently suffered too at the hands of people whose concern was purely political and propagandistic; and its makers were trying not only to give a short screen history of a vast and intricate action but at the same time to play international Gaston and Alphonse. The questionable political overtones of the invasion never so much as smudge the sound trackthough one good look at the people involved is perhaps enough; the military story, on the other hand, is told so doggedly, with such textbookish wordiness, that the film never escapes for more than a few seconds at a time into the sort of pure tragic excitement which "Desert Victory" proved a war film can be. There are shots, and clusters of shots, as fine as any in the British film, but they never get a chance to gather cinematic momentum; the words, the verbalized facts, forever nag them to heel, and their competently edited heeling is no acceptable substitute. It was a mistake too, I think, to try to "humanize" American and English soldiers, whose screen faces hardly need that service, by means of two disembodied voices, one Cockney, one Kansas City, for they give the film the pseudo-democratic, demagogic coloration of most vernacular literature. "Tunisian Victory" is, in fact, at its worst whenever it tries to be "human" for humanity's sake; I, at least, felt that the people on the screen and in front of it were being unconsciously patronized, which is one cut worse than consciously; and judging by the run of British and American films I have seen, I feel pretty sure whose national disease that is. For the privilege of producing a Lincoln we have been paying through our tinhorn nose, in counterfeit kind, ever since we brought him down with a Roman phrase.

Beyond provoking friendly mention of ripe Ann Sheridan, decent Dennis Morgan, and shrewd S. Z. Sakall, "Shine On, Harvest Moon" offers nothing worth talking about. "Tender Comrade" — "wife," that means—is very much worth talking about, and I hope that adequate strength and space will coincide in a week or two. Meanwhile I can say only that it is one of the goddamnedest things ever seen.

MUSIC

HE people who think up programs for the New Friends of Music are incapable of distinguishing a neglected masterpiece from an unplayed work that deserves its obscurity; and there have been occasions to curse them for the dulness they have inflicted on me; but on the other hand I owe them my first experience of Mozart's marvelous Viola Quintet K.614 in E flat. And by a fortunate accident-since they are equally incapable of distinguishing excellent from mediocre in performers-I got my first impression of the work from an unforgettable performance by the Primrose Quartet, a group of N.B.C. Symphony string-players (Shumsky, Gingold, Primrose, Shapiro) whose technical virtuosity produced for this highspirited music textures of living sound that were astoundingly light and sharp. Since then I have heard the Quintet played at least three times by the Budapest Quartet, but surprisingly enough without the same lightness and sharpness, and therefore without the same effect

The most recent occasion was the Budapest's final concert in its Y.M.H.A. series; and again there was the extraordinary change in the group's playing when it got to Beethoven-this time Opus 132 in A minor. As for the work it is notable for offering the most intense communication of the pain which the last quartets convey with their exaltation; and it has passages which are among the supreme moments of this group of works. One of these comes in the middle of the second movement, where the first violin, playing at a great height and as though at a great distance, displaces the awareness of the pain of this earth with a vision of a celestial joy. Another is the slow movement: and whereas the Cavatina of Opus 130 and slow movement of Opus 135 have tremendous impact from the brevity and concentration of their utterances, the famous Heiliger Dankgesang eines Genesenen (Solemn Song of Thanksgiving of Convalescent) of Opus 132 attains overwhelming stature and greatness through its expansive elaboration of form and content. The form is like that of the slow movement of Beethoven's Ninth Sympony: a long opening section, which recurs twice after an alternating section, and which is varied each time that it so recurs. The variation process which elaborates rhythm, figuration, texture, in this way intensifies meaning; and the illumination and exaltation are carried, the second time, to a point of superearthy ecstasy which, as far as I can recall, is not attained elsewhere in these last quartets.

Columbia's newly issued recording of the Budapest Quartet's performance of Opus 132 I shall report on next week.

A friend took me to hear the performance of "Falstaff" at which Leonard Warren replaced Tibbett in the title role. This was the first time I have heard Warren that he did not bawl his head off in a way that I have found painful to listen to; instead, employing the youthful beauty, freshness, flexibility, and ease of his voice with musical taste and discretion, he achieved one of the most impressive vocal performances I have heard in recent years. And he also acted the part well. In addition, freed of the burden it had had to carry, the entire performance had more ease and happiness. It had flaws: Harshaw's voice was inadequate for Dame Quickly; there was raggedness and strain in some of the ensembles. But it was an excellent performance of an extraordinarily beautiful work.

And here I can no longer keep myself from quoting Bernard Shaw. He had, he said, not gone to Milan for the first performance of "Falstaff," and therefore knew only what he had been able to get from looking through the score. And one must marvel at the critical powers which enabled him to perceive in this way that "'Falstaff' is lighted and warmed only by the afterglow of the fierce noonday sun of 'Ernani'; but the gain in beauty conceals the loss in heat-if, indeed, it be a loss to replace intensity of passion and spontaneity of song by fulness of insight and perfect mastery of workmanship. Verdi has exchanged the excess of his qualities for the wisdom to supply his deficiencies; his weaknesses have disappeared with his superfluous force; and he is now, in his dignified competence, the greatest of living dramatic composers. It is not often that a man's strength is so immense that he can remain an athlete after bartering half of it to old age for experience; but the thing happens occasionally, and need not so greatly surprise us in Verdi's case, especially those of us who, long ago, when Von Bülow and others were contemptuously repudiating him, were able to discern in him a man possessing more power than he knew how to use, or indeed was permitted to use by the old operatic forms imposed on him by circumstances."

I am not a "true-blue, died-in-thewool Savoyard" like my Boston correspondent who went to nine of the Gilbert and Sullivan Company's performances up there and wrote me an exhaustive evaluation of them which ended with the recommendation that if I went to only one let it be "The Gondoliers." I am merely a person who enjoys Gilbert and Sullivan and who enjoyed most of what I could see and hear of "The Gondoliers" from a very bad seat. The only really and intensely bad thing in the performance was the excruciating sounds produced by the young lady who sang Casilda, who I presume produces similar sounds in the other operas. The rest of the principals were good; the chorus sang better than it looked; the orchestra I was in no position to hear properly; the performance as a whole went off well. B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Fit to Forget

Dear Sirs: The severe editorial which appeared in the New York Times of February 4 opposing Izvesitá's criticism of the Vatican entirely overlooked the known facts in the matter of the Vatican's consistent and necessary support of German militarism for the past one hundred years.

Apparently the person who wrote the editorial was unaware that the Times itself once castigated the Vatican in much more scathing terms than Izvestia, for the same reason, accurately prophesying that the issue "will be potent in molding the history of Europe for years to come." This editorial in the New York Times went so far as to call the Vatican's support of German militarism "the profound immorality of the temporal policy of the Church of Rome."

The editorial appeared in the Times of February 8, 1887, and is as follows:

All is grist that comes to the mills of Rome. The collision between the spirit of military absolutism and the spirit of parliamentary liberty in Germany, a contest watched with the deepest interest all over the world, and whose issue will be potent in molding the history of Europe for years to come, is viewed by the Pope merely as a welcome opportunity to improve the condition of the Roman Catholic church in Germany.

The party of the Center in the Reichstag is the Catholic party. Dr. Windthorst, who has been its leader throughout the long struggle against the May laws, is its leader now. He led the successful opposition to Bismarck's bill increasing the army and providing for its support for a period of seven years, commonly called the Septennate bill. When the Reichstag had rejected the bill and Bismarck had dissolved that body and a new general election had been ordered, Baron Frankenstein sent to Rome, through the Papal Nuncio at Munich, an inquiry as to the views and wishes of the Pope concerning the conduct of Catholics in the struggle. The Pope's reply is made in a letter written by Cardinal Jacobini: "That the Septennate question embraces religious and moral considerations which justify him in expressing the opinion that he may expect from the Center Party's conciliation toward the measure a beneficial effect in the final revision of the May laws." The Pope desires, moreover, "to meet the views of Emperor William and Bismarck, and thereby induce the powerful German Empire to improve the position of the papacy." . .

Dr. Windthorst now declares (in an address delivered on Saturday at Cologne) that the Center Party knows what it is about such better than the Pope, and will fight the Septennate to the end. And the meeting he addressed adopted a resolution approving the course of the Catholic deputies of the Rhine provinces and urging their respection.

Rhine provinces and urging their reelection.

One sentence of Dr. Windthorst's address reveals with pitiless and perhaps unintentional frankness the profound immorality of the temporal policy of the Church of Rome. "The Pope's advocacy of the Septennate bill," said Dr. Windthorst, "was independent of the merits of the measure, and arose from reasons of expediency and from political considerations." It would be difficult to frame a more accurate analysis of the papal motives while at the same time indicating a more sweeping denunciation of the papal policy. Liberal principles, the right of popular government, the German constitution, and its guaranty of parliamentary institutions, says the Pope, may go to the dogs if we can secure some further modification of the laws which relate to the church, and so improve the condition of the papacy in Ger-

The New York Times's dire prophecy came true, as the First and Second World Wars sadly testify. Pope Leo XIII's command to the Catholic Center Party in 1887 to aid militarism in Germany was a contributing factor to the First World War. Again in 1933, when the Vatican removed the Catholic Center Party as the only remaining obstacle to Hitler's rise to power, the Second World War began. How true it is that a strong militarist Germany is essential to the Vatican policy can be seen in the late Kaiser Wilhelm's "Memoirs," where he tells that on his visit to Pope Leo XIII the latter insisted with him that "Germany must become the sword of the Catholic church." #### Vansittart Again

Dear Sirs: As a twenty-year subscriber and an associate of The Nation I feel compelled to write about the anti-Nazi Germans who write in the liberal press, particularly their references to Lord Vansittart.

These writers make me conclude that Lord Vansittart is correct when he says there is no difference between the left and right parties in Germany.

In The Nation of February 12, Fritz Sternberg says in his article, Germany, Economic Heart of Europe, "I shall not enter upon a discussion of the German character in this article; I would merely remind the Vansittarts high and low that the Russians, who have suffered most of all from German aggression, do not demand that Germany be dismembered; rather they demand that the groups which promoted aggression—the Junkers and the big industrialists—be destroyed."

In The Nation of January 1, 1944, Reinhold Niebuhr in his review of Lord Vansittart's book "Lessons of My Life" asks "why Lord Vansittart has become our modern Cato, crying that Carthage must be destroyed."

Also Franz Schoenberner in his attack on Emil Ludwig in the December, 1943, issue of the Protestant refers to "Lord Vansittart and all the other anti-Germanists working overtime as volunteers and honorary members of Dr. Goebbels's Propaganda Ministry."

It appears to me that the truth about Germany hurts these writers, as shown by the above sly attacks on Vansittart's book. Lord Vansittart says in his book, page 23, that he does not advocate persecution or extermination. He does not mention dismemberment or total destruction, which is the equivalent of a Carthaginian peace. Lord Vansittart takes a very generous view, in which he advocates the defeat, the demilitarization, occupation, and reeducation of Germany. I would take sterner measures. Vansittart would give the Germans a full life and a full larder.

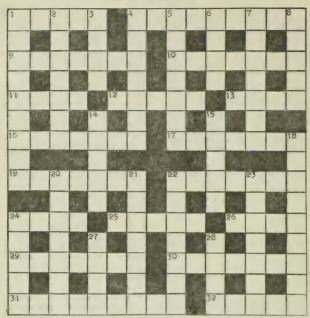

It is difficult to know what these writers are up to. Let us beware of them.

In the article first referred to Fritz Sternberg says, "So it is to be hoped that Germany will be allowed to remain undivided in its 1919 boundaries." This can hardly be, for contrary to the first quotation, Russia will not allow East Prussia to exist. It will be divided between Poland and Russia so that Russia can protect its Baltic shore.

The frontiers of Germany after the war should be, in the west, the River Rhine, Holland, and the River Ems, in the south Switzerland, the River Inn, and the mountains of Czechoslovakia, in the east the River Oder. The part east of the Oder should go to Poland. In the north the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein should go back to Denmark. A reading of "The Mailed Fist, 1864-1939, the Background of Hitlerism," by S. L. G. Knox, published by Friends of Democracy, Inc., will show

Hell-bent for Reaction

Dear Sirs: I. F. Stone's article in your issue of March 4 is one of the finest things I have ever read. But in a country hell-bent for reaction it will hardly be enough to turn the tide.

One can see why the "big boys" are leading on with the very measures that are going to enrich and help them at every turn, but just why the vast numbers of the middle class and even many of the workers subscribe to the things that will prove their own destruction God only knows; I don't.

I am fearful that it will take far less than ten years to prove how eminently right Mr. Stone is today.

The Shape of Things

AMERICAN LISTENERS WHO HAD NOT BEEN following British politics must have found the second half of Mr. Churchill's Sunday radio talk rather puzzling. After presenting one of his usual sweeping surveys of the war, he suddenly switched to the domestic front. In a bitter attack he castigated critics who, he said, were demanding complete solutions of all post-war problems. Clearly, this reflects the groundswell of opposition in Britain which has recently overwhelmed several government nominees at by-elections. The form of Mr. Churchill's counter-attack indicated his awareness of popular insistence on a new and different Britain after the war. He claimed that, while the war always came first, the government had not been negligent in social planning. He pointed to the Education and Health bills now before Parliament and promised a comprehensive socialsecurity measure in the near future. Finally he outlined a large scheme of public housing and probably startled some of our economic royalists by his reminder that the British government had power to take all land needed for state purposes at its 1939 valuation.

THE SENATE WENT ON A RAMPAGE LAST week, sending the Independent Offices Appropriation Bill back to the House festooned with amendments of a legislative nature entirely out of place in a money bill. One of these was a triumph for Senator McKellar of Tennessee, who has long been conducting a spite attack on the Tennessee Valley Authority. Originally he had attached sixteen amendments to this bill, all aimed at T. V. A., but strong opposition compelled him to drop all but one. However, the sixteenth, which provides that T. V. A. must come to Congress for all operating expenses instead of using its receipts as a revolving fund, threatens to bind with red tape a most efficient and useful agency. Friends of public power put up a good fight against this amendment. But amazingly, another McKellar proposal—to compel Senatorial confirmation of all government employees earning more than $4,500 a year -was approved without debate. Clearly it will be impossible for the Senate to give proper consideration to the thousands of appointments involved, and the result will be interminable delays, "trading" in jobs, and a vast increase in the value of Senatorial patronage. A third amendment, sponsored by Senator Russell of Georgia, who said it was aimed at "bureaucracy," abolished all Presidentially created agencies which have functioned for wear unless Congress makes specific appropriations to maintain them. In this case the intended victims are such bodies as the Fair Employment Practices Committee. These amendments now go to the House, which we hope will reject them as political in the worst sense.

A PLAN FOR LIMITING PRICE CONTROL TO some forty-five essential commodities is reported to be receiving serious consideration in the Senate Banking Committee. Republicans supporting the proposal argue that there can be no justification for controlling prices on items for which there is no critical need. Actually, an acceptance of the plan would not only imperil the entire stabilization program but play havoc with the production of essential civilian commodities. Inflation, as the President has repeatedly pointed out, must be controlled on every front if it is to be successfully controlled at all. A creeping inflation in non-critical items would create additional buying power which ultimately would swamp all efforts to hold down the prices of essential items. But that is not the worst of it. An increase in the prices of luxury items would inevitably divert labor and capital from the production of essentials into the luxury trades, thus causing shortages of the price-controlled items and surpluses in non-essentials. While it is true that this shift could be limited in part by the WPB and WMC through a system of priorities, experience has shown that direct control, particularly of man-power, is much less effective and arouses much more opposition than over-all price-stabilization.

THE JAPANESE DRIVE INTO INDIA IS NOT generally regarded as a major operation. But it has both military and political aspects that are frankly disturbing. Important military results can be achieved only if the Japanese succeed in pushing beyond Imphal to cut the supply lines feeding General Stilwell's remarkably successful offensive in North Burma. In view of the mountain terrain, this objective will be difficult to attain. Indeed, it is quite probable that the Japanese have no intention of pushing beyond Imphal at this time, when the rainy season is approaching. But even this limited gain may have important political repercussions. Premier Tojo's announcement that the Indian nationalist, Subhas Chandra Bose, is accompanying the Japanese troops, indicates that Tokyo intends to set up a puppet Indian state on whatever territory is wrested from the British. The Japanese apparently believe that the establishment of a "free India," even on a small scale, will provoke serious disturbances within India, which, at the very least, will have the effect of hampering Allied offensive plans. They have been encouraged in this belief by a series of anti-British and anti-American speeches in the Indian Legislative Assembly, now in session. Although the possibility of widespread disturbances in support of the Japanese is discounted in the heavily censored dispatches that reach this country from India, the danger is probably greater than is admitted.

AUTHENTIC INFORMATION FROM INSIDE India is scarce nowadays. It is difficult to find out how Indians feel or what they are doing. But apparently, in common with people in many other countries, they are working on post-war plans. A commission consisting of India's biggest business men has worked out a Fifteen-Year Plan of economic development involving an expenditure of thirty billion dollars. Among the members of the commission are Mr. J. R. D. Tata, the head of India's largest steel corporation, G. Birla, the textile magnate, Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas, Dr. John Mattai, and many others. Mr. Tata, a thirty-eight-year-old Parsi, has made himself the spokesman of the plan. Most of the money is to be Indian money. The immediate goals contemplated are a 130 per cent increase in the output of agriculture, and a 500 per cent increase in industrial income. "Food, clothing, schooling for everybody up to the fifth form, and a dispensary with one doctor and two nurses in each village" is the fifteen-year aim. Food exports are to be discouraged. In launching it, the commission stated that "the underlying assumption of the scheme is that shortly after the war, India will have a national government with full freedom in economic matters and that the economic unity of the country shall be maintained on a federal basis." The plan has been submitted to the British government of India.

ALTHOUGH THE UNITED STATES WILL SOON be going into a huddle with Britain and Russia on postwar international aviation, it does not yet seem to have a policy of its own. Among other questions still to be decided is whether American overseas air services are to be organized on a monopolistic or on a competitive basis. This is a very burning topic indeed in air-transport circles. Sixteen of the seventeen domestic air lines, nearly all of which have been gaining experience of international flying during the war, are insisting on competition and their right to expand internationally. They are therefore up in arms about a bill, introduced by Senator Pat McCarran of Nevada, creating a "billion-dollar All-American Flag Line," which, he says, "must and shall be the leading air carrier . . . throughout the world." The line would operate under a federal charter but would be a privately owned corporation in which the domestic air lines would be allowed to participate along with the existing foreign services. This is essentially the plan of Pan-American Airways, which up to the beginning of the war enjoyed a de facto monopoly and would now like to have its position legalized. Other major powers, the argument for this policy runs, have and will continue to have one "chosen instrument" to represent their interests in international air transport. Thus, by dissipating American strength among a number of competing companies, we shall severely handicap ourselves in bargaining for reciprocal rights. Pan-American is willing to give the domestic lines a stake in its operations; it is even willing to allow the government a minority interest. But if there is to be a monopoly of this business, which is so intimately connected with foreign policy, the real issue to be decided is whether it can be safely intrusted to a private corporation organized for profit.

THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR TOOK A NEW turn last week when the booksellers of abolitionist Boston stopped the sale of a book written by a Southerner who believes in racial equality. Censorship in Boston also took a new turn, for the sale of "Strange Fruit," the book in question, was banned not officially by the police but unofficially by the Boston Board of Retail Book Merchants. The all-too-voluntary action of these timid souls occurred, however, shortly after Police Commissioner Thomas F. Sullivan "scanned a copy"-presumably in the usual fashion of policemen turned criticsand indicated a few "objectionable" passages. The booksellers then told the publishers, Reynal and Hitchcock, that if certain "minor changes" were made the book might be dispensed even in Boston. At this point, we are glad to say, somebody stood up straight. The publishers, after consultation with the author, stated that they have no intention whatsoever of making any changes. We don't imagine many residents of Boston will be prevented from reading "Strange Fruit"-and no doubt many will read it who wouldn't otherwise have been interested; but the serious fact remains that a book has been banned in such a manner that, as matters stand, it cannot have its day in court.

THE RESIGNATION OF RANDOLPH PAUL AS general counsel of the Treasury Department was perhaps inevitable in view of the harsh treatment accorded his tax programs in Congress. But there are few men in official life who more richly deserve the gratitude of the American people for intelligent and loyal public service. Although Mr. Paul never succeeded in persuading Congress to adopt a vigorous, all-out tax program based on the principle of equal sacrifice for all groups, he was successful in pushing through a much sounder program of war financing than this country had in World War I.

Furthermore, by constant struggle, he was able—almost single handed—to protect the American people from a regressive sales tax that would have placed the burden of the war even more completely on the lower-income groups. It is to be hoped that some time in the not too distant future a way will be found to apply his technical knowledge, honesty, and courage to the task of clearing away the fiscal wreckage caused by the two tax measures adopted by the present Congress.

Hitler's Satellites

It IS much easier to join a criminal gang than to leave it. Quitters, as members of the Hitler outfit are discovering, are liable to be bumped off without ceremony. And apart from this penalty, genuine repentance requires renunciation of the loot which was the original inducement to sign up. Few gangsters are ready to carry reform to such lengths.

It is difficult, therefore, to take too seriously the peace bids, open or furtive, of the Nazi satellite states. True, most of them realize by now that they have backed a loser, but they are so caught up in Hitler's toils that they find it almost impossible to get free. Moreover, they all cling to the hope that somehow they may be able to hang on to the prizes which Hitler handed to them. Hungary, for instance, was very handsomely bribed before it joined the Axis. It received several big pieces of Czechoslovakia, more than half Transylvania, and some coveted corners of Yugoslavia. In short, its alliance with Hitler brought fulfilment of the Greater Hungary program which ever since the last war had been the sole stock in trade of successive governments dominated by the feudal landlords. No Hungarian government dependent on this class and committed to this policy can now voluntarily surrender the loot. That is why we strongly suspect Regent Horthy and his followers of faking, with German assistance, their much-publicized revolt last week. By presenting the German occupation of their country, obviously designed to strengthen the Carpathian defense line against the advancing Russians, as a coup which they vainly resisted, the Hungarian fascists hope to build up a record which will stand them in good stead at the peace table. By posing as victims of Hitler they hope to be allowed to keep some of their illicit gains and retain their power inside Hungary.

Rumania is in a more awkward spot than the Hungary, for it has been a victim as well as a beneficiary of the Axis. It was forced to yield to Hungary a large portion of Transylvania and to Bulgaria a piece of the Dobrudja. In return it was promised Bessarabia and a slice of the southern Ukraine, but it paid dearly in lives for the temporary conquest of these lands, from which its army is now ignominiously fleeing. It has nothing to gain and much to lose by staying in the Nazi camp. Nevertheless, the current Rumanian peace feelers do not appear to be made in good faith,

The Rumanian emissary, Prince Barbu Stirbey, is being presented as an independent close to the royal family. But he could not have left Rumania without the approval of both the government and the Gestapo, for his visit to Cairo has been attended by a fanfare of publicity. The Prince is blessed with an English wife and close connections with the British interests which owned much of Rumania's oil before the war. Possibly his hope was to convince the British that Russian invasion of Rumania would be disastrous and to offer to surrender provided the country was occupied by Anglo-American troops. Since Britain and America are in no position to march into Rumania, the only reason for putting such terms forward would be to create bad blood between the Western Allies and Russia. This would explain why Stirbey's mission received a German blessing. Fortunately, the British seem to have referred the Prince to the Russians, and the question of armistice terms to the London European Advisory Commission, on which Russia is represented. According to Washington reports, the terms approved are unconditional surrender and Red Army occupation.

In any case, neither Hungary nor Rumania is in a position to surrender without German permission. They are in the front line of the defense system based on the Carpathians and the marshy country between the mouths of the Danube. And with German troops occupying key points and German officials running the police, the governments of these countries will continue to obey Berlin's orders. We can gain nothing by dickering with them, but we can capitalize the dismal failure of their pro-Axis policies by appealing to the workers and peasants to resist both their own collaborationist rulers and the Nazi invader.

Dewey and the Small Investor

ONE will deny that stockholders' suits are subject to abuse, but the evils they involve must be weighed against the far greater corporate abuses from which they offer the small stockholder some slight protection. The Coudert-Mitchell bill passed in the closing hours of the New York legislature would so severely limit the bringing of such suits as to make the remedy available only to the large investor who usually has other means of safeguarding his interests. Under the Coudert-Mitchell bill, a stockholder must post a bond to cover costs unless he owns $50,000 worth of stock or can get the support of 5 per cent of the shareholders. The bond in many instances is likely to be beyond the means of a small stockholder and the task of obtaining the assent of 5 per cent of the shareholders is a difficult one, especially in a widely held corporation.

The bill also introduces the novel principle that a stockholder may not sue for acts committed by a corporation prior to the time when he bought his stock. Were larger and stronger interests involved, this would be attacked as an invasion of property rights. For acts committed long before stock is purchased may seriously affect the value of the securities, and the officials responsible may still be playing a dominant role in the corporation's affairs. It is important to remember that most corporations carry on their affairs in secrecy, providing only a grudging minimum of information to their ostensible "owners." Mismanagement or deliberate plunder of a corporation's assets may remain hidden for years, and may be unknown to the person buying its securities.

We regard the Coudert-Mitchell bill as worthy of national attention. New York is the home of many of our greatest corporations, and suits against their directors cannot be taken into the federal courts unless complete diversity of citizenship is shown. The Wall Street financial interests and corporation lawyers behind this bill may try to get a companion bill introduced in Congress changing the rules of the federal courts to apply similar restrictions to stockholders' suits. Finally, the bill, though a minor one, is a test of Governor Dewey's social outlook. He is being asked to veto the bill, and in making up his mind he will be making a choice between the interests of the small investor and the large corporation.

The laws of New York, by providing judicial supervision over settlements in stockholders' suits and the legal fees granted in them, already furnish considerable safeguards against "strike suits." Additional protection could be granted by permitting the SEC to intervene in stockholders' suits and to be heard on their settlement, as it has the right to be heard today on corporate reorganizations.

It is quite true, as stated in a report for the Chamber of Commerce of New York, that "the derivative action, as maintained by stockholders with a negligible interest in the recovery, is like the informers' action in that it intrusts the correction of general wrongs to litigation for profit." But the remedy is not to take steps which virtually eliminate suits by small stockholders and give corporations protection they do not deserve but to establish some more responsible and public means of correcting corporate abuses. Enactment of the Coudert-Mitchell bill would leave the directors of large corporations freer than they are today to abuse their position of trust in the management of other people's money. The stockholders' suit is little enough protection, and until some better substitute is provided should be left alone. We hope Governor Dewey will veto the bill.

Total Insecurity

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

TWO weeks ago in this page I discussed the "crisis I of confidence" that threatened to engulf the people of Britain and the United States in a wave of cynicism certain to dampen their fighting spirit. Nothing has happened since then to end the threat. Instead, under growing pressure, the leaders of the two countries have either evaded the great issues of policy involved or draped them in such cloudy folds of generalizations that even their contours were lost. Mr. Hull's contribution to the mystification of the people is ably discussed on the page following this one. Mr. Roosevelt, in the course of an otherwise excellent statement urging the free peoples of Europe and Asia to open their doors to the victims of oppression, interjected the suggestion that those persons who "have been going around asking bellhops whether the United States had a foreign policy" could find it right in that statement. This was the President at his worst. People are not asking bellhops about foreign policy; they are asking the President of the United States and his Secretary of State. And they are not getting anything out of them. Mr. Churchill quite correctly told the House of Commons that the Atlantic Charter should be clarified; but when he spoke on Sunday he said nothing about it or about the problems that have turned that set of pious principles into a burning issue.

But our leaders will have to pick this issue up be it ever so hot. Even the President, faced with a hostile Congress and an election campaign, will have to talk about foreign policy and war aims of this country. The people will not be put off with sarcastic flippancies. Men are dying, not only to defeat Hitler and Tojo, but to bring into being a world in which their sons will not have to die the same way. Such a world is not, it seems, emerging from the smoke of this war. Instead the only configurations we can make out look exactly like those of the world that plunged so steeply into the crater. Security through strategic boundaries; security through alliances; security through control of sources of raw materials in distant lands; security through bases; security through the creation of "strong" governments to prevent revolution-security of every unilateral variety, all adding up to total insecurity.

The Atlantic Charter does begin to look rather frayed. No wonder its friends want it either reinforced or altered to fit. I find myself, however, rather indifferent to its fate and I can trace that indifference to a cynicism which, however reprehensible, has existed ever since the document was framed. As Louis Fischer pointed out in his article on Germany two weeks ago, the Charter declared that the nations signing it would "seek no aggrandizement, territorial or other," and that they desired to see

"no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned." Why I never took this to be more than an honest aspiration, I don't know. Perhaps because the whole episode of the meeting of Roosevelt and Churchill at sea, and their dramatic proclamation of the eight-point program that afterwards came to be known as the Atlantic Charter, was so patently a political act rather than a sober consideration of war aims. It was an act staged with the one overpowering purpose of committing the United States to a more complete part in the struggle and, by publishing that commitment, of strengthening the resistance to Hitler in every corner of the globe. This does not mean that the Charter was cynically and disingenuously contrived; I have no doubt that it represented the best hopes and the genuine intentions of its authors. But it has always seemed to me foolish to regard it as a rigid formula to be applied categorically to the problems which will face the nations as they slowly fight their way out of the Nazi stranglehold.

What is needed, in my belief, is an understanding among the powers covering the very explicit issues which the war has washed up to their doors. The words used in the Atlantic Charter about annexations are not as important, for instance, as finding a solution for Eastern Poland which, first, satisfies the wishes of the greater part of its population, second, contributes to Russia's sense of security, and, third, outrages as little as possible the reasonable desires of Poland. Questions like these demand wisdom, flexibility, and above all confidence between the nations responsible for a decision. Since these factors are spectacularly lacking on all sides, it is inevitable that decisions should be made by individual powers according to their own ideas of national interest.

The Red Army is marking out the frontiers in Eastern Europe. The British and Americans are planning the future of France without consulting the National Committee of Liberation, and are making political decisions in Italy without consulting anyone. (It is of the greatest significance, if the report is correct, that Secretary Hull told the Republican Congressmen in his "off-the-record" talk last week that Russia's recognition of Badoglio was caused by the failure of Britain and the United States to keep Moscow informed of what they were doing in Italy.) Britain is troubled over our decision—also taken without consultation—to build a pipeline across Saudi Arabia. Britain feels, too, that its large and historic economic interests in the Argentine entitle it to some say in diplomatic dealings with that country's successive fascist governments. So the game of cross-purposes goes on.

It is this game that endangers the whole future. Somehow it must be stopped or no one of our baffled statesmen will be able to find an answer to the question rising higher, coming now from all sides, increasing in volume: What are we fighting for?

Mr. Hull's Troubles

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 24

EORGE CREEL may be a poor propagandist, but he is a good prophet. In that ignominiously feeble essay in apologetics The War on Cordell Hull, in Collier's for March 11, Mr. Creel predicted that the drive against Hull "is only suspended . . . attacks will start again." The magazine was hardly off the stands before Mr. Hull was once more in hot water. A renewed wave of doubt and dissatisfaction has swept the press and Congress, but its source is quite different from that so luridly portrayed by Mr. Creel—"the ideologists, emotionalists, and fellow-travelers who . . . want him to import his policies from abroad."

In Mr. Creel's official portrait Mr. Hull appeared as a saintly and selfless fellow besieged by the yapping hounds of "the self-styled Liberal Front...led by Earl Browder." I dwell upon the picture not for the purpose of refutation but because of the light it throws on the thinking of Mr. Hull and some of his closest associates. It is difficult to expect current criticism of American foreign policy to be understood and met by people who take so simplistic, melodramatic, and self-pitying a view of their position.

As a matter of fact Earl Browder and the Daily Worker have given Mr. Hull their blessing, but the New York Herald Tribune continues to ask, "Have we a foreign policy?" The Washington Post sees a "diplomatic vacuum." The Wall Street Journal complains that while Mr. Hull "could evolve a statement that said what it meant . . . there was totally lacking any assurance that it would mean what it said." Even the New York Times is distressed, and Arthur Krock's best efforts still leave the case for Mr. Hull as nebulous as the Secretary's rambling tête-à-têtes with the journalistic faithful. The clair-voyant A. A. Berle himself, the Fouché of the State Department, collector of dark dossiers, can hardly detect a red plot in this all but unanimous criticism. Or can he?

The newspapers quoted are neither isolationist nor reactionary. They are conservative supporters of that policy of international cooperation to which Mr. Hull himself is pledged. And it is from men of similar mind in Congress that questioning comes. These sources, journalistic and Congressional, agree with Mr. Hull in principle. Almost everyone does, since the only declarations he permits himself go little beyond the broadest and most incontestable truisms of national interest, international morality, and minimum collective security. It is not quite fair, but also not too unfair, to say that Mr. Hull in the sphere of international policy is like a candidate for office who has firmly indorsed motherhood and the home.

The nature of that "growing interest in the foreign policy of the United States" which Mr. Hull noted on his return from Florida was a growing sense of bewilderment as to just what the devil those principles mean in concrete situations. This in essence was the question put to him by the group of twenty-four Republican members of the House in the private letter which elicited Mr. Hull's Seventeen Points. But since these twenty-four are Republicans who have generally supported the Administration in foreign policy and who agree with the principles Mr. Hull has expressed in the past, it was no answer to their questions to repeat those same principles.

As this is being written, the puzzled twenty-four are meeting with Mr. Hull, and it may be that in the seclusion of his office he will get down to cases, but I doubt it. The Secretary of State met for two hours in executive session Wednesday with the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, which had similar questions to ask. He told his press conference yesterday that in that session he had gone into every subject, no matter how minor, covering American foreign policy. But the news leaking out of the Foreign Affairs Committee indicates that again he was general rather than specific. When pressed, Mr. Hull seems to have given the Senators in private much the same answer he gives the correspondents in public when concrete questions are asked: we must get on with the war.

Mr. Hull has neither the training nor the capacity for getting down to cases. He is a cautious and cagy Southern politician, elderly in mind as in body, and a man of limited interests. The newspapers picture him as a kind of outspoken old Tennessee mountaineer, but what the correspondents see and hear is a man with a lisp to whom the double-talk of the diplomatic communiqué is second nature. It is only in dealing with reciprocal trade agreements that he seems prepared to deal with the specific, to grapple with facts. On other matters, even within the department, his thinking seems instinctively to seek the comfortable featherbed of generalities.

When he needs to justify a policy, Mr. Hull seems to rely on two intellectual devices. One is the use of a set of moral truisms invoked when they serve his purpose or argument, like those cited in protest against Mexico's expropriation of the oil companies. The other, which he falls back upon when the disparity between his general principles and his concrete policies becomes too evident, is an appeal to expediency. Before the war the expediency was defended on political grounds; since the war, on military. Thus in Mr. Creel's apologia Mr. Hull's prewar policies on Spain, Japan, etc., are defended on the ground that a stronger position would have been politically inexpedient, while critics of the policies on Vichy, Badoglio, Darlan, etc., are told again that these were dictated by military expediency.

The latter is a difficult argument to answer in war time when the facts are not fully known and political compromise may be justified; one can note only that it is almost always a rightist orientation rather than a popular one which is adopted and defended on those grounds. But the former raises questions which go to the heart of Mr. Hull's recurrent difficulties. To lay the blame for pre-war mistakes of policy on Mr. Hull would be nonsense; here as elsewhere the people themselves must bear major responsibility for the troubles which appeasement brought upon them. Are not leaders, however, under an obligation to risk the politically inexpedient when critical policies are being formed? Leadership consists in more than scenting which is the popular parade to follow. It is here that Mr. Hull is open to criticism. And one of the reasons why he fails to make policy clear, why he clings instead to generalities, is that now as in the past he is bent on evading the risks which are the obligations of leadership. Arthur Krock, defending Mr. Hull today, speaks of his difficulties in "discovering what will be acceptable to Congress." This is only half the task of a Secretary of State. The other half is making up his mind as to what is the right policy and using his influence to make that policy acceptable to Congress.

This is not to say that clear lines of policy are always possible, especially in time of war, or to deny that compromise is inseparable from effective politics, except in certain types of crises. The world military situation, as well as the coming elections, impose their necessities upon the Secretary of State and the State Department. But I think the average man understands this all too well from the comparable, if minor, "diplomatic problems" of his own existence, his adjustment to his family and his job. A little more frankness on the compromises, coupled with a clearer and more concrete picture of ultimate purposes, would go far to end the unrest among the supporters of the Administration's announced aims.

Perhaps my assumptions are too generous. I suspect that most of the compromises defended on the ground of expediency were entered into from policy rather than necessity. Has there ever been an indication, for example, that Mr. Hull found Franco hard to swallow? Or that he lamented the necessity of collaborating with undemocratic forces in Latin America? I also suspect that one reason our foreign policy isn't more concrete on particular matters is that there is no foreign policy beyond a combination of generalities, a collection of prejudices, and a tendency to drift—and to drift, in the absence of countervailing forces, toward all that represents the old order in Europe, Asia, and Latin America.

Green Pastures for Fascists

BY SERGIO BAGU

T IS impossible to understand Argentina's turbulent political scene without a knowledge of the country's economic development during the past fifteen years. The wealth of the oligarchy which held power until 1916, and which recaptured it by force in 1930, was founded on agriculture and stock-raising. Exchange of products with European countries, especially with England, created the illusion that Argentina's economy could withstand any upheaval. About fifteen years ago light industry began to gather impetus, and in 1932 it embarked on a dizzying expansion. Though it received no help from an oligarchic regime, this industry, with its diversified types of production, was able to minimize in Argentina the effects of the world depression of 1929.

In 1937 the value of industrial production had become 39.6 per cent of the value of total production; agricultural products amounted to 35.8 per cent of the total and cattle products to 17.9 per cent. Industry was now the country's most important economic activity and was employing a very large number of people. Aided by European capital obtained before the present struggle, it entered on a period of prolonged if sometimes interrupted prosperity. The industrial proletariat multiplied, and the urban middle class increased enormously in both numbers and wealth. So far the landowning oligarchy has benefited by this prosperity, but ultimately it will be destroyed by the resulting economic and social transformation of the country.

THE OLIGARCHY IN POWER

The oligarchy which governed until 1916 was progressive and liberal, looking toward France for its ideas and procedures. The oligarchy which recaptured power in 1930 was avaricious and dictatorial; and it admired Mussolini. In 1932 Uriburu's dictatorship—the first after eighty years of constitutional government-gave way to General Justo's Presidency. This regime showed a surface respect for law and order, but was actually a semidictatorship based on fraud and violence. Its corrupt methods created an atmosphere of political immorality, and there were flagrant administrative scandals. Soon the "gilded youth" who had acclaimed Uriburu turned fascist and formed Argentina's first fascist party, the Civic Legion of Argentina. General Justo was supported by the Civic Legion and used it unofficially on numerous occasions to intimidate his democratic adversaries. He persecuted the workers' movement and by Machiavellian tactics managed to effect the disorganization of the country's largest democratic party, the Radical Civic Union.

General Justo paved the road to fascism with two innovations. First, the federal government was completely reorganized; thereafter, like the national economy, it was to operate for the benefit of the big capitalists and to the detriment of small business. Local autonomy was destroyed and a mass bureaucracy created. Second, the growth of militarism was fostered, chiefly through the creation of a Military Lyceum for boys from twelve to eighteen. Upon graduation from the Lyceum, students entered the Army or Navy School. Thus when they finished their training, at the age of twenty-two, they had passed ten formative years segregated from the civilian milieu. This system of education, combined with the privileges enjoyed by the army, created an anti-social military caste that admired Nazism and Fascism. When General Justo's regime came to an end in 1938, La Prensa, a leading newspaper of Buenos Aires, termed his administration the worst the country had ever endured.

BRITISH CAPITAL

During this entire period British capital played an unfortunate role. For many years British railway and tramway companies fought a losing war against motor and highway transportation, against Argentine labor, against Argentine and United States capital. During General Justo's Presidency a diplomatic mission headed by Vice-President Julio A. Roca was sent to London to iron out difficulties which the Ottawa empire pacts had created for Argentine cattle raisers. Shortly after the return of the Roca mission two bills were introduced into the Chamber of Deputies. One established a monopoly of national transport that favored English railway interests. The other established a monopoly of transportation in Buenos Aires that operated to the benefit of English, French, Belgian, and Spanish capital invested in street railways and subways. At about this time Lisandro de la Torre, the outstanding personality of the century in Argentine politics, denounced the oligarchy in the Senate for making illegal deals with certain English firms, among which were a number of packing houses. De la Torre's exposures aroused the entire nation. The director of an English packing house in Argentina tried to flee with the proofs of his guilt, but the Senate had him arrested in the halls of Congress. When turmoil in the Senate was at its height, Senator Enzo Bordabehere, while attempting to protect De la Torre from physical attack, was shot to death. Throughout this period of frenzied speculation and political immorality the oligarchy, with the complicity of British capital, was amassing fabulous wealth against the day of its inevitable decline.

Argentine fascism had its inception in this period; it was cradled in the mansions of the wealthy that line Quintana Avenue and in the offices of certain lawyers for English enterprises. Among its earliest theorists and leaders were Clodomiro Zavalía, a lawyer for the railways, and Juan P. Ramos and Alberto Uriburu, lawyers for the Argentine Electric Company, member of an international trust dominated by British capital. The fascists of that time were called "Nationalists," a term which is English rather than Argentinian in origin.

TRAJECTORY OF FASCISM

The Civic Legion disappeared, leaving behind it various small fascist organizations, and after a few years the so-called Nationalist movement became completely disrupted. During the Spanish civil war it supported Franco and always applauded Hitler and Mussolini. Its leaders counted on a military uprising to establish fascism in Argentina, but the uprising did not come, and its members gradually dispersed.

Later Hitler's impressive diplomatic victories gave new life to native fascists. They began to deny their connections with the oligarchy and with politicians friendly to English concerns. The "gilded youth" joined with some elements of the middle class and numerous army and navy men to organize fascist groups, secret "revolutionary" cells. Admiring Hitler, they sought to reconcile their political views with their militant Catholicism. They began to circulate such slogans as "Down with political intrigue," "Down with oligarchic governments," "Down with political parties." They advocated the corporate state with a chief of state and no elections, obligatory Catholicism, rupture of relations with Britain and the United States, a n d unconditional friendship with Hitler Germany and Franco Spain.

The army and navy were flooded with Nazi propaganda, and government officials received numerous personal gifts from Hitler. Certain elements of the Catholic church actively aided the movement by publishing such fascist newspapers as Sol y Luna, Crisol, Nueva Política, and Nuevo Orden. The Investigating Committee of Anti-Argentine Activities of the Chamber of Deputies disclosed in December, 1942, that Clarinada, an anti-Semitic and anti-Communist review, was published by the Divine Word congregation in Buenos Aires.

Fascism hoped to capitalize on the profound popular resentment against English business concerns in Argentina. The Buenos Aires Nazi dailies, El Pampero and Cabildo, carried on a violent campaign against the city transport monopoly. When war broke out, Nazism thought it had a golden opportunity to capture the masses. With Britain occupied by the conflict, why should not Argentina free itself from its humiliating semi-colonial position? But while at first the masses were anything but pro-British, once the Battle of Britain began, popular sentiment rallied ardently to the support of the Allies. Without relinquishing their antagonism toward British capital, which was impeding the country's normal development, the Argentine people became the most powerful group in Latin America on the side of the Allies.

THE COUP OF JUNE 4, 1943

At the close of 1942 the Battle of Stalingrad was the determining factor in Argentine internal politics. Enrique Ruiz Guiñazú, Minister of Foreign Affairs, confidentially told his friends that according to informed strategists in the Argentine army Hitler would take Stalingrad before the end of the year, occupy Moscow soon afterward, and dictate peace from the Kremlin. The neutrality of the Castillo government was antagonistic toward the United States and benevolent toward Britain (its Minister of the Interior, Culaciatti, served as lawyer for powerful English interests), but at the same time looked toward a German victory. The fall of Stalingrad was expected to vindicate this policy.

But Stalingrad did not fall, and in consequence the oligarchy was completely disoriented, especially its representatives in the army and navy. During the early months of 1943 certain army officers, pro-Nazi until then, decided that it would be expedient to modify the country's foreign policy and to establish more friendly diplomatic relations with the United States. Among these men was General Pedro Pablo Ramírez, then Secretary of War. A Presidential election was to be held in September, 1943. The democratic parties had begun the arduous task of finding a common platform, and there seemed to be a definite possibility of a powerful popular movement that would force President Castillo to hold a fair election. It was clear to the militarists that the time had come for decisive measures.

Their first step was to prevent the masses, excited by the Soviet victories and the invasion of North Africa, from celebrating in the streets. Next they accepted subterranean overtures from the more conservative elements of the Radical Civic Union, hoping thereby to destroy the democratic-unity movement and further the candidacy of General Ramírez. President Castillo, however, who had his own candidate, the landowner Robustiano Patrón Costas, blocked this maneuver and forced the militarists to act immediately.

The coup d'état of June 4 was the result. The army officers who led it lacked n program and did not know what to do with their easy victory. They had a vague notion that the best course would be to imitate Getulio Vargas's corporate state and to adopt a policy of pan-American cooperation, During its first weeks in power the dictatorship courted fascists and anti-fascists alike, and in an attempt to enlist popular support even arrested several members of Castillo's Cabinet. But from the start it persecuted the Communists and the workers' organizations.

Civilian and military Nazi cells close to the government awaited their opportunity to take it over completely. That opportunity occurred at the end of August when Minister of Foreign Affairs Storni made his infamous request of the United States for armaments and machinery and was promptly rebuked by Secretary Hull. Early in October the dictatorship went completely fascist, counting on the support of the army and navy, organized fascist groups, and influential sectors of the Catholic church. In addition, it relied on the good-will of certain elements representing British capital and on the desperate support of Nazi capital, now fleeing Europe en bloc.

Toward the close of 1943 the dictatorship undertook a program for the political and economic coordination of South America. A customs agreement was arranged with Chile, and immediately afterward a plot was organized to overthrow President Rios. The Paraguayan dictator was attracted by this program, and a plot was hatched with him to obtain power in Bolivia. But in all these schemes one factor was badly calculated—the patience of the United States State Department. When the origins of the plot against Bolivia were revealed, the fascist dictatorship was split. One group, led by Ramírez, wished to return to the earlier policy of imitating Getulio Vargas. Another, led by Perón, urged open defiance of the United States. First Ramírez triumphed and then Perón.

THE DEMOCRATIC FAILURE

To complete the picture it must be pointed out that the crisis has seemed to paralyze those who should stand most firmly at their posts, the democratic parties. Not one of them has been able to evolve a plan of action. The Progressive Democratic Party and the Socialist Party have played academic politics when they should have been more realistic and daring than the reactionaries. At first the Communist Party employed sectarian tactics but subsequently launched the idea of uniting all democratic forces; this idea was taken over by the Socialists in 1942. The Radical Civic Union has been in a state of decay for some time; the great party of the middle class, it had only a nebulous program, making a maximum of concessions to conservative ideas. It committed a major error when it failed to utter a single word of condemnation of the Ramírez government.

One radical group under the leadership of Amadeo Sabattini, former governor of Córdoba, supported neutrality during the Castillo regime and permitted dangerous contacts with Nazi elements. The Fuerza de Orientación Radical de la Juventud Argentina, a small radical youth movement, has turned frankly to Nazism. Other groups within the radical movement engaged in the most questionable transactions during the critical years of the Justo and Castillo regimes. A similarly vacillating policy was pursued by a number of powerful labor organizations—the General Confederation of Labor, the Railway Union, and Fraternity. All have seemed incapable of taking the slightest defensive action against a reactionary government. Fortunately, the population as a whole is staunchly democratic.

The present dictatorship, like the Castillo government, has been able to achieve its objectives only because it has failed to encounter resistance from democratic political parties and workers' organizations. It has retreated, as did Castillo, every time its actions have aroused a forceful protest. Democracy has lost the first battle in Argentina more through the weakness of democratic organizations than through the strength of fascism.

Brawl at the Officers' Club

BY MANUEL SEOANE

Santiago, Chile

IN ONE month, from January 26 to February 24, Argentina went through three bloodless revolutions, and is now in a state of chaos. The naval officers are disgusted with the army officers, and the latter are divided among themselves. Probably neither General Ramírez nor Colonel Perón but some other officer in the Army Register will profit by the free-for-all unleashed by the cynical government that took power on June 4. The people observe these events as from a distance, knowing that they are all signs of decay and that there will be other acts before the drama is ended.

THE BREAK WITH THE AXIS

It has now been established that the break with the Axis was a bloodless revolution engineered by Ramírez against the United Officers Group (Grupo de Oficiales Unificados) led by Perón. In effect Ramírez was the G. O. U.'s prisoner, and just as when he was Minister of War under Castillo, he slyly awaited an opportunity to strike a blow from within. Suddenly it came. The Bolivian revolution was proved to have been instigated by the Argentine army men Perón, Gonzales, and Filipi, and Britain and the United States were annoyed. Both powers were on the verge of breaking off relations with Buenos Aires. Ramírez, a canny Creole, then decided to kill two birds with one stone. On January 26, after a brief struggle with the G.O.U., but with the support of General Gilbert, the Foreign Minister, and of Colonel Ramírez, the Chief of Police, he decreed the break with the Axis. Logically, Perón should have resigned at this point, but the Colonel too was a clever Creole, and he decided to await his moment.

Ramírez and Perón now entered on the second round of their struggle for power. In order to improve his position Perón strengthened his connections with the Young Officers group. He joined forces with Colonel Filomeno Velasco, leader of a group of dissatisfied captains and lieutenants, and with Commander Julio Lagos, an influential and turbulent aviation officer. (Velasco has just been made Chief of Police and Lagos Minister of the Post Office.)

A second revolution was scheduled for February 14. On that night 600 young officers led by Perón, Velasco, and Lagos entered Buenos Aires in cars to kidnap President Ramírez. By calling out a large number of police Colonel Ramírez thwarted the plot. His situation was so hazardous, however, that President Ramírez gave in and resigned. The plan to declare war was frustrated. Perón had won round two. But Ramírez did not throw in the sponge. He retired to his corner till the next round.

The struggle for supreme power between the two parties was intensified. The contending forces may be divided into the following groups: (1) generals and colonels favoring the Allied cause, headed by General Rawson, who led the coup d'état of June 4, General Anaya, ex-Minister of Education, and several others; (2) officers who are adherents of Ramírez and who are led by General Gilbert, Colonel Ramírez, and Colonel Avalos, chief of the Campo de Mayo troops; (3) the G.O.U. group headed by Colonel Perón, who went recently from a cocktail party at the British embassy to a supper at the German House of Bayer; (4) the Young Officers group led by Colonel Filomeno Velasco, which demands fulfilment of the promises made on June 4: (5) a group of navy officers disgusted with the coup that forced the resignation of Admiral Sueyro, Minister of the Navy, because he was considered "not representative." (Their irritation was increased by the appointment of General Pistarini, famous for his mental limitations, as provisional Minister of the Navy-an army officer made head of the navy-until the post was assumed by Admiral Teisaire.)

In this confused situation Perón had excellent cards to play to further the discontent of the Young Officers. Ramírez's resignation, sent to the president of the Supreme Court, Dr. Repetto, was intercepted by members of the G. O. U., who realized that it would create international difficulties, and on February 24 Ramírez was forced at the point of a gun to "delegate power" to General Farrell on the pretext of illness. From this third revolution Perón again emerged as provisional victor.

FARRELL, THE PUPPET

Farrell's designation as President cannot be taken seriously. An old gaucho, excellent at strumming a guitar and singing ranch songs, he is completely lacking in political drive. As an infantry officer he spent some time in Italy and returned an expert on mountain fighting. He is known to be sympathetic to Italian Fascism, but personally he is one of those amiable big men who are as clay in the hands of a powerful manipulator. In this case the power behind the throne is Colonel Perón.

As an admirer of Italian Fascism, Farrell is completely contemptuous of civilians. He believes that Argentina needs a strong man and that it must keep out of the war. He was overheard defending neutrality at the Chilean embassy one day in the following terms: "The war?

Drawing by Quintanilla

Colonel Perón

Don't joke with me. Why should the Argentinians enter it? Travel through any country today and you will find shortages of cars, bread, sugar, butter—because they are at war. Here there are plenty of cars, butter, bread, meat, the best there is. Why should we lose all this? Neutrality is the best business in this war. Ideas? Don't make me laugh, they are all alike. Churchill and Roosevelt will have to learn from Hitler and Mussolini; they are following in their footsteps. They rule by force because that is the only method that works in this era."

That is the position of the new President. As for the G. O. U., which overthrew Ramírez and is led by Perón, its leading principle is opposition to a declaration of war on the Axis. Its members admire Nazism, and if Germany had not been losing the war, they would very possibly have succeeded in breaking off relations with the United Nations and thus creating a bridgehead for fascism in South America. The new elements that compose the Cabinet are rabid fascists, especially the leaders of the so-called "youth movement." The presence of Rear Admiral Scasso and of General von der Becke, Chief of Staff, are definite proof that dyed-in-the-wool Nazis are close to the helm.

THE YOUNG OFFICERS

What happened on February 24 was that Perón captured the new revolution unleashed against the ineptitude of the leaders of the June 4 coup (among these leaders had been both Ramírez and Perón himself). The latter's astuteness in making Ramírez the butt of all resentment for the failure to fulfil the leaders' promises has given Perón temporary dominance. But no one can say how long Farrell and Perón will last. The Young Officers, so called because they have not yet enjoyed the pleasures of power, are protesting because the objectives of June 4 still remain unrealized. They have sounded the slogan "Fight or Die," but all they have really done is march through the streets of Buenos Aires. They ask: What has happened to the decree lowering rents? What has happened to the dissolution of the Governing Councils? What has happened to all the bright banners of June 4, which for a while inflamed certain ingenuous sections of the population? These banners, they say, have been ignominiously lowered, and the Military Government is revealed as a heavy, bureaucratic mass that advances sluggishly, producing bruises and wounds instead of friends and fervor.

The Young Officers are determined that Argentina shall rapidly undergo organic reforms of a fascist nature. The protagonists in the coming struggle may, of course, shift, but at the moment any of the following events may be expected: (1) The Young Officers may make a second attempt to bring Velasco or Lagos to power and to overthrow both President Farrell and the G. O. U. (2) Perón may set up a frank and open dictatorship, supported by the G. O. U. (3) Ramírez, who would like a fourth round, and who would be supported by Colonel Avalos, chief of the Campo de Mayo garrison, and by many other army men, may attempt a come-back. (4) The Argentine navy, supported by pro-Allied elements in the army and air force, may overthrow the government and hand over the power to the president of the Supreme Court, who would call an election immedi-

One of these four possibilities will surely come to pass, for the present situation cannot last. With its political parties dissolved, its press censored, its jails jammed with prisoners, and its militarists completely arrogant, Argentina is passing through one of the darkest stages in its history. But there are imponderable, invincible factors that will ultimately destroy the guilty. The people of Argentina will have their revenge.

Their feelings can be indicated by a brief anecdote. Not long ago a group of militarist ministers arrived at a crowded horse show in an open carriage and made the circuit of the track before crowded galleries. The public maintained a discreet silence. A little later the empty carriage went around the same course, before the same galleries, and the public broke out in a deafening ovation.

Why Stalin Acts That Way

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

HINGS have now come to a pass where foreign observers in Moscow—diplomats and correspondents alike—open their morning Pravda with breathless anxiety, expecting some new shock. Of late they have had a good many. There was the recognition of the Badoglio regime, for instance, just about the last thing anyone would have expected from the Soviet government. Earlier there had been the Cairo peace-scare story, the bewildering Pravda attack on Wendell Willkie, and many other irritating incidents.

Let's get one thing straight. The riddle of Soviet foreign policy, if it is a riddle, does not lie in its basic aims and concepts. These have been repeatedly set forth in Stalin's speeches and in the Soviet press. The question What does Russia want? can be answered in two phrases—territorial integrity and security. Territorial integrity, to the Russians, means the status quo of June, 1941. In other words, Russia will certainly insist upon the annexation of eastern Poland, up to the Curzon line, and of the Baltic states, Bessarabia, and those parts of Finland that were acquired in 1940. Security means territorial guaranties against renewed aggression or foreign intervention, guaranties in the form of a cordon sanitaire in reverse, that is, an outer layer of friendly or partly controlled states along the Soviet boundaries.

No, the riddle is not in the things Russia wants but in the tactics it employs to obtain them. These tactics are, to say the least, disconcerting, and they have created the idea that the Kremlin is deliberately waging a war of nerves against its allies. Washington and London speak of a "needling diplomacy" and do not conceal their bewilderment at being thus treated by an ally.

What is behind this strange policy of constantly badgering one's friends? It is not easy to find a satisfactory answer, but I think the Soviet line of reasoning, reduced to its simplest elements, runs something like this: Our partners, America and Britain, have in many ways the edge on us. Britain has already a world empire and won't let any of it go if it can help it. The United States has reached its natural limits of geographical expansion and controls, in fact, the entire Western Hemisphere. We Russians are newcomers. We didn't have a chance under the czars; we were ostracized and quarantined after the revolution; we have been admitted to good society only in the last two years. And now that we have come at last, at an unheard-of cost in lives and goods, within sight of the things we believe to be rightfully ours, our worthy allies seem to have only one aim-to prevent us from sharing the dominant position and high standards of life they have enjoyed. Every time we indicate that we want this or that, we get a sermon on the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms and a solemn assurance that anything we do on our own initiative is "unilateral" and will not be "recognized." Well, we won't stand for it.

If memoranda, notes of protest, verbal representations, conferences, and other such accepted instruments of diplomacy could obtain results, and quickly, the Russians probably would resort to them. But since experience has taught them that he who demands or expostulates without being able to back up his arguments by force waits a long time, and in the end may achieve nothing, they have developed new diplomatic techniques of their own.

One of the most effective is the jolting technique. Its frequent use springs from the realization that the foreign policy of Washington and London moves in grooves furrowed by centuries of professional diplomacy. The Foreign Office, in particular, has developed a crusted routine. Great respect is felt for the conventional approach. Tradition reigns supreme, nicely balanced with precedents and taboos. Time is no object. Russia, politically a young nation, is exasperated by the cautious, noncommittal approach to burning problems which is so characteristic of Anglo-Saxon diplomacy. It wants things done quickly, issues settled quickly. Having discovered that a ten-line story in Pravda produces a greater effect than ten pouches filled with diplomatic notes, it adopts the principle that what moves in grooves must be jolted out of them.

Another favorite technique of the Russians is mystification. It consists in keeping everybody guessing about their real purpose, and then suddenly flashlighting the obscurity with a startling move. This technique has one certain merit: it keeps the world hanging on the words and deeds of the Kremlin. Countries, like individuals, enjoy being the focus of attention.

Then there is the use of the "Finnish bath," which as all northerners know has a most stimulating effect. The Finnish bath is characterized by sudden shifts from hot to cold. One moment our diplomats are warmed by ardent protestations of friendship from the Kremlin; the next they find themselves under an ice-cold shower. Very healthy, if you are used to it, but if you aren't—.

Perhaps the most disturbing of Russia's habits is that of periodically slapping down its friends. As Pravda's comment on Wendell Willkie has shown, no friend of the Soviet Union, however prominent, sympathetic, or sincere, is ever safe from suddenly being jumped upon by some official Soviet scribe. The provocation may be trivial or entirely lacking. This sort of thing is almost incomprehensible to the Western mind, which is wont to think in terms of "How to Win Friends and Influence People." The simple truth is that the Soviets are no more eager to make friends than they are afraid to make enemies.

We must also take into account Stalin's peculiar sense of humor, which he shares with several other top-rank Soviet leaders. In a rustic and somewhat boyish fashion the Russians love to play pranks and practical jokes on their dignified allies. With the same sure instinct for hilarious effect that prompts a schoolboy to stick pins in teacher's seat or that makes Abbott crush a cream pie in Costello's face, the Soviet diplomat will pull the chair from under his ally's coat-tails just as they sit down to talk over common interests. Next to the spectacle of Hitler on the run, nothing amuses the Russian public more than the sight of a crumpled stuffed shirt or of a pair of striped pants dangling helplessly in the air.

Our reaction to these capers has not been very helpful to us in the past—or rather it has been a great help to our facetious ally. Usually we wrap ourselves in our wounded dignity and soberly protest that such behavior must "depress every friend of Russia in the two democracies." We get up, dust off our striped trousers, and solemnly assure the guffawing Russians that this latest prank of theirs will have "anything but a wholesome effect upon public opinion in the United States and Great Britain." And when we have fully recovered, we sit down and write an open letter to a good friend in Moscow asking him whether he "cannot explain to some of his associates the importance of not doing these things."

How else can we defend ourselves against such antics? In the first place, obviously, by taking care not to expose ourselves to them. We should be constantly on guard against the Kremlin's odd penchant for surprise moves and practical jokes, never take anything for granted, always look out for the next shock, and by anticipating it lessen its effect. Secondly, we should display more sangfroid, and more pride. Why should we let every Pravda story throw us into a dither? Why quote every hostile editorial in War and the Working Class in full and thus make the editors of that bellicose sheet feel ever more important?

The Russians have a healthy respect for might. They are full of admiration for the technical achievements of the United States. They want to be friends with us. And they want to bargain. Let us be firm in essential matters, generous where concessions are possible, and good-humoredly indifferent to their pranks.

TYPICAL QUOTE from "Political Christianity for the Republican Party," a booklet sponsored by the Christian Democratic Corporation, Washington, and distributed by The Christocrats, Detroit: "In view of our magnificent past, whatever could have led the misguided Anti-Christs to believe that they could seize control of our government -as they have done through their control of the Democratic Party-and through this illegal control of our government, attempt to make us their dupes? All the Machiavellian conniving and machinations of the Anti-Christs, and their miserable political stooges, cannot delay for even a moment the Republican Party's on-rushing Rendezvous with Destiny-which is to again, for the third time, unmask and strike down the evil forces which have plotted to destroy Democracy and erase Christianity from the hearts and minds of mankind."

HAROLD W. HIRTH of Milwaukee, in an address to the Minnesota Retail Hardware Association, called on the assembled merchants to give preference to discharged soldiers in their post-war hiring, because the soldiers have learned the value of discipline: "They will do what they are told to do and when they are told to do it without question."

THOUGH the Communist press is saying sweet things about big business these days, the big-business press is not interested. The March 18 issue of Business Week admits that employers who deal with Communist-dominated unions "now have the most peaceful labor relations in industry," but in the same article gives its blessing to James G. Thimmes, new head of the California C. I. O. Council, whose chief virtue in its eyes is his long record of opposition to Communist elements.

ON JUNE 13, 1942, an item in this column referred to Dr. Robert Hercod, general secretary of the International Bureau Against Alcoholism, Lausanne, Switzerland, as "Robert Herrod, a Swiss Nazi." Because of the interruption of postal service between the United States and Switzerland by the war, Mr. Hercod did not see the item until recently. The Nation is happy to report, on the authority of the Swiss consul general in New York, that Mr. Hercod's name is spelled with a c and that he is not a Nazi. Our apologies to him.

Nazis Under Twenty-one

BY KARL O. PAETEL

HEN we contemplate the vast structure of laws and ideological directives by which the youth of the Third Reich have been pressed into a single educational mold, we can easily believe that all German youth, as the Nazis assert, have been made into fanatical National Socialists. But the facts are not quite so simple as that.

Originally, in its "fighting years," the National Socialist Party enlisted boys in its Storm Troops. At present the Storm Troops are little more than a "reserve" of militant party members, and the indoctrination of youth is in the hands of the Hitlerjugend (Hitler Youth). Outside of Germany one hears two completely opposing views of the temper of these young people. One is that they are already in open rebellion against the hard work and poor food in the camps, that they have succumbed either to war weariness or to the influence of a powerful underground movement. The other is that they are barbaric young Huns who denounce their parents to the authorities, rape schoolgirls, and kill people with their "marching daggers" just for fun, and who, as soldiers, consider sadism the whole meaning of life. Each of these views generalizes a single aspect of the situation and thus distorts it.

The young people who make up the Deutsches Jungvolk, the Bund Deutscher Mädchen, the Werk, Glaube, und Schönheit group, and finally the Hitlerjugend are not by any means all alike, though their uniforms tend to make them look that way. Having been caught in the Nazi educational system at many different ages, they react in different ways to the tenets of the state and party bureaucracy. Moreover, the group of aggressive National Socialists who composed the Hitlerjugend, the N. S. Studentenbund, and the Storm Troops before Hitler came to power provided only a fraction of the "Führer material" needed for the task of German youth leadership, and it was necessary to recruit leaders from the many other youth groups that flourished before 1933. Obviously the new leaders, who entered the Hitlerjugend after the dissolution of all other groups, brought with them more or less clearly defined sets of beliefs which varied from official Nazi doctrine. It is true that those who tried to do "party work" for groups with other beliefs were soon excluded from the new organizations; for a time they had considerable influence in the Deutsches Jungvolk. There can be no doubt, however, that among the older generation of youth leaders, including teachers and Hitlerjugend functionaries, the militant National Socialists are a minority, albeit a very active minority. The others, though most of them are of course "loyal" to National Socialism, have a somewhat different spiritual attitude owing to earlier connections with religious, proletarian, or youth organizations.

No such conditioning has been experienced by the younger generation, who at the time of Hitler's accession to power were ten to fourteen years old. Their introduction to Nazi education and the new Weltanschauung through membership in the Hitlerjugend was an ecstatic and challenging entry into a new way of life. Having known nothing with which to compare National Socialism, most of them were swept off their feet by the Nazi idea. It is indisputable that a great many of these young people, who have never known any life except the fellowship of camps and marching, have participated in it with an exalted sense of devotion—though there are many bleating opportunists among them-and today ask nothing more than to be Hitler's warriors. It may be assumed that as these age groups are taken into the army they maintain the same attitude.

German young people have always been highly organized. In the time of the Weimar Republic some 4,500,000 boys and girls under twenty-one belonged to organizations affiliated with the National Board of German Youth Associations. Approximately 10 per cent of the total membership belonged to twenty youth groups conducted by Protestant religious denominations; about 20 per cent belonged to ten Catholic groups; the various Socialist political organizations had youth divisions with about 400,000 members, a little less than 10 per cent of the total, not counting the Communist youth groups, which were not affiliated with the National Board. Twelve organizations run by the trade unions included another 10 per cent, and eight large athletic associations 35 per cent. Another 2 per cent were divided among twenty-eight autonomous youth leagues, 12 per cent belonged to the National Civil Youth (a generic term covering such organizations as the Union of Germans in Foreign Countries, the Young Germany League, etc.), and 1 per cent to organizations connected with political parties of the right and center. There were also a number of political groups not affiliated with the National Board, such as the Wehrbund, the Junior Black-Redand-Gold Banner, the Red Youth Front, the Junior Scharnhorst Society, a few Jewish clubs—and the Hitler Youth

If we allow on the one hand for some duplication caused by overlapping memberships, and on the other for the probability that some organizations existed which were not included in this reckoning, it appears that before Hitler came to power a round 5,000,000 German youth were organized in 120 large and countless small groups.

All that is now fundamentally changed. In an address to the Hitlerjugend in 1934 Hitler stated his purpose clearly: "It is important to bring every member of the new generation under the spell of National Socialism, in order that they may never be spiritually seduced by any of the old generation."

The National Socialist Party rode to power on the shoulders of politically active youth, and it wants to have the unequivocal loyalty of the rising generation. Grammar school, high school, Arbeitsdienst, Landjahr, Storm Troops, and Elite Guards, all these, like the educational work in the army, are merely the systematic completion of the education begun in the Hitlerjugend, whose purpose is to create members for the ruling party.

In 1933, after the "revolution," the Hitlerjugend absorbed all the organizations affiliated with the National Board. The left groups completely disappeared; from the evangelical and Catholic groups the Hitlerjugend got some 3,000,000 members; after the promulgation on December 1, 1933, of a decree requiring all young people to join, without exception, its membership rose to 7,000,000. The Anschluss of Austria added 700,000 and the absorption of the Sudeten Germans another 300,000, bringing the total to 8,000,000. By the outbreak of the war the membership had grown to 11,000,000 in Germany proper, 1,100,000 in Austria, and 550,000 in the Sudetenland. In addition, there are many boys in the army, the Landjahr, and the Arbeitsdienst who are not formally members of the Hitlerjugend. These amount to 4,000,000 in Germany, 400,000 in Austria, and 200,-000 in the Sudetenland.

Thus of the 25,000,000 persons under twenty-one years of age in Greater Germany (22,000,000 in Germany proper, 2,200,000 in Austria, 1,100,000 in the Sudetenland), some 8,000,000 are in the Hitlerjugend, 4,600,000 in the armed forces and the various labor services, and 12,650,000 will become members when they are old enough. There is no schoolboy, no apprentice, no college student in Germany who is not a member of some National Socialist youth organization. There is no young people's religious or athletic group which is not affiliated with—and dependent upon—the Nazi Party's Youth Division. Education, from the first grade through the graduate seminar, is oriented to the "spirit of National Socialism"—"Lead, Führer; we will follow." There is no other educational purpose or direction in the Third Reich.

It is becoming increasingly clear, however, that the fruits of this educational system are not exactly what was expected. Correspondents are reporting more and more frequently that young German prisoners of war are "fed up" with the National Socialist idea. The manifesto issued by the Munich students last year, for which about twenty of them were executed, was a clear indication that a rebellious, idealistic spirit, a vague, unpolitical yearning for freedom, is beginning to stir in the breasts of German students.

I remember a conversation I had with a young German, a group leader in the Hitlerjugend in his first year at the university, a month before the outbreak of war. With regard to the war which he fully expected to come he said this: "At first it will be impossible to do anything, because everyone will be cooperating. But after a while, when we have lain in the mud and filth long enough, and the fatigue and hardship and danger have destroyed the first illusion, then we can begin to talk with others and show them that they have no interest in Hitler's war."

This attitude, once found only in isolated individuals, has become widespread. Consider this protest, which has been passed from hand to hand in Germany by young soldiers:

I look at my buddy. His uniform, hands, face, speech, thought grow more and more like the earth. I see a young man being transformed into a dumb creature, without name, age, or personality. Sleep, something hot to eat, cigarettes, obedience, waiting—that is his life. Once he scratched some words on the wall with his thumb-nail—"Father, Mother." Was it mere aimless scrawling to kill time? Or was it something more—one last effort to keep his identity from being obliterated?

[Part II of this article, the third of a series on Germany to be published by the Political War Section, will appear next week. In it Mr. Paetel will discuss the factors which may influence German youth to accept democracy and the role youth will play in the reconstruction of Europe.]

German Efficiency

JAEREN, Norway, was a prosperous chicken-farming center in 1940. Then the Nazis came. They killed and ate 90 per cent of the chickens and made no provision for replacing them. But the situation has its brighter side. The empty hen-houses are now being used as school buildings by the children of Jaeren, whose former schools are now barracks for Nazi troops.

Behind the Enemy Line

A FTER several years of war, administrative procedure in every country becomes a fixed routine. It is changed, even in details, only when there is some special reason for a change.

What was the special reason for the decree, issued on February 28, which suddenly, in the fifth year of war, ordered that a photograph must be attached to the identification papers of every German soldier? "The decree provides," said the German News Bureau in making the announcement, "that hereafter soldiers' pay-books will be regarded as identification only if they contain the owner's half-length photograph, without headgear, affixed to the front inside cover. The photograph must be stamped with the designation of the soldier's unit. Below it the bearer must sign his name with his own hand."

This innovation, which requires that some ten million photographs be procured immediately, admits of but one explanation: military identification papers are being misused. A considerable number of soldiers—real or bogus—must have been going around under false names and with someone else's papers. The conditions that led to the decree are indicated in a dispatch printed in the St. Galler Tagblatt on March 11:

The number of German soldiers who do not return to the front after they have been on leave has risen so greatly during recent weeks that the military police have been reinforced. In the big cities there are already regular agencies that provide deserters with clothes, false papers, railway tickets, and so forth. Many are "going underground" in this fashion.

This column mentioned some months ago that civilians were "disappearing" in increasing numbers. For one reason or another—most probably because they have grounds to fear the Gestapo—they leave home one day and never return. What they do and how they eat without ration cards nobody knows. But six months ago it became known abroad that according to official estimates more than a hundred thousand Germans had disappeared. And since the devastating air raids the number is said to have greatly increased. Anyone who wishes to "vanish" starts a rumor that he has been killed by the bombardment; in most cases he is then not listed among persons sought by the police.

German propaganda depended for many months on the new secret weapon by which the English were to be paid back for their bombing of German cities. Not only the newspapers but all the big shots, including Goebbels himself, talked constantly and in the most concrete terms about the new weapon. It was "approaching completion in the factories." It was "undergoing its final tests." "The moment of retaliation was at hand." Even the Allied governments, as we know from two of Winston Churchill's speeches, believed there was some truth in the claims. The German people likewise believed it.

Some weeks ago the topic dropped out of German publicity without leaving a trace. Not a syllable is now uttered about it. But it has not been erased from the minds of the people. The wonder weapon, the Wunderwaffe, has become for them a bitter joke. In popular speech the word has been shortened to Wuwa, and Wuwa is the term currently applied to every announcement that is without foundation in fact—to optimistic attempts at consolation, phantasmagoria, extravagant promises. Radio commentators hand out Wuwa; the newspapers are "ten pfennigs" worth of Wuwa."

German propaganda seeks to divert the people's longing for peace into harmless channels by providing peace in fiction about the past. The most popular German film today is "Reise in die Vergangenheit" ("Journey into the Past"); and it was not mere chance that Carl Fröhlich of the UFA filmed the dusty old novel "Familie Buchholz." Dreams of the past have become a psychological necessity, especially for the depressed middle class. As a result the Weimar era, once deprecatingly called the Systemzeit, has acquired a golden glamour, and many conversations today revolve around the theme, "If in 1933 we had taken a different path—." (The St. Galler Tagblatt of March 11.)

That a German province should be ambitious to have its own "Institute of Racial Problems" is not especially astonishing. No words need be wasted on the founding of such an institute in the North Sea Gau of Weser-Ems. But one may wonder what purpose it serves. On this question District Leader Thiele, in a speech delivered at the official opening on March 2, made some surprising statements. The institute is to devote itself chiefly to the women. For unfortunately the women in this North Sea province seem to have a marked weakness for racially inferior foreigners-under the circumstances this can only mean for the imported workers. "It is to be feared," Herr Thiele said, "that important concepts, such as remaining aloof and guarding their folk purity, are losing their significance for some women." Basing his remarks on "copious experience," he pointed out "the dangers threatening the purity of our blood if the individual German does not realize that contacts with roreigners must be limited." This "most topical question," he said, "will be taken up by the new institute." And he was confident that under its influence women would again adopt the proper attitude. "That dignified reserve which has long been remarked in other parts of Greater Germany will soon be apparent also in our North Sea Gau, which seems at present much too unaware of the necessity for folk purity."

BOOKS and the ARTS

One Times One

1 x 1. By E. E. Cummings. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

NE'S not half two. Its two are halves of one:" Mr. Cummings says. So 1 x 1 is a merging of two things in a "sunlight of oneness," "one thou"; and "beginning a whole verbal adventure," this onederful book is primarily a compliment to friendship.

It is a book of wisdom that knowledge cannot contradict; of mind that is heart because it is alive; of wealth that is nothing but joy. Its axioms are also inventions: "as yes is to if, love is to yes," for instance; and all ignorance toboggans into know and trudges up to ignorance again:

Ignorance that has become know is to Mr. Cummings a monster; and nothing could say how valuable he is in slaying this "collective pseudobeast" in its "scienti > fic land of supernod where freedom is compulsory and only man is god

It is useless to search in a book by E. E. Cummings for explanations, reasons, becauses, dead words, or dead ways. His poems, furthermore, are not encumbered with punctuation; you are expected to feel the commas and the periods. The dislocating of letters that are usually conjoined in a syllable or word is not a madness of the printer but impassioned feeling that hazards its life for the sake of emphasis. For E. E. Cummings, the parts of speech are living creatures that alter and grow. Disliking "all dull nouns," he concocts new ones that are phenomena of courage and mobility. Nouns become adjectives; and adverbs, adjectives. His hero and "there's nothing as something as one."

"I am abnormally fond of that precision which creates movement," he says, and we see how a sensibility of crystalline explicitness can achieve without using the word me poem about me kite that is resplendent art:

> o by the by has anybody seen little you-i who stood on a green hill and threw his wish at blue with a swoop and a dart out flew his wish (it dived like a fish but it climbed like a dream) throbbing like a heart singing like a flame blue took it my far beyond far and high beyond high bluer took it your but bluest took it our away beyond where what a wonderful thing is the end of a string (murmurs little you-i as the hill becomes nil) and will somebody tell me why people let go

The ambidextrous compactness of the Joyce pun is one of poetry's best weapons and is instinctive with E. E. Cummings, as where he tells how nonentity and "the general menedgerr" "smokéd a robert burns cigerr to the god of things like they err." The word "huge" in this book, and certain lines, for example, you "whose moving is more april than the year," remind one of earlier work by E. E. Cummings. If, however, one's individuality was not a mistake from the first, it should not be a crime to maintain it; and there are here poems that have a fortified expressiveness beyond any earlier best love poem's. Like that painting in the Cummings exhibition at the American-British Art Center entitled Paris Roofs, rue de la Bucherie, Poem XXXIX, containing the line "Swoop (shrill collective myth) into thy grave," is as positive as a zebra and as tender as the new moon.

This is the E. E. Cummings book of masterpieces. It will provoke imitations, but mastery is inimitable-such as we have in "the apples are (yes they're gravensteins)"; in "plato told him:" and in "what if a much of a which of a wind." Indeed, in all the rest; for endeavoring to choose, there is nothing to omit. Nothing? The reader who is so childish as to hope that a book of wonders could be wonderful throughout will encounter obscenity and be disheartened. Obscenity as a protest is better than obscenity as praise, but there isbetween the mechanics of power in a spark of feeling and the mechanics of power in a speck of obscenity—an ocean of difference, and it does not seem sagacious of either to mistake itself for the other. But ignoring indignities-if one may ask admiration consciously to ignore and unconsciously to admire—this writing is an apex of positiveness and of indivisible, undismemberable joy. It is a thing of furious nuclear integrities; it need not argue with hate and fear because it has annihilated them; "everybody never breathed quite so many kinds of yes)." When it appears to ask question-> i've come to ask you if there isn't a new moon outside your window saying if that's all, just if

-it has the answer to life's riddle. It is reiterating:

death, as men call him, ends what they call men
—but beauty is more now than dying's when

The paintings "have the purities of mushrooms blooming in darkness," says Mr. McBride, throwing light on the poetry's secret of beatitude, for poetry is a flowering and its truth is "a cry of a whole of a soul," not dogma; it is a positiveness that is joy, that we have in birdsongs and should have in ourselves; it is a "cry of alive with a trill like until" and is a poet's secret, "for his joy is more than joy." Defined by this book in what it says of life in general, "such was a poet and shall be and is"

MARMANNE MOORE

The Soviet Army

THE RED ARMY, By I. Minz. International Publishers. $2.
THE RUSSIAN ARMY. By Walter Kerr. Alfred A. Knopf.
$2.75.

THE GROWTH OF THE RED ARMY. By D. Fedotoff White. Princeton University Press. $3.75.

PROFESSOR MINZ'S book, which on its first page refers to the Germans as having occupied "a large part of France," can surely be of little service to those for whom it was intended, while for those seriously interested in the history, growth, and organization of the Red Army it is worthless. The falsification of history which the official line involves must necessarily make nonsense of any account of the Red Army. The name of Trotsky appears only once, in the early part of the book, and then merely in connection with his "treachery" at Brest-Litovsk.

These sophistries would not necessarily rob the book of utility if the very great achievements of Stalin and his colleagues were placed in credible perspective. But even when a permissible truth appears, or when some resounding success flows directly from a decision of Stalin's, Professor Minz's report is mean and beggarly. For example: the first Five-Year Plan, by providing the Red Army with an industrial base and an enlarged proletariat, produced far-reaching changes in the Red Army. The opportunity is quite muffed, however. Elsewhere what the professor regards as history is a mere throwing together of frequently mendacious anecdotes, biographical scraps, and tags of propaganda, written down in a paltry style.

Mr. Kerr's book is a very different product. The author, formerly the New York Herald Tribune's correspondent in Russia, gives a simple and quite credible account of the present Red Army and its campaigns. There are no major revelations, and no pretensions, but there is a good deal of useful detail embodied in a lucid general account. What pieces of gossip and backstage news are included are extremely interesting in that they throw light on the larger realities. For the most part they confirm one's estimate that Russia has immense residual strength in spite of the enormous cost of the war. The strongest part of "The Russian Army," however, is the section, three chapters long, on the Battle of Stalingrad. One notes, by the way, that there are no views in Mr. Kerr's book which could imperil Professor Minz's orthodoxy. Yet presumably because he accepts reality as he finds it today and has, so far as his book goes, no political philosophy to consider, Kerr writes cleanly and with force and sympathetic warmth.

The perspectives, as well as the substance and the specific gravity, missing from Professor Minz's weary concoction are fully present in Fedotoff White's superb book. Together with Dr. Earle's two excellent chapters on Russian military doctrine in "Makers of Modern Strategy," it provides the best writing on the Red Army produced in years. Mr. White's book is a non-partisan and prodigiously documented study of the organizational processes of the Red Army. More particularly it is an account of the conflict and adaptation of groups within that army. It is not a history, Mr. White insists; yet there is no other book, I dare say, which throws one-quarter of the candle power on the military problems of revolution. One may not give to the Kronstadt rebellion such a 'watershed' character as Mr. White does—though by finally driving the Spanish heavy-industry proletarian organizations into violent opposition to the Communist International it strengthened that Spanish anarchism which, according to the official view, cost Spain and the Soviets dearly later on. For Mr. White, who places a little too much reliance on the analytical powers of William Henry Chamberlin, Kronstadt marks the end of one phase and the beginning of another.

Once the white intervention was over, the essential factor in Russian life was the narrow social base of the Communist Party's rule and the resultant cleavage between the peasantry and the city workers and between large sections of those and the party. That Kronstadt as a single event had some consequences for Red Army organization is true. Trotsky, of course, has always been charged with "underestimating the role of the peasantry." Looking at the record as Mr. White sets it down, one sees that the Great Commissar not only opposed the extremist pretense that there was a specifically "proletarian" strategy and tactics-the Russian tactics at Stalingrad were orthodox, Mr. Kerr says-but realized that a military doctrine based on world revolution had little attraction for the Russian peasantry, who would make up the bulk of the army. Stalin, it would seem, held much the same view, and this view, one notes by universal consensus of reports, prevails in Moscow at present.

It is unfair to select for discussion isolated points from so rich and suggestive • book. Yet the temptation is irresistible, for the parts that excited this reviewer were those especially pertinent to well-known problems. Most interesting were the splendid chapters on the Impact of Industrialization and the solid effort entitled Toward the Greatest Army. Covering a part of this ground, a doctrinaire writer like Souvarine arrived at the flat conclusion that Stalin dared not arm the Russian people, and that they certainly would not defend his Russia. The facts have disproved that central Trotskyist idea. The process of building that army and the way the inner conflicts were resolved are brilliantly set down by Mr. White.

Mr. White's book once more brings us up sharply against the great and perhaps tragic either-or of political history as our idealist generation has lived it. To express the dilemma in military terms, we have been confronted with this choice: either the revolutionary democracy of the red militias, with all their inefficiency, or the dictatorially controlled regular army of the present Russian type, together with its colossal power. The antithesis has been oversimplified, of course, but we had always hoped that it was possible to organize an army that would combine efficiency with democracy, just as we had always believed, it seems vainly, that a strong revolutionary party could be built that would have no need of Minzian sophistication. It is on this point that the general reader will find Mr. White so profitable a companion. I constantly found myself illustrating Mr. White's points with my own memories of the evolution of the Spanish republican army during 1936-37. And constantly Mr. White's discussion sets my memories in more logical perspective. The Spanish army experienced similar crises of morale and doctrine,

There was the period of spontaneous heroism, the period of romantic yet pure revolutionism, with its extravagance and confusion; then followed the period of conscription and regularization, with the Communist Party striving for control and achieving it in part. And this was the period of greatest combat efficiency-which was again most notable in the Communist regiments. Was it due to the Popular Front's sacrifice of revolutionary doctrine, or to the perspectives reached by the Communist Party, or to the consequent emergence of an expendable shock corps, necessarily limited in size? The terms are military, but they have their civil meanings. And these, in the near future, every liberal will be forced to reconsider. For those non-specialists who can make their civil translations Mr. White has written a book so solid. so dense with material, that, whatever one's beliefs, one must take account of it. RALPH BATES

The Art of Drawing

HISTORY AND TECHNIQUE OF OLD MASTER DRAWINGS. By Charles de Tolnay. 261 Collotypes after Drawings; 120 Plates. H. Bittner and Company. $20.

IN HIS preface to the present volume Mr. de Tolnay mentions his indebtedness to Joseph Meder's handbook on oldmaster drawings; his acknowledgment is, in a sense, an unnecessary one. There are enormous gaps in the field of arthistoriography filled only by certain standard works, which have remained immobilized in authority although their scope has proportionately grown narrower just as modern psychological and social concepts have expanded. The iconographer of the past should not be minimized for his pioneer research or his presentation of documented information, but he has too often approached his material as though it were some sublime form of philately, ruled by autonomous laws, insulated in the secrets of its own scholarship, and virtually divorced from experience. Mr. de Tolnay, on the other hand, without any sacrifice to scientific thoroughness, has investigated his subject with a profound insight into both its human and its abstract implications, and his contribution is one of vital originality and importance.

Drawing has been defined and evaluated according to the shifting tastes of various epochs. In the sixteenth century it was considered the parent of the three fine arts. The next century saw it related to a Platonic essence and described as of "divine origin." Diderot later referred to drawing as "form" and to color as "life"; Ingres called it the "probity of art"; Sensier, announcing the beginnings of French subjectivism, suggested that in a drawing the audience becomes the artist's confessor, "grasps the man, par le corps et par le cœur, and judges him to the roots of his being." The modern tendency has been to regard drawing as a quick and spontaneous communication in the hand of the artist, as revelatory as an entry in a diary but a fragmentary and informal means of expression.

Mr. de Tolnay has succeeded in objectively systematizing these diverse judgments and in organizing an impressive mass of material from which he presents his own brilliant argument, emphasizing his theories with philosophical and literary parallels that range from Thomas Aquinas to Baudelaire. His survey traces the arte del desegno from the fourteenth century through the nineteenth, analyzes its complex development, and appraises its independent aesthetic achievement. Mr. de Tolnay divides drawing into three categories, which form a basis for the identification of its schools and periods. The first is linear drawing, which is essentially two-dimensional; the paper is treated as a flat surface, plastic interest is neglected for rhythmic line quality, and each object is separated and inclosed within the contour of its own outline. The second is the plastic method, in which the surface of the paper is conceived metaphorically as a space and the objects as plastic quantities; the effects of modeling and of light and shadow are produced by hatchings or crossed lines, while a wash is sometimes used to heighten the illusion of three-dimensionality. The pictorial is the third, a treatment in which the surface is interpreted as an enveloping atmosphere with objects appearing in it often as mere condensations.

These three basic methods—which are also found in the other fine arts—correspond to three fundamental attitudes of man in the face of reality. The world may be regarded as pure objective substance, in which case the artist emphasizes the closed contour, or it may be seen as a struggle between substance and vital forces, in which case he will emphasize the plastic form, or, finally, he may take it as a subjective impression of the interference of forces without substance, in which case he will turn to the pictorial manner.

Mr. de Tolnay goes on to place these methods in their corresponding periods of development, observing that although a general tendency has been complicated and distorted by a local tradition from time to time, none the less the style which has been preferred by the "collective consciousness of humanity" during that interval has remained of primary importance. This is a welcome contradiction of the theory, popular among various contemporary art historians, that an individual genius is responsible for every major change of taste in art. But. Mr. de Tolnay successfully disposes of more than one theory or "established" fact. The complex and fertile aspects of his accomplishment lend themselves more easily to appreciation than they do to summary or quotation.

THE LION RAMPANT: THE STORY OF HOLLAND'S RESISTANCE TO THE NAZIS. By L. de Jong and Joseph W. F. Stoppelman. Querido. $3.

THE WHITE BRIGADE. By Robert Goffin. English version by Charles Lam Markmann. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

THE full story of life under the Nazis on the darkened continent of Europe cannot, of course, be written until after the war, but here are two books that make a good beginning. "The Lion Rampant" is a comprehensive account of how the Germans have been treating Holland, and of the ever-mounting, futile fury of the Hollanders. The book deals with the passive, not the violent, phase of resistance.

A common sense view...

HAGEN does not plead for a soft peace. He does not whitewash Germany. Hagen attacks Vansittartism and successfully refutes it . . . because he wants a real peace . . . Hagen's book invalidates the question of 'what to do with Germany' which in its formulation presupposes a passive mass to whom we can 'do things'."

REVOLUTION COMES OF AGE THE USE OF WAR BY ASHER BRYNES

FOR AMERICANS who look on the periods between wars (including that which will follow this one) as an opportunity to do "business as usual", this brilliant book by a Guggenheim Fellow will be an eye-opener. For the human race has fought for thirteen out of every fourteen years of its recorded history; war, not peace, has been our way of life. What a study of the great wars of the past, and of this one, reveals; why and how war is inevitably an instrument of social change; and how the forces it uses can be channelled for progress, form the theme of an arresting, highly readable book, a major contribution to our understanding of today's cross currents of conflict.

CARTELS

THE MENACE OF WORLDWIDE MONOPOLY

In every country cartels form a state within a state. In the world as a whole they cross national frontiers and make them meaningless. They are private governments whose decisions are reached secretly, whose officers are not subject to election or removal and whose power controls the destinies of whole peoples. There can be no decent or healthy postwar world until this power is met and mastered.

The New Republic's CARTELS supplement, written by the editors, deals with the whole subject of national and international monopolies in their various ramifications. Among other things, the supplement shows how these combines work together to raise prices, restrict production and discourage invention and technological advance. Some of the more notorious cartels, like those in chemicals, diamonds, tin and rubber, are described in detail. The supplement tells the scandalous story of the methods employed by these monopolies against competitors; of records falsified to deceive governmental agencies; of companies that plot with enemy nations to restore business ties as soon as the war is over; of international cartels used by Hitler in his plan to conquer the world. Finally, it offers a series of concrete proposals by which the threat of these cartels to democracy throughout the world can be removed once and for all.

The New Republic's CARTELS supplement is another in the series of special publications on vital issues of the day. Its twenty-four pages present much new material never before published. It's a supplement of the utmost importance for you. To get your copy, send in the coupon below today.

On the other hand, "The White Brigade" is entirely concerned with underground warfare in Belgium.

In the beginning the Germans meant to treat the Hollanders well, because they were Aryan blood brothers. The Dutch authors of "The Lion Rampant" make the rather surprising statement that existence still was bearable in the first year of Nazi subjugation. The Nazis thought they could convert the Dutch, and their efforts were persistent and often shrewd. They found a marvelous radio propagandist -a Hollander named Blokzijl, who did not merely parrot Nazi slogans but quietly and humorously talked to the "not inconsiderable group of hesitants, of 'possible converts'" in the Netherlands. The Nazis established a Culture Chamber which dispatched poets and paintings to Holland; they rounded up quite a few Dutch artists and musicians in their various guilds. They established special schools to educate Dutch Nazis-who numbered some 100,000-to the point where they could function as burgomasters.

One gets the uneasy impression that the Germans came near, in that first year, to converting the Dutch. The whole effort failed, however, because of German greed and stupidity. The greed was understandable, for conquerors always loot; in this case the plundering was carried on with an ingenuity and an efficiency which were positively awesome. The Germans' stupidity is difficult to comprehend. They infuriated the Dutch in needless ways, such as taking away their bicycles, applying a curfew, decreeing all manner of bureaucratic rules. Another thing that turned Dutch stomachs, praise be, was the Nazi campaign against Netherlands Jews. When the Jews had to wear a yellow Star of David, the Dutch spoke cordially to Jews they did not know, gave them seats in trolley cars, wore yellow flowers in their own lapels. When the Germans began deporting Dutch Jews to Polish slaughter areas, the Netherlands Christian churches made vigorous, if ineffective, protests.

Both the Protestant and Catholic churches were courageous bulwarks against Nazism. The Catholics, for example, refused to administer holy sacraments to anyone who supported the National Socialist idea. Laymen developed their own methods of boycott. Persons who joined the Dutch Nazi movement were cut by their friends and acquaintances. Young men who fought with the German armies in Russia were outcasts when they came home.

Apparently there was not as much violent resistance to the Nazis in Holland as in Belgium. "The White Brigade" tells in semi-fictional form the story of Belgians who systematically committed arson, sabotage, and murder. They built a tightly knit organization, each man well knowing that he probably would face horrible torture and death. The reader is taken along with Buchet, former office worker, who dresses up like a postman and delivers a parcel to a Nazi bigwig in Brussels; the parcel is a time bomb. On another mission, two young "efficiency experts" visit a war factory and leave the manager lying dead in the lavatory. We meet Deckers, a member of the White Brigade who was caught and was stood up before the German firing squad; he listened to the "Ein . . . zwei . . ."—but no drei was spoken. Ten times the Nazis stood him up, but still he wouldn't betray his comrades; on the eleventh occasion the drei was spoken.

In reading these books, one reflects anew on the appalling reservoir of hatred which the German race has built up for itself. One wonders how many years or generations will pass before psychological peace can be restored to the European family of nations.

Fiction in Review

REDERIC WAKEMAN'S "Shore Leave" (Farrar and Rinehart, $2.50) is so far as I know the first novel of this war to concern itself with the effects of the war on our actual combatants. The action of "Shore Leave" takes place in January, 1943, when many of our Pacific fighters were already seasoned veterans, and it reports the emotional state of four navy fliers who have been sent to San Francisco on medical leave. Mr. Wakeman's four pilots are all in varying degree heroes. Although they come from different parts of the Union and from different family backgrounds, they are deeply bound to each other by their passion for flying, by their intimate knowledge of death, and, most of all, by the unbridgeable chasm separating them from the civilian world. They are nearer home than they have been for many months; yet none of them has any real desire for reunion with family or old friends. They share a desperate restlessness: the only way to spend their leave is to settle down to the serious business of drinking and the serious business of non-serious lovemaking. "Shore Leave" is a first report on our newest lost generation; it can be read as the spiritual parallel, from this war, to Ernest Hemingway's version of World War I.

But there is this not unimportant difference—there was no earlier Hemingway to direct the eye of the early Hemingway, whereas Mr. Wakeman follows not only Hemingway himself but all Hemingway's followers. That is, quite without benefit of a new war, the hard-drinking, tough-loving way of life has for years now been crystallizing into the whole view of life of a large section of our fiction—a historical fact that we are bound to take into account in reading Mr. Wakeman's novel. I do not mean that "Shore Leave," because it is familiar, is necessarily inaccurate in its observations; perhaps even in respect of its hangovers, World War II is merely a frightening repetition of World War I, and perhaps the influence of Hemingway persists into the fiction of the present war because Hemingway caught so much of the lasting truth of modern war. But one suspects that Mr. Wakeman could have written this same book, minus only the service stripes, long before Pearl Harbor. We are told he is an advertising-radio man in civilian life, and certainly this is basically the same old advertising-radio novel of psychological disorientation and spiritual unrest with which we have been acquainted for some time; of the relation between the Hemingway view of things and this literaryfringe view of things one has always wondered, indeed, whether it is a case of art imitating life or life imitating art. Of course, as I have said, the fact that Mr. Wakeman studies aftermaths of war which have already been charted does not mean that he is unreliable; it simply reduces the interest of his book as a story and as a first novel of a new war.

"Swing the Big-eyed Rabbit" by John Pleasant McCoy (Dutton, $2.50) is as beguiling as its title. It is the very simple story of two Southern mountain boys; one of them

Just Published — The Stalin Prize Novel

This novel was recently given Russia's highest literary honor, the Stalin Prize. It tells the human story behind the news from Russia. As we read in the headlines of the Russian's recapture of city after city, we often overlook the courage of the old men, the women, the children of the small villages in between, who held out for so long against Nazi cruelty. The Rainbow tells the heroic story of one such village in the Ukraine.

longs for education and becomes a student at the mission school, and the other stays at home farming. With nothing to distinguish it that can be conveyed in synopsis, its charm is a matter of its author's decency and fondness for life and affection for people. Especially in a first novel, and a novel about youth, it is unusual for an author to show so much quiet respect for his characters; and Mr. McCoy's prose, too, is absolutely right—quiet, straight, and without a trace of self-consciousness or m single lapse from taste.

"Crazy Weather" by Charles L. McNichols (Macmillan, $2), also a first novel and also about adolescence, is scarcely less successful than "Swing the Big-eyed Rabbit," but it is a bit less endearing, perhaps because Mr. McNichols has set himself a rather more complicated task than Mr. McCoy. For one thing, there is more physical nature in Mr. McNichols's book-the scene is the Colorado Valley just before and during a hurricane-and for another, Mr. McNichols is telling the story of a white boy's adventure among the Mojave Indians and therefore has to recreate a quite alien way of thinking as well as the way of thinking of a growing boy. But both the young hero of "Crazy Weather" and its Indians are handled with respect; they are also attractive and convincing; and Mr. McNichols has a direct lively style which is better than merely workmanlike. A reader of current novels could do much worse than to spend an evening with "Swing the Big-eyed Rabbit," and anyone who has been caught by the romance of the Indians could practically be guaranteed pleasure from "Crazy Weather."

The more I read short stories the more I come to think that the form is an unrewarding one, except in the hands of the very greatest writers. For instance, if we could measure such things, the talent in the ten stories that make up "The Common Thread" by Michael Seide (Harcourt, Brace, $2) would surely count for much more in a novel than it does in this collection of short pieces; Mr. Seide has a good literary heart and eye and ear; yet his medium seems to be always stopping him short of what we feel he is capable of knowing and saying. But there is one other element to account for a reservation of praise—the poor-Jewish background of these stories, which seems so inevitably to make pity the dominant emotion. It is true that Mr. Seide's pity embraces all the characters in all his stories, whereas in most Jewish American fiction and in short fiction generally it is the I-person who absorbs the author's sympathies; still, where there is an overcharge of pity, whatever its direction, there is usually a lack of action and drama, and certainly the stories in "The Common Thread" would be the better for more movement in the world and less mood.

Mr. Seide writes wonderful dialogue, and what we can call his basic prose is excellent. But he has a bad habit of parentheses (such a tempting habit!) into which he likes to drop bits of fancy writing, and far too often, even outside the parentheses, he will destroy a first-rate passage by straining for effect. A sentence like the following, of which the fourth to eighth words should have been sternly rejected, is typical both of Mr. Seide's peculiar gift and his pursuing weakness: "An old woman hunched fatly against the freeze shuffled past him with her herring smell, muttering toothlessly that the world was much too small for her."

DIANA TRILLING

IN BRIEF

THE SEVEN SLEEPERS AND OTHER POEMS. By Mark Van Doren. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

Written in the Emersonian transcendental tradition, these poems have as their main theme the search for changeless universal law, the attributes of which emerge in meditations concerning such subjects as eternity, authority, nature, and man. "Consult the shown,/Believe in the unknown." The trouble with most of the 104 poems in this collection is that the ideas are superimposed on the poems. Theme and language therefore lack logical and imaginative interconnection. The metaphors are often forced or so drawn out that they neutralize each other; and series of subordinate clauses and repetitious constructions, earmarks of hasty composition, blunt and obscure the meaning. With a few notable exceptions-April, 1942, or Down World, for instance-Mr. Van Doren is at his best when he writes about details of intimate experience, as in some half-dozen poems in the section called The Double Life. They are charming, affecting, and lucid.

YEARS OF THIS LAND: A GEO-GRAPHICAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By Hermann R. Muelder and David M. Delo. D. Appleton-Century Company, $2.50.

What were the natural forces that in combination produced the mountains, valleys, plains, waterways, mineral deposits, and forests of the section of the earth that became the United States, and how did they influence the settlement and development of the country by European immigrants? And what in turn have Americans done to the land in their rapid exploitation of its resources? A historian and a geologist, both professors at a Midwestern college, have cooperated in answering these questions, and this notably stimulating little volume is the result. The Committee on American History may disapprove of it because it is short on dates, but alert teachers of the social sciences will seize on it as lively and profitable reading for their students. The maps and illustrations are excellent.

GERMANS IN THE CONQUEST OF AMERICA. By Germán Arciniegas. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This is a good introduction to history as Latin Americans like it: lively, stimulating, very personal, and perhaps a little overweighted for the sake of the argument. The story of the expeditions to the New World financed by the German banking houses of Fugger and Welser makes interesting reading, and the simpler imperialism of the sixteenth century is not uninstructive. Whether it demonstrates, as the author implies, that Spaniards are essentially tougher and more splendid than Germans, and vagabonds more apt to found an empire than bankers, the reader can decide for himself. The intimation of a parallel with twentieth-century Nazi penetration in South America is more questionable; that is the sort of simplification of history which prevents real understanding of either the past or the

FILMS

ARDILY, I arch my back and purr deep-throated approval of "The Curse of the Cat People," which I caught by pure chance, one evening, on a reviewer's holiday. Masquerading as a routine case of Grade B horrors-and it does very well at that job-the picture is in fact a brave, sensitive, and admirable little psychological melodrama about a lonely six-year-old girl, her inadequate parents, a pair of recluses in a neighboring house, and the child's dead, insane mother, who becomes the friend and playmate of her imagination. Since you have probably heard about it already from other reviewers, and since it is the sort of picture anyhow which deserves to give one the pleasure of personal discovery, I will not do more than say that dozens of the details are as excellent as the whole intention. Certain confusions in the plot-especially one scene in which the imaginary playmate, by pinning a gift to her gown, momentarily seems to categorize herself as a mere studio wraith-suggests that the people who made the film worked out two versions, one with conventional supernatural trimmings, the other, the far from conventional story they got away with. I was rather pleased than not, incidentally, by the trick, or accident, or both, which kept me and the audience uncertain, clear to the end, whether the ghost was a "real" ghost or the far more real fantasy of the child. In the same way I liked the ambiguous melodrama about the daft old actress and her tortured daughter, in the sinister house; though here I would have liked even better the much purer, quieter realism which they would have achieved if they had taken their key from the wonderfully chosen house itself. I wish that the makers of the film, and RKO, might be given some special award for the whole conception and performance of the family servant, who is one of the most unpretentiously sympathetic, intelligent, anti-traditional, and individualized Negro characters I have ever seen presented on the screen. And I hope that the producer, Val Lewton, and the rest of his crew may be left more and more to their own devices; they have a lot of taste and talent, and they are carrying films a long way out of Hollywood.

Even so, they have things to learn. This had every right to be a really first-rate movie; but good as it is, it is full of dead streaks—notably the writing, directing, and playing of the parts of the parents and the kindergarten teacher—and there are quite a few failures of imagination and of taste. The people with whom I saw the film—a regular Times Square horror audience—were sharply on to its faults and virtues. When the Ideal Playmate (Simone Simon) first appeared to the imagination of the infant in a dress and a lascivious lighting which made her façade look like relief map from What Every Young Husband Should Know, they laughed their heads off. They laughed again, with tender and perceptive spontaneity, when, confronted by snobbery, the little girl caught her shoulders into a bewildered, instinctively pure shrug of distaste. And when the picture ended and it was clear beyond further suspense that anyone who had come to see a story about curses and were-cats should have stayed away, they clearly did not feel sold out; for an hour they had been captivated by the poetry and danger of childhood, and they showed it in their thorough applause.

That is, I grant, a specialized audience, unobstreperous, poor, metropolitan, and deeply experienced. The West Times Square audience is probably, for that matter, the finest movie audience in the country (certainly, over and over, it has proved its infinite superiority to the run of the "art-theater" devoteesnot to mention, on paper which must brave the mails, the quality and conduct of Museum of Modern Art film audiences). As long as such an audience exists, no one in Hollywood has a right to use the stupidity of the public for an alibi; and I suspect that a few more films as decent and human as this one would indicate that there is a very large and widely distributed audience indeed for good films. ### RECORDS

HE Budapest Quartet's performance of Beethoven's Opus 132 in Columbia's new set (545; $5.50) is a superb statement of the work; but its recorded sound, though spacious and clear and bright, is cold and hard in moderate sonorities, brash and harsh as it gets louder, strident in fortissimo, and left my ears aching at the end. Also, poor balance destroys the effect of one of the great moments that I described last week-the moment, in the middle of the second movement, where the melody of the first violin, at a great height and as though at a great distance, conveys a vision of a celestial joy: as recorded, that melody is blanketed by the figuration of the second violin. And some of the breaks between record-sides are so placed in the music as to be unusually disturbing. On the other hand the surfaces of my copy are quieter than surfaces have been in a long time.

Columbia also otters Brahms's

"Schicksalslied" ("Song of Fate"), sung in English, for no good reason, by the Westminster Choir with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Bruno Walter (Set X-223; $2.50). The music is only for the fanatical Brahmslover that I was once but am no longer the performance seems to have been good; but while the recorded sound of the orchestra is natural and agreeable, that of the chorus is distorted and shricky. What I said about the surfaces of the Beethoven set hold for this one.

For its record classic drawn from its catalogue Columbia has chosen Stravinshy's own performance of his, "Sacre du printemps" with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (set 417; $4.50). It is a magnificent performance of this powerful work; and the cold, hard clarity of the recorded sound—the best that Columbia has achieved with the New York Philharmonic—happens to be appropriate to the character of the music. The surfaces of the new pressing are not as quiet as those of the original pressing, but are markedly quieter than surfaces have been.

Tchaikovsky, who loved Mozart's music above all other, wrote once in his diary: "Of course, in loving all of Mozart, I shall not begin insisting that each unimportant piece of his music is a chef-d'oeuvre. No! I know, for example, that not one of his sonatas is a great composition. Nevertheless, I love every one of his sonatas because it is his, because his sacred breath was breathed into it." This is the attitude one can feel for a great many works of Mozart that are the uninteresting products of a skilful craftsman trying to earn a living-among them the Divertimento K.563 for violin, viola, and cello that Heifetz, Primrose, and Feuermann recorded for Victor (Set 959; $4.50). For the most part-except for the charming minuet movement-it goes through the motions of musical activity without anything really happening; but we are aware that these motions-the characteristic turns of phrase and cadences and so on-are the motions of Mozart's mind, even if this mind is not deeply engaged in them; and once in a while we hear something like the passage at the beginning of the development in the first movement (middle of the first record-side) where the modulations are as bold and the effect as powerful as they are at the same point in the great Piano Concerto K.595. There was a Columbia set of an exquisite ensemble performance by the Pasquier Trio; the Victor set gives us a good performance by three solo virtuosos restraining their usual tendencies to command the stage. In the lively movements Heifetz plays with the simplicity of phrasing that has been evident in previous recorded performances in which he has appeared to be influenced by the impeccable musicianship of Feuermann; but in the slow movements there are the fussy swells and the archnesses of the normal Heifetz style. The recorded sound is excellent, except for a slight tipping of the balance toward the bass, and a few buzzes and rattles; and most of the surfaces are quieter than surfaces have been Victor also has issued a set (961; $3.50) of a Sonata for organ on the 94th Psalm by Julius Reubke, a pupil of Liszt, who died in 1858 at the age of twenty-four. It is performed by E. Power Biggs, who contends that "like the poet Gray with his immortal 'Elegy,' Reubke with this one musical creation is assured of a place among the greatest of the romantic composers, and becomes a worthy successor to Bach himself in the developing stream of organ literature." Mr. Biggs exaggerates; and whereas I can value in an inferior work of Mozart the impress of the mind that gave us his great works, I cannot value in this sonata the impress of the mind of Liszt that I don't like even in Liszt's own pretentious works. Again I must wonder at the original decision to record the work when so many greater things were still unrecorded, and even more at the decision now to devote to it the materials, plant, and labor that are insufficient for the great things already in the catalogue. The performance seems good and is well recorded.

On a single disc (11-8566; $1) Victor has issued the superb Slavonic Dances Nos. 1 and 3 of Dvorák in buoyant and brilliant performances by the St. Louis Symphony under Golschmann that are recorded with richness and spaciousness. On another (11-8568; $1) are two songs of no great consequence-Duparc's "Chanson triste" and Mattei's "Non è ver"-which are agreeable to listen to as sung by John Charles Thomas. And on still another (11-8567; $1) is an Etude of Liapunov, a Caucasian dance entitled "Lesghinka," of which Brailovsky plays the brilliant fast parts without brilliance and the quieter middle part in an excessively mannered style.

As for the set of Frederick Stock's orchestral version of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat for organ—that requires extended comment, which it will get next time,

The Minor Blitz

Dear Sirs: We are having to evolve a technique for the minor blitz which we have now had for several nights. It is a bit like sea-sickness practice in that it doesn't serve for the next time, but after the first part of the voyage you find vourself on deck again, with sea legs, more or less. The difference this time is the terrific noise, most of which, I suppose, we make. We have poppers and squishers-these, going up, sound like bombs coming down, and they provide a certain tenseness before it is finally determined which they are. So far as my neighborhood is concerned, they have all so far been of home manufacture. Another difference is that it is quality and not duration which counts. That is to say, instead of lasting all night, with lulls, these raids are all concentrated into about an hour, and I must say that hour is pretty well filled. The question is whether to get up or not. There is a shelter a few doors off. On the other hand it is bitterly cold, and it is a moot point whether to die of bomb or chill. I usually way in bed in my corner and reflect, as I used to in the last blitz, that while a lot of London may be hit, it is quite astonishing how much isn't.

I think perhaps that this bombing has come at the right moment. The winter is rather a time for hibernation and slowing down in the natural course of things, and the bombing has brought home to us all a fresh realization of what is before us and that it can't be coped with by wishing it were all over. I think that when we entered the fifth year of the war, we slumped a bit. Unconsciously we couldn't avoid thinking of wars in terms of four years and not five. I don't mean that everything was not done that it was possible to do in the winter, but that morally we couldn't go on gasping at the same high pitch for a second front and all that it entails, and that a bit of regular bombing, which we are promised faithfully will grow worse, has set our noses to the grindstone again and made us brace up for a fresh effort. People outside the country must find it difficult to realize the amount of bracing that is necessary. In the sense, I mean, that a violin string has to be tuned to the proper pitch before it can produce its effect. There is a whole orchestra of tuning going on since the bombing, and when strings snap, they are used again, a little shorter. I thought the Prime Minister's speech as usual met the case. I always like his defiance when he promises us no primrose path.

However that may be, one of the most encouraging things about bombing as it is at present is the description of its effect on London put out by the Germans. According to them, London was a mass of flames, Londoners were fleeing to the country in thousands, and all the services were out of order. That they should feel the need to reproduce, probably, the effect of a raid on Berlin when they can be proved wrong by millions of people seems to me a measure which must recoil on them. I meet people who live in most of the London districts, and while nobody looks on even very slight bombing as a treat, I cannot say that I have either seen or heard of anything in the least comparable with what happened during the first blitz. There may be roads barred-I have not seen any. There may be trains not running-I have not heard of any. Along my route to the office there is one rather conspicuous hit, but apparently nobody was hurt. In short, it seems almost stupid to attempt to contradict anything so fantastic, except that this is a means of showing what the Germans feel it necessary to invent. What may come is quite another thing. So far, however, there is nothing to write home about, except to contrast it with what went before.

The "war-firsts" and the reconstructionists are finding each other difficult just now. Finish the war, says one, and he is manifestly right. If you finish it and have made no preparation for the future, you'll have it coming to you, says the other. And that is true too. Of course you will have the same problems of housing, employment, finding the right niches for people who will come back into civil life by the million. And if it takes four or five years to screw people up to the victory point, it also takes years to let them down again on any fair sort of principle. A lot of work is being done, and since it is in the frigid realm of principle, it takes much thought and time. Ministries are doing a lot of inter-departmental communing to bring the various interests into line. Our country has been pretty well hacked about. The necessity for immense aerodromes, most of them constructed in a hurry, and the necessity for getting our own iron ore, gravel, and cement in this small country has made for a good deal of disfigurement. If you go down the river valleys, you will see immense lakes caused by the many gravel pits, while sides of hills are being cut away for lime. One ceases to have the feeling that countries are inexhaustible, and wonders how this cutting away of England and devastation of its surface is going to work out. I suppose it is not really worse than all that the railways did to the country, which we now take for granted.

Note on TVA

Dear Sirs: It may not be sufficiently noted, among other achievements, that the wisest act of TVA was one of omission. The Authority did not name a dam for either of two disappointed applicants for that honor: Senator McKellar and Representative Rankin.

How About the Electors?

Dear Sirs: The "compromise" bill just passed by the Senate makes no provision. nor did the measures from which it was compounded, for voting by service men in the November election for electors in the several states, by whom, and not by the voters at large, the President and Vice-President are to be elected. Those electors must be chosen by name-one for each Senator and Representative in each state. Votes for the candidates will not elect those electors; indeed, it is only in recent years that the names of the respective candidates for President and Vice-President have been on the ballots. It is possible for the popular vote for the candidates of one party to exceed that for other candidates who may yet be elected President and Vice-President by a majority vote of the electors.

The Twelfth Amendment to the Constitution provides that "the electors shall meet in their respective states now by law on the first Wednesday in December and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President ... and they shall make a distinct list of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the government of the United States; the president of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President. . . . " The certificates shall be opened and votes counted on the sixth day of January. That will be done in the presence of the next Congress, not the present one; it is possible, and not improbable, that in that Congress the Senate may have a Democratic majority, the House a Republican majority.

There is no provision of law now as to the procedure in case of dispute about the validity or insufficiency of one or more certificates such as brought into being the Electoral Commission of 1876-77. In such a débâcle there would be only two weeks in which to resolve the difficulty.

It is more than passing strange that throughout the discussion of the soldier vote the question of votes for electors, and by the electors, has been ignored, even in the article Same Old Fraud in your issue of March 11. Is it not of sufficient importance for consideration?

The Shape of Things

SINCE THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT IS READY TO make room for King Emmanuel and Marshal Badoglio under the capacious umbrella of the United Front, there are, apparently, no major differences regarding Italy between America, Britain, and Russia. It is remarkable, therefore, how tangled the situation has been allowed to become. The Mediterranean Advisory Commission has completely failed to function as a clearing house for the views of the governments represented on it. This fact first became evident when Moscow announced its intention of exchanging diplomatic missions with the Badoglio regime. The American and British governments, although on terms of patronizing intimacy with Badoglio, took umbrage at this move and pointedly noted the lack of prior consultation. Eventually Izvestia, the official organ of the Kremlin, explained that the proposed exchange of representatives was merely an attempt to establish direct contact with the de facto Italian government, akin to that enjoyed by the western Allies. But having cleared up this misunderstanding, it went on to protest that Soviet views on the urgent necessity of broadening the Italian government had been ignored. It appears that, on this question also, not only had the Mediterranean Commission proved a broken reed but the normal means of diplomatic communication had broken down. Meanwhile an Italian Communist leader, Palmiero Togliatti, has arrived in Naples direct from Moscow where he spent eighteen years in exile. This one-time secretary of the Comintern has announced a new line including acceptance of the King "as an institution" until after the war and retention of the Badoglio government with a democratic leaven. This ought to please everybody except, perhaps, the Italian democrats.

ALLIED FAILURE TO TAKE CASSINO AND THE stalemate at the Anzio beachhead have caused widespread questioning of both the strategy and tactics employed in Italy. Admittedly the campaign has proved disappointing, but allowance must be made for the effect of changes in over-all strategy made at Teheran necessitating a regrouping of forces. Again, some critics give insufficient weight to the solid gains achieved by the conquest of southern Italy. On the political side, it is true, those gains have been largely dissipated by our persistent snubbing of the democratic elements. But from the military angle there are two definite advantages to be noted -the tying down of a considerable number of German divisions and the unimpeded use of the great Foggia airfields, from which the whole southern arc of the Nazi fortress from Marseilles to Sofia can be brought under attack. So far the full strategic possibilities of Foggia have not been realized owing to the prolonged period of abnormally bad weather from which the Allied air forces have suffered. But with the coming of spring the striking power of this base is likely to be amply demonstrated. Bad weather has been an even more severe handicap to the Allied ground forces, particularly by depriving them of tactical air support. For instance, the German defenders of Cassino and the Gustav Line depend for their supplies on three railroads leading from northern Italy. If the bottlenecks on these lines could be bombed day after day over a period of weeks the German army in and below Rome would be seriously weakened. Up to now, however, frequent breaks in the weather have always given the Germans time to patch up the lines between raids.

MR. CHURCHILL SUCCESSFULLY SQUELCHED last week's revolt in the House of Commons, but the rebellious spirit remains. Indeed, it has been intensified by the heavy-handed methods used by the Prime Minister, and there will probably be further outbreaks against the authority of the government, especially when the promised social-security bill is introduced to Parliament. There is this to be said for Mr. Churchill: he had always been anxious to postpone all consideration of post-war problems until after victory, for he was aware that any discussion of such controversial matters would inevitably subject a coalition administration to tremendous strains. Unfortunately the problems of peace cannot all be shelved until after victory, Mr. Churchill, in spite of himself, has been forced to produce a program of reconstruction, and the pattern of post-war Britain is now being woven. But while almost everybody in Britain accepts and applauds Mr. Churchill's war leadership, millions, perhaps a majority, regard the most radical measures he can induce the bulk of his Tory followers to accept as quite inadequate. Now the Prime Minister has told them: either you swallow my post-war plans or find another leader. With a most critical period just ahead there could be only one reply to this ultimatum. On a vote of confidence Mr. Churchill obtained a majority amply large enough to demonstrate that, on a showdown, he can still call the Commons to heel. But the incident has created resentments which will probably be reflected in future by-elections. It will also increase the pressure on the left for a termination of the party truce, making it possible to develop and preach distinctive labor policies.

THE OFFICIAL DEADLINE FOR IMMIGRATION into Palestine under the White Paper passed at midnight on March 31, leaving both British and American policy toward the Jewish homeland in a state of complete confusion. Beyond making provision for Jewish immigration to continue until the original quota of 75,000 has been filled, the British government has shown no indication of modifying its policy as laid down in the White Paper. No provision has been made, and no plans appear to be under way, for resettling the hundreds of thousands of Jews who may be freed this year as the United Nations armies march into Axis-dominated Europe. American policy is as obscure as the British. The clarity seemingly achieved by President Roosevelt's forthright statement that "the American government has never given its approval of the "White Paper of 1939" has been largely obliterated by his subsequent support of General Marshall's contention that the issue should not be pressed now for military reasons. While the President unquestionably has great personal sympathy with the plight of the Jewish refugees, his reluctance to take a definite position at this time adds to the general confusion. The President and the State Department appear to have forgotten that both Britain and the United States are committed under the 1925 agreement against excluding anyone from Palestine on grounds of religious belief, and that Britain undertook not to alter the mandate's terms without our consent.

THE DEMOCRATIC VICTORY IN OKLAHOMA'S special Congressional election appears to have been somewhat more significant than its summary treatment in the press would suggest. While the Second Congressional District of Oklahoma has gone Republican only once in the last twenty-five years, the Democratic margin of victory was only 385 in 1942. This year the same Republican candidate lost by a margin of more than 3,500 votes. Of the many by-elections held in recent months, the Oklahoma poll appears to have come closest to being a test of popular sentiment with respect to the Presidential election. All reports indicate that few if any local issues were raised in the campaign. Both the candidates were lawyers, and both were from the same town. The Republican candidate chose to make the New Deal the chief issue, a challenge that was readily accepted by the Democratic candidate. Both parties brought in from outside the district prominent speakers who emphasized national issues. Under the circumstances the Democratic triumph can only be construed as a victory for the principles of the New Deal. While the Republican leaders have chosen to remain silent on the significance of the poll there are strong indications that it may precipitate a complete shift in Republican strategy. Criticism of the Administration's blunders in domestic affairs may be silenced in favor of an attack on its foreign policy—which is much more vulnerable.

A MILLIONAIRES' LOBBY IS QUIETLY BUT successfully peddling to state legislatures a constitutional amendment designed to give upper-bracket taxpayers permanent relief from bearing their due share of national taxes. Already some fifteen states have adopted a resolution asking Congress to summon a convention for the purpose of repealing the Sixteenth Amendment, which gave the federal government power to levy progressive income taxes. In its place the resolution calls for a constitutional provision limiting income and inheritance tax rates to a maximum of 25 per cent save in a national emergency. This resolution was introduced in the New York Assembly in February and was narrowly defeated; now it is before the New Jersey Legislature. Among its advocates one finds the New York Daily Mirror-the limitation would be a godsend to the Hearst family-which declares: "There is no conceivable crisis in time of peace which would require taxing more than 25 per cent of the people's income." This is a choice example of the misleading propaganda being used to foster the new amendment, which is concerned with limiting not the proportion of the national income taken in taxes but the amount taken from any one person's income. If the amendment were passed, a Henry Ford, who on an income of $1,000,000 must now pay upward of $800,000, would be charged at most $250,000. And with the contribution of the Henry Fords limited, it would be necessary to jack up that of the John Does, who would hardly be consoled by a constitutional limitation of the tax on $1,000 per year to $250. It is not surprising to find that the Committee for Constitutional Government, headed by Frank Gannett, the millionaire publisher, is the organization trying to slip over this measure while popular attention is fixed on the fighting fronts.

THE NATION VIEWS WITH ALARM THE attack made by Maury Maverick, chairman of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, on lengthy memoranda and what he calls "gobbledegook language." His dictum to his subordinates that "anyone using the words 'activation' or 'implementation' will be shot" constitutes a grave threat to the "experts" who have built up whole vocabularies, not to mention blinding reputations, out of the multisyllabic, abracadabric words that Mr. Maverick condemns. He doesn't like "patterns," "effectuating," "dynamics." He doesn't want to hear any more about "pointing up" programs and "finalizing" contracts that "stem from" district, regional, or Washington "levels." But what would bureaucrats, Supreme Court fanciers, and pedagogues-to mention only a few of the Larger Word Plants Corporation-do without such expressions? Mr. Maverick's irresponsible attack on our precious heritage of clichés must be deplored by everyone who believes in progressive obfuscation. He had better get back on the range or he will find himself in an "area of conflict" where the "social climate" will be too hot even for Texan.

Protective Concealment

TWO recent incidents make it easy to understand the widespread distrust of the State Department. One involves Governor Dewey's charge that the department had asked the British censor to suppress political news sent to American newspapers by American correspondents in London. The other concerns oil shipments to Spain. Both illustrate the disingenuous, if not downright dishonest, manner in which the State Department is accustomed to deal with the press and the public.

Secretary Hull answered the Dewey charge by saying that he was "100 per cent wrong," and Majority Leader McCormack, on the basis of information obtained from the Secretary, told the House of Representatives that "as between Secretary Hull with his years of experience and his truthfulness, and the inexperienced and keenly ambitious Governor Dewey, the American people will accept the word of Secretary Hull." But Representative McCormack spoke too soon. For that same day the London Bureau of the New York Times, which has always been one of Mr. Hull's champions, reported "repeated instances" of objections from Washington to stories by American correspondents about diplomatic developments passed by the British censors.

"Complaints to the Foreign Office regarding what was held in Washington to be too frank a discussion in the American press of diplomatic news became so numerous at one time," the New York Times reported, "that Cyril Radcliffe, deputy director of the Ministry of Information, asked the Foreign Office to relieve the ministry of responsibility for censoring diplomatic news." When correspondents took this up with the Secretary the next day, they were told (1) that censorship had only been asked for reasons of military security or to protect high officials while traveling, (2) that there was "confusion between the censorship of news in the possession of the press and the avoidance of premature disclosure to the press of confidential information," (3) that there had been only four protests to London on news leaks, but (4) that Ambassador Winant might have taken up others in informal discussions. In the light of these admissions, it is hard to accept Secretary Hull's insistence that his position on censorship is "unequivocal and clear." It is true that diplomacy cannot be carried on in a goldfish bowl, but there would be more respect for the Secretary if he said so frankly instead of making statements that will not bear scrutiny.

We believe that much of the State Department's secrecy is not justifiable but represents the protective measures required in carrying out an undemocratic and unpopular foreign policy. Oil shipments to Spain provide a clear case. On January 28 the department announced that "the loading of Spanish ships with petroleum products for Spain [had] been suspended pending a reconsideration of trade and general relations between Spain and the United States." The statement evoked approval and was regarded as an indication that we were to stop appeasing Franco. It was explained at the time that in any case Franco had not been receiving oil from the United States but only from Venezuela and other Caribbean sources.

But on March 4 the Philadelphia Record revealed that a quarter-million gallons of high-grade lubricating oil had been loaded for Spain at an East Coast port. Censorship wouldn't permit the Record to say it was Philadelphia, perhaps on the theory that German submarines might sink oil shipments for Franco. This brought another flood of unwilling confessions: (1) that the previous statement applied only to bulk shipments in tankers, but that Spain had been getting "packaged" petroleum in barrels, cans, and kegs from the United States before February 1, (2) that the State Department had decided (but curiously enough has not announced it) to apply the February 1 embargo to "packaged goods" as well as bulk shipments, but (3) that this did not apply to export licenses already outstanding at the time. These explanations do not accord too well with the statement of January 28 that oil shipments to Spain had been "suspended." The State Department and Noah Webster do not seem to use words the same way. When the Chief Information Officer of the department was asked how many export licenses were outstanding, he said he didn't think there were any but he wasn't sure. We're not sure either-about that, or anything else the department tells us.

Drafting 4-F's

IN A dramatic reversal of policy, the House Military Affairs Committee has started work on a bill to draft men discharged from the services, 4-F's, and possibly those in the over-age group for essential civilian work. Heretofore the Military Affairs Committee has steadfastly opposed all suggestions for using compulsion in meeting the civilian man-power problem. It was largely responsible for the setting aside, last fall, of the War Manpower Commission's plan for diverting men from non-essential work into war industry through the establishment of "non-deferrable" categories. But as the pressure for men in the armed services has increased, necessitating the drafting of hundreds of thousands of essential men in the war industries, the Army and Navy departments have apparently been successful in persuading the House committee of the necessity of at least a modified civilian draft.

Under the plan proposed by Under Secretary Patterson, 4-F's will first be given an opportunity to take jobs in essential industry or agriculture at regular wage rates. Those who refuse to accept the jobs offered them will be inducted into the army and placed in labor battalions at army pay. The essential justice of the proposal can hardly be challenged. It should eliminate the glaring unfairness of the present arrangement, under which young men with minor physical defects are not only freed of the obligation of bearing arms but are permitted to snatch choice jobs in promising lines of post-warendeavor, or, in a few startling instances, to earn huge salaries in such non-essential activities as professional baseball and football.

It should be recognized, however, that the plan is a poor substitute, morally or practically, for national-service legislation such as has been advocated by the President. In testifying before the Military Affairs Committee both Mr. Stimson and Mr. Patterson, speaking for the War Department, made it clear that they preferred a universal man-power draft. While the conscripting of 4-F's for civilian service is fair in that it provides equality of treatment within the eighteen-to-thirty-seven age-group, its unequal treatment of different age-groups and the two sexes is neither just nor logical. It is difficult to see why the obligation to support the war effort should be limited to males between the ages of eighteen and thirty-seven when other adults are under no compulsion whatever.

The omission of women from the proposed conscription plan is particularly illogical. Although millions of women have gone into war industries in the past few years, other millions are making no direct contribution to the war effort. These women constitute the greatest reservoir of potential war workers. There is no need to call on mothers with small children, on young girls or grandmothers; huge numbers of single girls and childless married women are still available. The women's branches of the armed services have found it impossible, however, to fill their requirements by appeals for voluntary enlistments. Many of the jobs in war industry that are being vacated as a result of Selective Service demands could readily be filled by women if there were adequate machinery for drawing them in. After more than two years of experimentation with "voluntary" measures, it is evident that the available sources of labor cannot be fully utilized without some form of conscription. While it is encouraging to find that Congress has at last awakened to the seriousness of the man-power situation, the proposed remedy has all the faults of the hasty improvisation that it is.

American Labor Pains

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

NE of the first engagements of the coming Presidential campaign has been fought and decided in New York. By a large majority the left wing of the American Labor Party in that state has captured the party organization; the right wing has withdrawn and as we go to press is deciding whether or not to start a party of its own. The issue dividing the two groups was not on the surface a campaign issue at all; both lefts and rights are pledged to fight for the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Wallace. The issue was the control of the party by Communists and near-Communists. The retreating right wing charges that the victory of the left has established such control; the left denies it.

The struggle is an old one, but a new element was injected by the intervention of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee headed by Sidney Hillman. Mr. Hillman's willingness to cooperate with left elements infuriated the right wingers, who were waging a losing battle without this added handicap. They claimed that ever since the Communist Party had been forced off the state ballot, party members had been "colonizing" in the A. L. P.; with the coming dissolution of the Communist Party its members intended to take over the A. L. P., converting it to their own uses. To prevent this the right wing insisted it must control the party machine. Right-wing leaders attacked Hillman's alliance with the left as a repudiation of his own past convictions and his own policy in dealing with similar elements in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers.

Hillman countered with the argument that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee could hardly be expected to rule C. I. O. unions out of the race even if some of them were run by men charged with Communist sympathies. He denied, however, that the election of the left-wing slate would increase the power of the Communists; on the contrary he insisted that the A. L. P. stood a better chance of avoiding out-and-out Communist control by accepting the cooperation of the Political Action Committee and the unions which supported it. He based his campaign on a strong appeal for united labor and progressive action in behalf of the New Deal and Mr. Roosevelt's reelection. But unity was not furthered by Mr. Hillman's efforts. The fight was a bitter one; long-standing factional lesions were widened, personal rivalries accentuated. The major split in the ranks of labor was more sharply defined.

The Nation has believed from the beginning that Hillman should have kept the Political Action Committee out of this struggle for power in the American Labor Party. His arguments for intervention were strong in logic but weak in political and human terms. He knew how deeply rooted were the fear and hatred of communism which animate the right wing. These emotions are too strong to be debated. Hillman and his chief lieutenants wanted to make peace; they did not want victory followed by schism. They understood the political penalties attached to that kind of victory. But their attempts at appeasement were doomed to fail. The right would accept nothing less than total rejection of the Communist-controlled candidates; and this Hillman could not concede without repudiating some of his own C. I. O. unions. The intransigence of the right gave Hillman the appearance of magnanimity, but it robbed him of the satisfaction that unity would have brought. He might better have stayed out of the fight and then, after the primaries, cooperated with the A. L. P. whoever won.

By his intervention he has involved the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, before the major campaign has even opened, in a second-front engagement that should have been avoided. The fight in New York has provided a handy supply of ammunition for reactionaries-from Mr. Dies up-looking for fresh "proof" that communism and the New Deal are synonymous and that the C. I. O., a New Deal creation, is only a branch of the Communist Party. This proposition will be worked for all it is worth, and much more. One cannot wholly dismiss its possible effect in limiting the value of the Political Action Committee as a campaign weapon; neither should one exaggerate the danger. The attempt made by Dies to prove that the committee itself is controlled by Communists is nothing more than a dirty sideswipe at the Roosevelt Administration. It will, I think, be widely recognized as such. And the general disgust with Dies's smearing tactics, spreading now in many hitherto unaffected areas, should help counteract his libelous and lying attack.

I hope it will. Nothing would be more unfortunate than a weakening of the Political Action Committee at the outset of its difficult career. If its role in New York was an error of judgment, the effect of that error should be neutralized as rapidly as possible. To do this is the job of everyone who recognizes the need of building up progressive strength in the coming campaign. It is particularly the job of Mr. Hillman's recent opponents. No one knows better than the former right wing of the A. L. P. how essential it is to have an organization outside the regular party machine devoted to the task of rallying labor and liberal support behind a program of progressive action. The C. I. O. committee is the only available instrument of progressive action organized on a nation-wide basis. It is launching its campaign under heavy handicaps. Whether or not it develops into a good fighting battalion will depend in part on the attitude of certain key people in New York.

It would perhaps be asking too much of Mr. Dubinsky and Mr. Rose and Mr. Alfange to suggest that they offer their backing to the Political Action Committee outside of New York. It is not asking too much to suggest that they refrain from injuring its chances. To go on talking day after day about the "Hillman-Browder alliance" is to play directly into the hands of Martin Dies and his cohorts throughout the country. The primaries are over, and the right has lost. A great national campaign is opening, a campaign which will decide the control of this country for the rest of the war and the period of reconstruction. To try to defeat reaction in the coming election is the only legitimate concern of progressive men and women. Communism is not an issue; reaction is the issue. We hope most earnestly that the right-wing leaders in New York will be able to rise above their disappointment and bitterness and steadfastly avoid any act which will strengthen the enemies of the people.

Reply to the "Saturday Evening Post"

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 30

SEEM to have alarmed the editors of the Saturday Evening Post. They shy at a remark made by your correspondent in an article on The Cartel Cancer in correspondent in an article on The Cartel Cancer in The Nation of February 12. The Saturday Evening Post for April 1 carries an editorial, Soldiers' Doubts Reflect Our Wobbling War Aims, and in it the editors say:

The confused American, who regards himself as a defender of "free enterprise," also finds a considerable propaganda not merely for destroying the military power of Germany but for using destruction of her military power as a pretext for destroying her industrial system as such. At any rate, I. F. Stone, writing on cartels for The Nation, hints dire consequences "if we restore the cartel system and a capitalist Reich." [The italics are the Post's.] In other words, we are supposed by a considerable group of Americans to be fighting to destroy in Germany the kind of economic setup we defend in America.

I have little quarrel with the Saturday Evening Post's editorial. It has much to say on the problem of war aims that is sober and sensible. I think most Americans will agree with its general conclusion. "The justice imposed by war," the Post says, "is rough at best, and this war will be no exception. . . . The purpose and spirit of an American army fighting on foreign soil will be most easily maintained if the issues are stated as simply as possible. Hitler and Tojo must be defeated because their success would mean our ruin." But I think most soldiers would agree that a further step would be helpful in maintaining morale. There are men fighting Germany today whose fathers fought Germany in the First World War. I think these men would like some assurance that their sons will not have to fight Germany in a third war.

The Saturday Evening Post's attitude to the future of Germany rests on fallacious assumptions. These call for the most careful examination if we are not to drift into the reestablishment of pretty much the same kind of Germany we have had to fight twice in a generation.

Let us begin with the final sentence of the passage I quoted at the beginning of this letter. "In other words," the Post says, "we are supposed by a considerable group of Americans to be fighting to destroy in Germany the kind of economic setup we defend in America." This may at first glance appear conclusive and crushing, but it is really irrelevant. We may not be fighting to destroy capitalism in Germany, but we are certainly not fighting to maintain it. We are fighting to destroy the German threat to ourselves. And in making the peace we shall be concerned with only one thing—helping to bring to birth a Germany we shall not have to fight again.

I think the editors of the Saturday Evening Post would agree that we encouraged the reestablishment of capitalism in Germany after the last war. I think they would agree that if capitalism had been successful in Germany, the republic would not have fallen and Hitler would not have come to power. I think they would agree that if Hitler had not come to power, there would probably be no war in Europe today. Now the question is: After Hitler is defeated, are we to restore capitalism in Germany and run the risk of letting much the same sequence of events repeat itself? I think this is a reasonable question.

Now let us look at the first sentence of the passage I have quoted from the Saturday Evening Post. It links "free enterprise" in the mind of the reader with the German "industrial system." We are still fortunate enough to have large areas of free enterprise in American capitalism, but "free enterprise" was never even the ideal of German capitalism. There wasn't much free enterprise in Germany before Hitler, and there is a good deal less of it today. This is not because of National Socialism. The Führer no more meant to make the Reich national socialist, in the literal meaning of the term, than Huey Long intended to make every American a king. There is less free enterprise because, with democratic checks removed, the great trusts, combines, and cartels of the Reich have waxed stronger, gobbling up and strong-arming smaller businesses and independent enterprise. With a few unlucky exceptions like Thyssen, who lost out to shrewder rivals, the magnates who backed Hitler profited enormously by Nazism. Hitler's defeat will not deprive them of their dominant position in Germany's economy. The great capitalists of the Reich helped the Führer to power, benefited by his regime, and share in his guilt. Do the editors of the Saturday Evening Post propose to let them get away with their gains?

I am sure that the editors of the Post feel as hostile to those silent partners of Hitlerism as the rest of us do. But if we unthinkingly identify German monopoly capitalism with "free enterprise" and permit it to operate after Hitler has been defeated, we leave these men with their loot. They are counting on conventional thinking to help them do two things. One is through litigation and dummy corporations in neutral countries to salvage much of the property they stole in occupied Europe. The other is to retain their dominant position in the German economy. They look to our respect for property rights to help them in the first task and to our fear of communism to help them in the second. They have strong potential allies in America and Britain-first, among the corporations which own property in the Reich and, second, among German industry's opposite numbers in international cartel agreements. These cartel partners stand to benefit by the enhanced monopoly power of their old German associates, and may be expected to stand by them. One of the proposals already put forward here by a distinguished corporation lawyer is that American concerns be made "trustees" for the property of their cartel partners in the Reich. This would have an obvious advantage in protecting them from socialization.

This is not merely a moral problem. It is a problem in international security. These big German interests were unable to end unemployment in the Reich without dictatorship and war. There is no reason to believe that they can do better a second time. reace will create difficulties for them; war would offer new profits and a new chance at world dominion. We know what they did to hamstring American production by cartel agreements before this war, and it would be folly to give them a chance to do it again. They are our enemies, as deeply and as permanently as the German military. Shall we leave them in power? Or shall we give the pent-up anger of the Reich's gagged working class a chance to sweep them away? And by nationalizing the great combines, and giving the small business man and farmer a chance at free enterprise in a mixed economic system, establish a Reich that can achieve prosperity without plundering its neighbors? I ask the editors of the Saturday Evening Post which course offers the better chance that our sons will not have to fight Germany again.

IT IS POSITIVELY ASSERTED in Paris, and in the best-informed quarters is believed, that a treaty has been concluded between France and Austria, and—though this less confidently—that Italy is included in this agreement; and that the object of the alliance is the humiliation or diminution of Prussia; Italy's reward to be, of course, Rome; that of France, the left bank of the Rhine; and that of Austria, any of the hundred possibilities which present themselves in Eastern Europe.—April 15, 1869.

THE ACCESSION OF BRITISH AMERICA [Canada] to the United States would mean not only the addition of a vast extent of fertile soil but of several millions of a hardy and industrious population, of the same origin as our own, speaking the same language, and already used to self-government. . . . But to make the annexation a gain to Canadians, their consent to it should be asked, and given; and to make it, as is proposed, a healer of the breach between this country and England, England should make it fairly and voluntarily, and not under compulsion.—April 15, 1869.

COUNT LEO TOLSTOI HAS FINISHED the fifth and last part of his great novel "War and Peace," and it will be published in a few days. This includes the occupation and fire of Moscow and the Vienna Congress.—April 1, 1869.

IT MUST BE ADMITTED that the difficulty of getting at the truth about foreign politics is not trifling. The leading London papers take, in ordinary times, considerable pains to get good information, but then the mere labor of reading all, or half, that the newspapers or travelers say about foreign countries in our day, or reading the diplomatic reports or dispatches, is something from which most people shrink. It would probably be found on examination that ninety-nine men out of a hundred, both in England and America, rely on the telegraph now for all they learn of what is going on abroad.—April 15, 1869.

THE FREE-TRADERS HAVE BEGUN to be very active, and are holding meetings in various parts of the country, and are apparently drawing some of the veterans of the anti-slavery struggle into the agitation. Henry Ward Beecher has presided at a meeting in Brooklyn, and William Lloyd Garrison has spoken at one in Boston; upon which the Tribane suggests that the old abolitionists, having been in favor of "abolishing everything from Christianity down," cannot be expected to have any respect for the tariff—an argument on the "religion" and logic of which it is hardly necessary to dwell.—April 29, 1869.

Willkie Against the Gods

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Milwaukee, Wis., March 29

N THE eve of the Wisconsin primaries, which will be decided before this appears in type, few experienced observers here will venture a flat prediction regarding the fate of Wendell L. Willkie. Yet it is clear that his campaign has made an impact, and it is important to understand—whether he wins or loses—the extraordinary experiment he has attempted in the heart of the so-called isolationist Middle West.

The practical politicians would have said, in advance, that for Willkie to stake his hopes on Wisconsin was quixotic, perverse, and a mug's game. The La Follette isolationist tradition lingers, and Philip La Follette's position on General MacArthur's staff is reflected in the pro-MacArthur sentiments of the weekly Progressive. Governor Dewey won the Republican delegation four years ago, and his name is entered again, with the powerful support of Secretary of State Fred Zimmerman. The State's population is heavily Germanic in origin. The Chicago Tribune circulates widely. The anti-isolationist sentiment is split between Willkie himself and former Governor Stassen of Minnesota, now a naval officer with Admiral Halsey.

In the face of these handicaps and this confusion, Willkie has conducted throughout the state one of the most fantastic Presidential campaigns in American history. He has hit the towns and countryside with the personal zeal of the old-time circuit rider on the glory trail. With terrible earnestness—and the phrase is used advisedly—he has at once attempted the almost irreconcilable tasks of reforming the Republican Party and asking rankand-file voters to intrust him, in spite of all the venomous opposition to him, with the party's leadership.

He has sought to persuade the people, puzzled by intense propaganda calling him a New Deal stooge, that he is a "real Republican" who disagrees with "almost every policy" of the Administration in power, but who has also boldly criticized the bleak G. O. P. record in Congress. And he has never once yielded to the temptation to talk dirty politics against Roosevelt's war leadership. He went out of his way to repudiate publicly the campaign tactics of Harrison Spangler, who had chortled gleefully that the G. O. P. would gain votes from the Administration's Irish and Polish policies.

His deliberate defiance of his enemies, his determination to speak his mind plainly on delicate issues were almost incredible. He chose a strongly German area for a speech asserting the necessity of waging war against Germany until total victory. When baited by a Tribune spokesman, he departed from his intended speech to lash out a warning that any Republican candidate indorsed by Colonel McCormick would inevitably go down to defeat. He continued with ruthless insistence to discuss the simple fundamental issues of war and peace. With a moral fervor almost passionate in its intensity he sought to re-create the Republican Party in his own image, as what he considers the only effective instrument of liberal leadership in American democracy.

How has Wisconsin received all this? It is notable that his audiences have been the plain citizenry—decent, sober middle-class farmers and townspeople, who might, indeed, have been more entertained by the circus banalities of the ordinary political speech, but who have listened intently to Willkie's customary extemporaneous discussion of transcendent, if abstract, issues. They went away quietly, and presumably thoughtfully, trying to sense the quality of this strange candidate and weigh the merits of his direct appeal: "Help me, please help me!" His campaign began coldly, his audiences sitting on their hands, but after a few days it began to show signs of popular appeal. At Sheboygan the local party leaders, who had not troubled to conceal their hostility, were shocked by a rousing turnout that was rewarded with one of the most effective speeches of the campaign. At Waukesha a previously indifferent county chairman jumped nimbly for the band-wagon and belatedly begged the privilege of introducing the chairman of the meeting. In Milwaukee, where Dewey four years ago drew fewer than a thousand people, Willkie had four thousand in his audience, and he improved the occasion by skilfully saving a meeting which the chairman had half ruined by platform bungling.

Yet even in Milwaukee the people's confusion betrayed itself. Willkie began an ironical analysis of the familiar complaint that we need a President who will "look after America," as Stalin and Churchill look after Britain and Russia. The audience began to applaud and Willkie had to hurry to make it clear that he didn't agree with this corrupting misstatement of the issues.

The assaults he launched against the New Deal were virtually identical with those made by liberal Democrats and non-partisans, who are sick of official trafficking with Badoglio and disgusted by Administration timidity on the home front. The argument is difficult for a Republican seeking the nomination from people accustomed to a more partisan attack—particularly when the candidate is much more vivid and savage in assailing tories of his own party.

There was added the personal element—the trouble Willkie has in fighting, in so many ways, for pure principle, while he virtually reads out of the Presidential race all other candidates and allows the people to assume that he really considers himself the indispensable Republican. When Harold Stassen appealed for votes in the peculiar formula dictated by his naval connections, Willkie did not help himself by pretending that the statement was ambiguous. Most of the eminent political correspondents traveling with him respect him greatly, but he did not endear himself by a resentful, ungracious comment about an opposition Senator who had sent him polite personal regards.

Willkie's cause was strengthened when William T. Eviue, editor of the Capital Times and veteran leader of the internationalist wing of the Progressives, indorsed his candidacy. He presumably could benefit from the broad Wisconsin election laws, which would allow liberal Democrats, Progressives, and independents, lacking statewide contests of their own, to enter the Republican primary.

The fight, however, has been admittedly an uphill struggle. Willkie knows this, and there is something admirable about his dogged faith that if the American people can just be shown the issues, tory obstructionists and nationalists will be overthrown. At this writing he needs, to survive as a strong candidate, a large popular vote and at least a majority of the state's twenty district delegates and four delegates-at-large. If he should get more than that, it would represent a truly impressive popular victory. Some of the experienced local newspapermen think he will score this kind of victory—but those who make this guess happen to be strongly pro-Willkie themselves.

How to Get a Better Congress

BY PHILIP BLAIR RICE

POR the majority of Americans, the 1944 election promises to be just another heavyweight-title bout. There will be preliminary matches, so to speak, between such lesser fry as Congressional candidates, but only the insiders will know the names of the contestants or trouble to place a bet on them. The spotlight will be reserved for the battle between the Champ and the Contender—or, in case the Champ has gone into retirement, between the two Contenders with the heavy punches.

That the language of Madison Square Garden should be appropriate to a national election is unfortunate. For not one but two of the principal arms of the government are elected, at least theoretically, by the people. No matter how good a President we may choose, he is ineffective unless he has a Congress with which he can work, and he may become overweening unless he can be checked by a Congress that supplies a high type of statesman-like criticism. Recent Congresses have contained some able men and passed measures to avert disaster on the war and home fronts. But the margin has been too close for comfort. The first Lend-Lease Act, and with it very likely the fate of our allies and the whole outcome of the war, depended on one vote in the House of Representatives. The present Congress has disfranchised the greater part of eleven million men and women in uniform. It has refused to vote an adequate tax bill, and it has often yielded to pressure groups bent on inflation. It has also failed to oppose the Administration for the State Department's support of such anti-democratic forces as Badoglio, Giraud, and Franco. These are only a few of the bad omens for the vigorous prosecution of the war, and for the peace and the reconstruction.

Many liberals, if not yet the general public, are realizing belatedly that Congress is an important part of the American system of government, and that greater care must be exercised in its selection. But few practical suggestions have been offered for doing anything about it. One thing seems certain. The effort to improve Congress must be carried out locally, in the Congressional districts themselves. It must start from the "grass roots." Voters must find, well in advance of the primaries and conventions, methods of encouraging better candidates to fight for the nomination, of obtaining information about them, and of mobilizing public opinion.

But how to do this? A group of citizens in central Ohio, a state not noted for distinguished representation in Congress, believe they have found a way. Let us listen to their story.

One hot evening in June, 1942, five men were sitting in the yard of one of them in the Ohio village of Gambier. All these men happened to be nominally Democrats, although none of them voted a straight ticket consistently. So far as the rest of the story goes, they might just as well have been Republicans, or adherents of a minor party. From the war the talk drifted to politics. It developed that none of the men liked the way the Representative of their six-county district in Congress, a Republican isolationist and reactionary, had voted on national issues.

"Who's running for the Democratic nomination for Congress in this district?" one of the men asked.

Nobody knew.

"Does anybody know the county chairman?"

"I do," said the only one in the group who had ever been active in politics—he was a precinct committeeman. "I was talking to him the other day. He knew that a candidate had filed from Newark and another from Ashland, but he couldn't remember their names and he didn't know anything about them."

"It seems," another remarked, "that our privilege as free citizens of one of the few remaining democracies will consist in the ability to mark an X before the name of either Joe Doakes or Sam Soakes. If we vote for Joe rather than Sam, it will be because we like Joe's name better, or because our precinct committeeman here tells us that Joe is a good fellow, or because we have learned that he belongs to our lodge. The great mass of voters in the other party will choose with similar enlightenment. Another guessing game will take place in November, Out of this process several hundred men will assemble in Washington to form a Congress supposed to be 'representative of the people.'"

"Well," said the precinct committeeman, "there will be a party rally in a couple of weeks at the Old Mill. You can go to that. Along with several dozen other candidates, the aspiring Congressmen will probably give two-minute speeches. And there will be a fish fry and free beer."

"So we'll have two minutes to learn where they stand on military affairs, diplomacy, labor relations, the farm situation, and the post-war world. That'll be a big help."

The men sat thinking for a while. Then one of them said: "It's not so funny. They're asking us to elect them to run the war and maybe make the peace. We ought to know what they stand for. Why let the machine hand-pick them for us? Why not ask them to come here to speak and to answer our questions?"

The suggestion caught on.

"What will we call our meeting?"

"Why not call it the Democratic Forum? The forum idea has been successful on the radio. It's the modern equivalent of the town meeting."

A week later about twenty men and women—farmers, workingmen, professional men, housewives, a grocer, the local station agent—assembled in the Gambier community center to plan the meeting. They constituted themselves a Committee for a Democratic Forum, and elected as co-chairmen a college professor and a bookkeeper.

Both the Democratic candidates accepted the committee's invitation, and announcements of the forthcoming meeting were circulated by small boys to all the houses in Gambier—including those of Republicans as well as Democrats—and mailed to farmers in the surrounding townships. The small costs were footed by contributions from members of the committee.

"We're tired of voting for candidates we know nothing about," read the announcement in part. "To elect a good Congress is just as important as anything we civilians can do to help the war effort. We need a Congress of which we can be, confident that it will have the courage to impose upon us the sacrifices necessary for an all-out war effort, that it will not go in for appeasement when the war begins to pinch, and that it will win the peace. We also want men with the wisdom to make a better America when the war is over."

The first public meeting of Ohio Democratic Forum No. 1 was held in the auditorium of the Gambier High School on the evening of July 17, 1942. Although the thermometer registered in the nineties, about 125 people were present, in a community which usually casts 300 to 400 votes.

The two Congressional candidates spoke for fifteen minutes each, and afterward, for an hour and a half, the members of the audience addressed questions to the speakers. They asked for their views on the conduct of the war, on inflation, on taxation, on the government's labor and farm policies, on the issue of internationalism vs. isolationism, on post-war reconstruction. If a candidate seemed reluctant to answer, his questioners hammered away at him until they found out whether he was dodging the issue or had genuinely failed to make up his mind because of lack of adequate information.

It was evident that the audience did not expect the candidate to be a superman, or to have all the answers in detail. But they did wish to learn how honest and courageous he was intellectually, what was his general attitude toward the important questions of the day, how much thinking he had done, and how effective a speaker he was likely to be in Congress. At the end of the meeting he was no longer just Joe Doakes to them.

One of the significant results of the first forum was that there was a record Democratic vote in Gambier for an off-year primary, although the vote in the rest of the state, and in the nation, was one of the lightest in history. After the primary, the Democratic voters of Gambier united behind their party's candidate, held another meeting, and worked at the polls to get out the vote on Election Day. The November, 1942, election was, of course, a Republican landslide in Ohio and in the Middle West generally. But the politicians of the district observed that Gambier and the surrounding townships were the only communities in Knox County that gave a majority to the Democratic Congressional candidate. It seemed that democratic methods, with a small d, might help the Democratic-or the Republican-Party! By their use, amateurs in politics had succeeded in getting out the vote, whereas the professionals had failed.

The members of the Democratic Forum believe not only that they have found a way of choosing more intelligently between the candidates that offer themselves, but that the spread of the forum method would in a short time produce better candidates as well. At present, in order to be nominated, an able candidate must by devious ways win the favor of the party machine and of the more sinister influences which sometimes furnish the machine its backing. But the forum gives the candidate a chance to present his case directly to the public. And it enlists in active party politics many citizens who otherwise would keep aloof.

Non-partisan forums have their place. But the central feature of the Democratic Forum is that it is, in a new sense, partisan. Its organizers believe that "party politics" need no longer be a term with a stigma to it. The American system is a party system. Candidates are nominated by their parties and voted for on party ballots. If shame has attached to party politics in the past, this is because the operations of the party system have been subject to secret manipulation; because, in short, our parties have not been democratic. What the forum idea proposes is to bring party politics to the people and democratize the parties themselves.

The Democratic Forum movement has already begun to spread. Inquiries as to how to form similar forums have been received from spots as far from Ohio as Maryland and Texas. In small communities, where the newspapers give even less attention to the Congressional elections than in the cities, and in the South, where the primary is the real election, the forums are especially serviceable.

While the founders of Ohio Democratic Forum No. 1 are pleased at the interest shown in their idea, and glad to affiliate with other forums, they insist on emphasizing certain cautions. The forums must be kept democratic with a small d. If they are controlled by any candidate or group for selfish ends, they will soon alienate the interest of the public. They must be kept independent of the regular party organizations, and their meetings must be open to all, regardless of party. Any registered voter of the party in question must be eligible for voting membership in the forum. The officers must be elected at public meetings. The forum, moreover, should be organized by citizens who do not seek office and who have no other personal ax to grind. Although petitions may be circulated and debated at meetings, the forum as a group should not pass any resolutions on matters of public policy. And it should not officially back any candidate, but should give a hearing to all who present themselves, within the limits of the audience's endurance and the chairman's discretion. For its chief function is the mutual education of the electorate and the candidate.

Many European nations have drifted into dictatorship because of the incompetence of their legislative bodies.

One way to keep this from happening in America, so these citizens of Ohio believe, is to create new mechanisms whereby our representatives can function more effectively both as servants and as leaders of the people. They believe that the time is ripe for some new manifestations of the democratic spirit, and these will require initiative and political inventiveness on the part of citizens everywhere.

FIRST PRINCIPLES

Or How to Think About Mortimer Adler's "How to Think About War and Peace"

In five hundred years all wars will cease, And, by elementary logic, we shall then have peace. A is A, B is not non-B,

Time must not be mixed up with Eternity,
Eternity is comforting when you're distressed
About battles in the East and invasion in the West,
When you painfully wonder how the world will fare
When the killing has stopped on land, sea, and air.
Don't worry about cartels or the Culbertson plan,
Or Union with Britain by that Lippmann man,
Don't fret about boundaries and areas and such,
And the claims of the Finns and the Greeks and the Dutch,

Be calm and be spacious; think in centuries at least, Things'll clear up nicely when you're long deceased. Don't fuss about the present; give your spirit wings, Think quite quietly on quite vast things, Dismiss all transient nonsense about trade and pacts, Forget markets and materials, mere mundane facts, The next ten years may be cruel and strange, A thousand years will be your proper range. Though everything now seems confused and hectic, Settle down with a sedative of pure dialectic. Here all is in order, in a nice neat book That looks down the centuries with a far-flung look. The boys at Cassino will love to hear That in half a millennium things will be all clear. On the Anzio beachhead they will learn with glee That posterity will some day shout "Q. E. D.!" In five hundred years you'll know the score, Or you would, save you won't be around any more! The next ten years are the merest jot, We'll get through those, or we won't, so what? Just think clearly for five hundred years, And everything will come out lovely, dears, Think of first principles; they come quite gratis, And you'll live sub specie aeternitatis. War is not peace, and peace is not war, So go to sleep, children, and please don't snore.

Jack and the Jackpot

BY KARL KEYERLEBER

BILL JACK has spent thousands of dollars in recent months in an effort to prove that his Jack and Heintz Company is teetering on the verge of bankruptcy. He speaks almost as often as Wendell Willkie, and while he covers somewhat less ground than Mrs. Roosevelt he makes up in velocity what he may lack in global distance.

Jack, who once paid a secretary $18,295 for ten weeks' work, is probably the country's best-known champion of incentive pay for factory workers. That may be an understatement. The Cleveland plant, where workers are known as "associates" and extra-curricular employee benefits are on a scale that makes old-line industrialists shudder, has become famous for two things—production and publicity. Since Jack came into contact with the hard facts of war-time government controls there is a question whether the emphasis on the second has not outstripped the undoubted emphasis placed on the first.

When necktieless Bill Jack spoke last month in the Mayflower Hotel in Washington at a dinner to which he had invited all the members of both houses of Congress, he carried to a dizzy peak a campaign that must have made Barnum stir uneasily in his grave. Arguments still go on as to whether the people's representatives equaled or were outnumbered by planted "cheer leaders" at the Washington dinner. The debate is pointless. Sufficient Representatives and Senators attended to make the stunt a success. It drew the nation's attention from a global war to Jack's private war. With his feet planted firmly on the glorious heritage of American free enterprise and his head in the stratosphere of a new industrial philosophy, he has challenged the army and the navy and "the whole damn government," whose price-adjustment procedure he calls dictatorship.

The war began when an army price board which renegotiated the company's contracts last year decided that Jack and Heintz should refund to the government $1,750,000 which was considered excessive profit on sales of airplane-starter assemblies and automatic pilots to the services in 1942. Since the company already had paid taxes of $5,250,000, the total amounted to a round $7,000,000, plus some interest.

Jack reacted swiftly. He stood, like Foch in 1918, and breathed defiance. "My center is giving way, my right is pushed back," he told a trusted associate. "Excellent! I shall attack."

The attack was both frontal and enveloping. Jack, a stocky, dynamic, fiftyish fellow with a penchant for open-throated sport shirts and exuberant phraseology—both sometimes seem a size too big for the man—carried his case to the people. He began to speak on all the better Chamber of Commerce rostrums east of the Rockies, the guest of men who once looked askance at his revolutionary manufacturing methods. Nearly fifty leading newspapers blossomed out this winter with company advertisements denouncing the renegotiation of war contracts and asking support for the fight against the statute.

Jack launched a stock-selling scheme through which employees pledged future earnings to the company, causing one Clevelander to chortle: "My Gawd, now Jack is renegotiating his associates!" And finally he drew from a secret drawer his master-plan, a turning movement around the Congressional flank, with enfilading elocution.

The starters still rolled out—there is a company song about that—but they no longer kept pace with the stories about the concern and its voluble president. So many roving reporters prowled through the place that both Reader's Digest and General Hershey's Selective Service were weighing the advisability of opening branch offices in the lobby. "We call it the milk run," observed the Jack and Heintz publications man who drives visiting writers from Cleveland through the smoke-filled Cuyahoga Valley to Bedford, home of the main plant.

The stories of the fabulous war-born industrial wonderland which formed the background for Jack's fight on renegotiation both complicated the issues and reduced them to human and tangible terms not often found in what are likely to be referred to as soulless corporations. Jack uprooted his infant Jack and Heintz concern when he encountered labor trouble in California a few years ago, and moved to Cleveland. Somewhere in the process he found a lot of answers. He introduced a new laborrelations philosophy which he termed "industrial humanism," and gave his workers wide freedom on the job while keeping an oddly tight checkrein on their lives. The fact that he brought his experiment to full flower at a time when government orders poured in on his newly organized company may have been a coincidence. At any rate it was opportune, because most of the answers he had found seemed to involve money-gobs of it.

Jack and Heintz was organized late in 1940 with $100,000 capital in the name of four men. Within a year, while the nation rushed to rearm, it acquired a $20,000,000 backlog of orders, and last year it did more than $100,000,000 worth of business. In 1941 the company divided a $650,000 Christmas bonus, and new watches ticked on 800 associated wrists. From an original 30, the associates have multiplied to a present strength of 7,600. They are housed in a $3,500,000 plant—or rather six plants—built and equipped by the government even to office and cafeteria furniture. Out of the federal till has come $11,670,000 in cash for working capital.

The associates work hard—twelve hours a day and seven days a week—but they live. Here is a factory without a time clock, operated somewhat on the lines of a combined camp meeting, football rally, and circus. Every new associate receives a free pair of expensive shoes. "A man can't do good work when his feet hurt." If a worker feels "bushed" he may knock off from work and take a steam bath, followed by a rubdown by the company's masseur. He gets a life-insurance policy without cost. Free meals are served under the direction of a famed chef, and coffee and bouillon are available all the time.

If in spite of these aids to morale the long hours get an associate down he is sent with his family to Florida or Maine, depending on the season, for a vacation at company expense. Jack and Heintz bought Florida apartments and leased a honeymoon island in the Gulf of Mexico and the famed Breakers Hotel at Cedar Point on Lake Erie. A former gambling club which had been bought by Bill Jack's brother was turned into a bowling alley and recreation club. When some of the boys in the front office had trouble meeting their income-tax payments one year, the company slipped $10,000 into their pay envelopes. Each Christmas everybody hits the Jackpot for another bonus. There have been no strikes, almost no absenteeism.

The experiment in human relations and the high "take-home" pay brought Jack and Heintz a waiting list of 15,000 applicants for jobs at a time when the Cleveland man-power situation was getting very tight. It was not Utopia on an eighty-four-hour week, as it sometimes was pictured by awed writers. But it paid off in high production per man. Over the plant flies an army-navy "E" pennant.

In it rules a martinet in mufti who sometimes makes his workmen wonder about that new-fangled factory democracy. They call the boss Bill when he stops at their benches, but if they are not true to their wives or don't park their cars in the neat pattern laid out for them they draw public reprimands. "Either a man plays the game fair or he won't be an associate long," is a Jack dictum which brought some sotto voce responses that the removal of an associate from the pay roll would take no longer t an the firing of an employee by some less enlightened industrialist.

Through a microphone on his desk Jack toils tirelessly to build up his associates' morale. He boasts that he works not twelve but twenty hours each day, and at any time, day or night, his voice may boom over the loud speaker to announce that a new production goal has been passed or that Bill Smith has a birthday or Lottie Snafu a baby. He writes homely parodies to entertain his peers. One, inspired by Elbert Hubbard's "A Message to Garcia," he called "A Message to Mr. Guggenheim." It had a moral, Most of them do.

Every Saturday night there is a banquet at a Cleveland hotel, and here Jack keeps in training for his formal speaking engagements. Associates, accustomed to attending boxing shows or hockey games after Jack has assured the promoter, "Sure, there'll be 1,500 of us there," and to donating to worthy causes whenever he pledges their support, always show up for the company banquets. After a number had been held, it was noted that those who had stopped at the bar for a bracer sometimes fell asleep in the middle of the head man's speech. This difficulty was solved by limiting all associates to a single drink until after the banquet. A company representative supervises the distribution. "And this guy talks about government dictatorship," commented a thirsty associate.

For his twenty-hour day and his genius Jack paid himself $150,000 in 1942. There seems little doubt that by many standards he was worth it, although Under Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson pointed out that the year's return was six times his investment in the company less than two years before. Somebody else observed that Jack had more than once announced publicly that no company officer was making more than $25,000 a year. According to Patterson, Ralph M. Heintz, the silent half of the company's name, also received $150,000 and two of Jack's sons drew a total of $216,500.

At this point the Jack and Heintz case gets very complicated. There is a widespread impression that the honeymoon island, free vitamin pills and rubdowns, and other employee benefits have been attacked by the government. According to Jack himself, none was disallowed as a business expense, though some of them could be challenged as scarcely allocable to the price of airplane starters.

The Price Adjustment Board was interested in lower prices. Jack claimed that his unusual employee methods resulted in high production, and the board apparently took him at his word. But it entered the two top salaries, plus bonuses, at $75,000 each and made other revisions at the executive level, charging the difference to company profit instead of to costs. The company wanted to put aside a fund of $1,750,000 for post-war purposes. Since the renegotiation statute contained no provision for post-war reserves, this also was credited to profit.

There remained one of the biggest questions in the whole proceeding: how much profit to allow the company on business supported by $15,000,000 of the tax-payers' capital. This has been a hotly disputed point. The original Jack and Heintz investment was $100,000, and more money was "plowed back" later for capital. Jack also asserts that he borrowed a million dollars from a Cleveland bank when the company was organized. Whatever the total, it is only a fraction of the government investment.

Jack demanded at least 5 per cent of the total volume as the company's profit. What he got is not clear. In its newspaper advertising the company presented a "balance sheet" showing that taxes and renegotiation left a net loss of $2,826 for 1942. Working from the same figures, the War Department, according to Patterson, found a profit of $1,361,000 after taxes and renegotiation.

Jack claims high production per man, which hardly can be challenged since all the associates have been working eighty-four hours a week. He also claims high production per dollar through incentive and management efficiency. This has been less easy to prove. Fortune attempted to reach some conclusions by comparing costs. It cited a price of $1,870 for automatic pilots built by Jack and Heintz as against $2,200 for those built by the Sperry Corporation. On starters, however, Fortune said the Jahco JH-3 cost the army $320, while the Bendix Eclipse Series 43, which the magazine's researchers said was comparable, cost only $194.

Jack says they are not comparable and repudiates the figures. "Ours cost $262.50," he told me. "That is the smallest production starter we make. It has twice the power and is lighter—an important factor—than the Bendix Series 43. The Army Air Service Command made a study of their starter against ours and took the Series 43 off the Flying Fortress and other planes and put ours on." One thing the controversy has proved beyond dispute is that figures can be made to say anything. Whether Jack is merely cashing in on war-time gravy may be a question that will have to wait until it is learned whether he can offer similar employee inducements in peace time and still undersell competitors.

Meanwhile he continues his trial-by-denunciation of the Price Adjustment Board. Jack told the Congressmen who were his guests that he had no quarrel with them, only with the board. This is about as logical as for a condemned man to say he has no quarrel with the judge but only with the bailiff who leads him to his cell. Jack's quatrel is with Congress, which passed the price-adjustment statute and retained it in the latest revenue act despite some of the most severe pressure ever brought to bear on a legislative body. A Congress in the main sympathetic to business was not convinced that the price boards were putting anybody out of business.

Nazis Under Twenty-one

BY KARL O. PAETEL

H

PROBABLY no current question is discussed in such purely emotional terms as that of the future of German youth. Sentimental disregard of the record, on the one hand, and uncritical, all-inclusive hatred, on the other, make realistic analysis difficult.

We can get some idea of what will happen to German youth after the collapse of the Nazi regime only if we take the trouble to differentiate its contradictory tendencies and trace them to their origins; only thus can we find the answer to the question of how the progressive cooperative elements among them, so small today, can be expanded and finally reintegrated into the life of the new Europe.

Since the war broke out, the whole program of the Hitler Youth has been devoted to "war fitness," and attendance at "war-fitness camps" is compulsory for the older members. Since early in 1943 the camps have taken all boys in the last two years of high school provided they are fifteen and a half years old. The regular camp period is three weeks, but boys of seventeen, if they wish, may go for four weeks and join the army immediately afterward.

According to the Nazi press, 362 boys and girls in the Seventh District of Berlin were taken into the National Socialist Party in the middle of 1943; 162 of them were already in the army. Assuming that about half the total number were girls, it appears that all the seventeen-year-old boys in the district had volunteered (a boy of seventeen may join the army either as a private or as a long-term officer candidate). Lately more and more sixteen-year-olds have been appearing at the front, and it is reported that fifteen-year-olds are now permitted to volunteer.

Many schoolboys are drafted into the Luftwaffe or the navy as "helpers." They live in barracks or on ships, under the supervision of a Hitlerjugend leader who acts as foreman. Those who want to join the Waffen-S.S. may notify the Labor Service at the age of sixteen and a half, and with its permission may transfer to the S.S. after half a year, or even three months. Time spent in the Black Shirts is credited to their Labor Service records.

On May 5, 1942, a decree issued jointly by the president of the National Socialist Teachers' League and the Man-Power Commissioner authorized the employment of boys and girls as helpers in a variety of occupations. Some 250,000 members of the Hitlerjugend have since joined fire brigades; more than a million members of the Bund Deutscher Mädchen are in the Sanitation. Health, and Household Help Service; the Deutsches Jungvolk has long been assigning its members to salvage and farm service; the Hitlerjugend and the Jungmadel likewise enlist their members in the scrap-metal service, the Winter Relief, the Wounded Relief, the herb-collection service, and such other jobs as helping in railroad stations and caring for workers' children. At the beginning of this year plans were under way for the organization of a courier service using boys ten to thirteen years old and of "flying squadrons" of sixteen-year-olds to help the police and the Waffen-S.S., with full police powers. Many boys and girls thirteen to fifteen years old work in war industries. With iron consistency the Nazi Party has organized the life of German youth for its own purposes. The individual lives of these young people are being swallowed up in the common life of the organizations to which they belong.

It is not surprising, then, to hear reports that the great Hitlerjugend recruiting drives—for the Waffen-S.S., for example—are beginning to meet some resistance, that the Hitlerjugend leader of Hamburg has been attacked more than once by groups of boys, that severe punishments have been imposed for avoidance of membership in the Hitlerjugend, and that the authority of the juvenile courts has been greatly broadened; or to find the press publishing letters from the front like this one:

I think of home. I remember a night in the mountains with the Hitlerjugend. We were happy and full of hope as we sat around the fire and sang songs, songs of freedom and glory, of faith and victory. We all believed in a better future.

The children whose laughter echoed through the mountains that night have grown up. Now we know what duty requires of us. We know what it means to die. We have no time for campfires in the mountains.

We would like to know whether those fires that meant so much to us still burn at home. Do they still burn in people's hearts, or did they light up the darkness only for a moment and then die, and with them faith and hope?

But not all German boys would feel like writing such letter. Between the veterans of the last war, from whom come the leaders of the present, and the Nazi-educated youngsters who have grown up in the shadow of the hooked cross are the all but forgotten youth who grew up in the post-war years. This in-between generation, which in the early thirties lived through the clash of ideologies and the chaos of political violence, was then in large part under the illusion that it could restore order and "harmony" by joining youth movements and the semi-military formations of the Nazis. Some joined the party under pressure of circumstances; some were careerists without strong political convictions of any kind.

Even among the veterans of the last war, skepticism is growing. They "do their part," but without the fanaticism of the younger Nazis. They take orders, but carry them out with less enthusiasm than their younger brothers. This development was recognized at the third convention of Hitlerjugend leaders at Weimar in 1938, when they were divided into a well-paid Führercorps and an unpaid Führerschaft. The Hitlerjugend, whose 8,000,000 members take orders from 30,000 higher and middle leaders and 500,000 lower leaders, is thus divided horizontally.

This stratification undoubtedly has a social character. Official statistics show that 70 per cent of the 500,000 subalterns come from the lowest income groups, and that positions of real influence at all levels are reserved for Black Shirts, regular party teachers, and old party officials. Thus virtually all the pre-Hitler youth leaders are barred from top positions in the hierarchy. (Baldur von Schirach, the head man, once wrote in the official youth magazine, "Autonomous youth are a form of Bolshevism.") But the lower ranks of the leaders include a relatively high proportion of men in whom the influence of the old organizations persists. Today, since they are debarred not only from administrative but also from social and political influence, more and more of them are reverting to their former beliefs. The result of stratification has been a growing disillusionment.

In this connection it is important to note the effects of the system on the youngest boys, those who have not yet entered the army. These children, to whom National Socialism means only the daily "service" they perform, the death of relatives, and the possibility of being ausgebombt, whose little spare time is largely taken up with lectures on the need for endurance, and who lack the crusading élan that marked the earlier years of the Hitlerjugend—these children are beginning to be "difficult." They are growing indifferent to their tasks and to the war. Every adolescent child is full of burning questions. The pre-Hitler youth organizations afforded opportunities for open discussion, but today all such questions are officially dismissed as "individualistic."

Thus both among the youth leaders and among the children there is latent opposition to the regime. And as the militant generation between them is reduced by death in battle, the mounting psychological strain on the older and younger generations will become increasingly a source of danger to the government. The broadened authority of the juvenile courts is aimed partly at real criminality but mostly at the passive resistance of the young "war casualties." On the day after Hitler's downfall these boys and girls will become the nucleus of the new Germany.

What may we expect of them?

It is useless to draw up a detailed program of "reeducation" for them now. Concrete situations will require different procedures at different times and places. But the general approach must be an appeal to responsibility. To impose foreign teachers on the children would only arouse opposition. Obviously, textbooks and courses must be changed, but we must not overestimate the immediate effects of such changes. To get the boys and girls to participate willingly in the program, emphasis should be placed on the building of youth groups in the various cities, districts, and provinces-and such groups should be built from the bottom up. Men who are young in spirit and who speak the language of German youth should gather boys and girls around them to work cooperatively on the pressing problems that will face them, and thus indirectly lead them to an acceptance of democratic values.

The process could be helped along by ideological discussions, in which the leader would emphasize the progressive aspects of the German tradition, the common destiny of Europe, etc. When the psychological ground has thus been democratically prepared, when the youth are capable of accepting a new type of formal education, it will be possible to work out a broad program that they will follow. The program will thus be a native growth for which they themselves will have been fully responsible. Only thus can they be united in devotion to their new tasks; only thus can the grip of National Socialism be broken; only thus can all elements, political, religious, and occupational, be united in the building of a new order.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

A NOTHER Catholic priest, a Dr. Alfons Wachsmann of Griefswald, has been executed in Germany. The Pomeranian local papers printed the announcement in the middle of March. They added that the priest had been condemned to death for his "disintegrating influence on German military strength"—by which is to be understood a defeatist or anti-Nazi influence on members of the armed forces.

The news reminds us that the peculiar war between the Catholic church and the Nazi regime-on neither side open war but rather a guerrilla struggle-is still going on. Another incident in this war is brought to our notice by a furious outburst in the Dutch Nazi newspaper Volk en Vaderland. At the beginning of the year Lieutenant General Seyffardt, a Dutch Nazi, founder of the Dutch Legion, which sent a battalion to fight on the Russian front, was murdered. The assassin was caught, sentenced to death by a German military court, and executed. Soon afterward a solemn mass for him was celebrated in a Catholic church in Amsterdam, with the expressed approval of the bishop. The organist even conceived the idea of playing, after the mass, the song of mourning for fellow-soldiers, "Ich hatt' einen Kameraden," which is as much a favorite in Holland as in Germany. "When we realize," the Dutch Nazi paper commented, "that no music can be played in church that has not been approved by the clergy, it becomes clear that the whole performance was meant as an extraordinary demonstration." But the paper phrased its real grievance as follows: "Catholic law in Holland is thus shown to have two faces. A National Socialist, even one who has been assassinated, cannot be buried in consecrated ground, but the assassin of a National Socialist is worthy of a requiem mass."

Among the surprising turns in this hesitating, half-hearted guerrilla war is the fact that the chaplain, the pastor, and the organist of the Amsterdam church, after being arrested and held for four days in a German prison, on the fifth day were set free—to the indignation of their Nazi compatriots. "German patience and tolerance in this case," grumbled the Volk en Vaderland. "will certainly surprise thousands of people in this country."

For a long time it has been very difficult in Germany to get a pair of shoes or a watch repaired. And now the screw is to be given another turn. In an industrial district in the west artisans and shops were forbidden on March 3 to undertake any more repairs for people. A "Central Office for Repairs" is to be set up. Anyone who wants repairs done must make a written application to the Central Office, which "will distribute orders among the artisans and shops after thoroughly investigating the urgency of the requested repairs."

Once German professors had a good name. Professor von Leers, author of an article in the Angriff of Berlin for February 23, is a new type—as a representative of learning or of the nobility. Excerpts from his article are given below:

The people of Berlin call the terror raiders "swine." The term is too mild, for the pig is a useful animal. Terror raiders are Pestschweine (pestilential swine), a nauseous plague of the world. They no longer have anything in common with humanity. Our people ask, ever more gravely and frequently, whether we should adhere to international law in our treatment of these beasts of hell. . . .

It is wrong to call these beasts Lufthunnen (Huns of the air). Compared with the Anglo-Saxon Pestschweine, the Huns were decent, respectable people. What must we do now? Work, work, and again work for the hour of vengeance. . . .

Let them make their invasion! None of them will leave Europe alive. Our people are waiting to spring at their throats. We have reached the point to which these hirelings of the Jews wanted to drive us. Now we feel toward the beasts nothing but merciless hatred. Let nobody in the next thousand years talk of a blood relationship between us and them.

Somewhat delayed, information has now reached here that even persons ill with tuberculosis have been put to work in German factories. Regulations for their employment were published in the September 8, 1943, issue of the Reichs-Gesundheitsblatt, organ of the Ministry of Health. The notice said in part:

A sufferer from active tuberculosis who, it has been determined by clinical examination, does not cough very much and ejects only a small quantity of phlegm presents little danger of infection under normal working conditions if he observes a strict discipline. . . . Practically speaking, he presents no danger at all as long as he is employed in work which the medical authorities consider suitable, avoids close contact with his fellowworkers, and is segregated from juveniles.

It has accordingly been decreed that all physicians and clinics treating tubercular patients "must inform the Labor Offices which of their patients are able to work." In tuberculosis sanitariums representatives of the Labor Offices will discuss the future employment of patients with the physicians and give the required orders.

Epic of Brazil

REBELLION IN THE BACKLANDS (OS SERTOES). By Euclides da Cunha. Translated by Samuel Putnam. University of Chicago Press. $5.

S SERTOES" is one of those astonishing, original works which appear from time to time, like a volcano in a quiet plain, to remind us that man is not merely unpredictable but creative. There is nothing like it in Brazilian literature, or in any other. Out of a local struggle between the troops of the young republic and a group of frontier outlaws led by a religious fanatic, Euclides da Cunha evolves major document, not merely in the historical sense, but in philosophical and sociological terms as well.

Beginning with the desert land itself and the problems its imposes on man, he scrutinizes the kinds of men who come there, and what the environment makes of them. Proceeding with a noble disregard of the reader's ease, he comes in due course to the character of Antonio Conselheiro, the primitive mystic who not merely leads but symbolizes the forces of superstition and lawlessness in this isolated society. The revolt at Canudos and the difficulty with which it was put down greatly shocked the people of coastal Brazil. With a scientist's laborious passion the author demonstrates not only how it all happened but that it was inevitable and, indeed, of significance.

No book has had a deeper influence on the formation of the Brazilian mind. Here the Brazilians saw what their country was really like. They saw the shocking disparity between the Europeanized seaboard and the primitive life of the interior. But it also became clear to them that the men of the backlands, because they were at home in that terrible environment, were, paradoxically, superior to the government troops. By emphasizing that there is not one right way of doing things-and that European-but different ways for different people in different situations, Euclides da Cunha indicates the whole problem of the self-realization of nation. In this lies the historical importance of the book, and for this reason it deserves a place in American literature in the larger sense, since we are all struggling with that problem. Even for the writers of Brazil, "Os Sertoes" became a symbol, like Walt Whitman or the Gettysburg Address, of their freedom from classical patterns, and of their responsibility to explore the Brazilian scene.

Whether, aside from its importance in Brazilian culture, this book is a masterpiece in the literary sense is something one has no right to judge from a translation and a smattering of Portuguese. There is no denying that it suffers from the defects of its qualities: in being bold and uncompromising it is often uncouth and unwieldy; in being exact it becomes pedantic; it is, at least in translation, somewhat pompous, and it is never winning in style. The casual reader will do well to proceed wilfully, skipping the first ninety pages to begin, in the section on Man, with the famous description of the sertanejo, proceeding from there to the story of the account of the military action at Canudos. This is all good reading. Moreover, taking the narrative before the theory serves to isolate the author's more serious defect, the inconsistency of his thought on social and particularly racial problems. In the chapters entitled An Irritating Parenthesis and A Strong Race he states baldly that "an intermingling of races highly diverse is, in the majority of cases, prejudicial"-but he then goes on to show how interesting, able, and in fact dynamic the new breed of the backlands is. Since he cannot manage to adjust the exaggerated nineteenth-century theories of racial superiority and racial purity to the actualities of the rebellion at Canudos, the theory and its contradiction stand side by side, a fascinating historical text for the sociologist. In fact, those ideas are oldfashioned and outworn, and it is encouraging to realize the extent to which we have been freed from them-in the scientific, if not in the political, sphere—by the anthropologists of our time. Euclides da Cunha's difficulty is mainly his inability to see that culture is a cumulative historical product, not a function of race, and that the superstition, the retarded society, and the primitive conditions of the backlands were the result not of mixed blood but of isolation and poverty. It is also encouraging that modern Brazilian sociologists have focused on the facts rather than the fallacies in "Os Sertoes," which has had an appreciable influence on their own dynamic attitude toward race and nationalism. Perhaps this is, in turn, a vindication of the literary force of the narrative.

Two things about this edition seem to me impediments to the simple pleasure of reading—the footnotes and the introduction, or rather the first half of the introduction, which for ten pages quotes eulogies of the book. There is always something repugnant about superlatives; certainly they should be selected and interpreted-or at least confined to the blurb. The footnotes seem faintly insulting. Clarifying footnotes are quite unavoidable in a translation of this kind, but any reader resents being pulled up on every page with an order to "See page 130." The author could have made a reference to page 130 himself if he had wanted to; if he was content to trust the interest of the reader, why should the editor thrust himself in? The book is in some ways difficult, but not so difficult as that. On the other hand, the glossaries, with the scientific and linguistic research they imply, the maps, the excellent indexes, and Mr. Putnam's biographical sketch of Euclides da Cunha are important aids to the scholar. It is unfortunate that his essay on the book and its author-his estimate of their significance after the long period of intimacy-should have been printed elsewhere (Science and Society, fall, 1943) rather than as a suitable introduction to this edition.

These are minor indignations, however; no one will deny that a difficult task has been performed with a good deal of spirit and success. There is no literary problem more trying, and in fact impossible, than translation, and to translate from the Portuguese is much more difficult than from the French, for instance, if only because it has been so little done. The two languages have not rubbed against each other enough; there is not yet any facility in dealing with that alien grammatical structure, or recognized English equivalents for Brazilian phrases. Perhaps for this reason the translator shows a tendency to disregard the connotations of English words: a common Portuguese word is translated by a rare or archaic English word because it is equivalent in dictionary meaning, although the English sentence has then quite a different feeling from the Portuguese, and the reader is pulled up by its curious stiffness. Any reader of the English version will be impressed, however, by the number of words for things and places, for plants and animals, and even for men which we have never needed at all in English, and which cannot be translated. Vocabulary shows pretty clearly where a people are ignorant, and the very fact of this translation assures that in time the sertanejo, like the gaucho, will be part of our speech-though not even the Department of State can predict how we shall pronounce it!

In short, whether we believe that it is a great classic of the Americas or merely a historical oddity, "Revolt in the Backlands" marks an important day in American affairs. You can find out fifty times as much about Brazil from this book as from the handbooks written by touring journalists. Perhaps it is even more important that now for the first time the North American has the opportunity to share in a significant experience of Brazilian literature and history, and to judge for himself. #### The Thinking of a Nation

THE GROWTH OF AMERICAN THOUGHT. By Merle Curti. Harper and Brothers. $5.

T A time like the present, when the contradictions and A naive slackness of American institutions are painfully apparent, it is a sobering thing to read Mr. Curti's book. Throughout our national life we have been largely content, as a hustling nation born under a lucky star, to leave major issues unresolved and hanging optimistically in loose couplets: the rights of property and the rights of man; political equality and economic inequality; majority rule and minority rights; free competition and monopoly; thrift and commercially fostered conspicuous consumption; freedom of the press and news dissemination as private business enterprise. Always there has been the pragmatic assumption that there is no need to cross ideological bridges until we come to them. In our continental isolation this philosophy of casualness seemed to work. But the peculiar quality about the present is that choices among alternatives are peremptorily demanded.

The thing Mr. Curti's book does is to remind one in this exigent hour of how ragged and indecisive our cultural past has been, how casually developed "the American way," and how continuous are the crudities of yesterday with present modes of thought and action. In our confident American time-orientation toward the future we slough off history and look patronizingly at the rawness of the closing third of the nineteenth century, forgetting that men in power today were acquiring the pattern of their living and thinking in that

The fact that this book is a history of our "thought," including the meandering thought of the common people and playing down the stirring surface drama of wars and politics, helps one to perceive more clearly our national habits of substituting indirection for decision and muscular activity for coherence. Mr. Curti does not say this, but the cumulative impact of these pages makes it clear.

A book entitled "The Growth of American Thought" invites comparison with Parrington's "Main Currents" and F. O. Matthiessen's recent "American Renaissance." Each of these three books involves a different way of handling our intellectual past. Mr. Matthiessen concentrates vertically on narrow band in time and on five writers-Emerson, Hawthorne, Melville, Thoreau, and Whitman-seeking to discover their conception of the function and nature of literature in American life as revealed at the level of formal literary output. Parrington worked with depth but more broadly in both time and coverage of political and other issues. Mr. Curti starts less selectively, at the folk level where thought is social attitudes, and moves up into the areas where American thought becomes "intellectual" and crystallized as "literature." His is a social history of three centuries of American thought which "does not purport to provide an exact analysis of the 'interiors' of the ideas and systems." Its emphasis is horizontal over time, rather than vertical. He weaves a prodigious wealth of apt detail into these compact and always fascinating pages.

A book of this sort suffers somewhat from the occupational disease of the new social historians: at the level of folk knowledge and folk attitudes everything becomes fascinating, and the temptation to over-inclusiveness overbears an analyst. The foreground becomes at times a fascinating jungle which is rendered orderly only by the bunching of the text in a series of swift stereopticon views identified by their headings. Together with more formidable things, Mr. Curti accordingly covers the Common Man in Sickness, the Indian in American Thought, the extra-sensory perception of J. B. Rhine, and the attitudes of Father Divine's followers. A summary of the new religion of the coterie around President Hutchins of the University of Chicago jostles the table of contents of a year of the American Magazine and the struggle of books on sex for acceptance among those sold by Sears, Roebuck. One hankers for sustained appraisals and the frank taking of sides that prompted a Parrington to blaze away with judgments such as "When a Yankee was driven by brutal fact to admit that he was his brother's keeper, he usually took care to get a few honest pennies out of his brother's board and lodging."

I, for one, would have preferred more selective concentration around main tendencies and broad hypotheses. A case may be made, for instance, for the point that, particularly since the Civil War, our institutional world has been growing more complex for the American citizen at a faster rate than all our agencies of "thought," operating as they do within the constraints of power groups, have been able to render that world understandable and controllable by him. This might mean that we American citizens confront our world today with a net increment of illiteracy as regards our institutional affairs. It is important to try to view the uneven growth of American thought against such possible hypotheses. We need to point boldly to the delayed adolescence of our thinking about democracy, and, on the other hand, to the superb though socially thwarted growth of research in the physical sciences, of which the TNEC monograph on "Economic Power and Political Pressures" says: "To a great extent industry's political formidability can be traced to its dominant position in scientific research." Mr. Curti's book is admirable and timely—so good that it is perhaps captious to add that it provides only indirectly an answer to the anxious question: Where stands American thought as a weapon for the people of democracy?

Tennessee Valley Responsibility

TVA: DEMOCRACY ON THE MARCH. By David E. Lilienthal. Harper and Brothers, $2.50.

JEFFERSON and the Federalist writers were long without literary successors, but crowded bookshelves attest the ability of Mr. Roosevelt and his government—Wallace and Welles, Ickes and Biddle, New Deal and war-agency administrators—to explain in print. Far and away the best book by an administrator has now been written by the man with a job that is unique and may prove first in long-range importance; and interior evidence confirms the publishing rumor that David E. Lilienthal literally wrote "TVA: Democracy on the March." That Mr. Lilienthal can write is no surprise to those who know the simple, direct, conversational style in which, for ten years, he has explained TVA to the people of the valley.

Others have described the magnitude of TVA achievement, although none more effectively than Mr. Lilienthal when he says that "thirty-five Boulder or ten Grand Coulee dams could have been built with the total materials required for completion of this valley's dams," or that the concrete poured by TVA would have built more than seven dams the size of the great Dnieprostroy. For the real significance of TVA is in collective size and strength. Not the biggest in themselves, the dams, high and low, big and little, work together; and effective working together, of dams and people, is the good news of this book.

For beautiful coordination on paper has been tested by emergency. The story of TVA reaches a climax with the war, and this is the first book to tell of the transformation of the quiet valley towns into busy centers of war industry. It is the first to tell how, when the floods of 1942 foamed down to threaten war industries that have come to rival in importance those of Pittsburgh, "orders went out from the TVA office of central control to every tributary dam. The message came flashing to the operator in the control room at Hiwassee Dam, deep in the mountains of North Carolina: 'Hold back all the water of the Hiwassee River. Keep it out of the Tennessee.' The operator pressed a button. Steel gates closed. The water of the tributary was held. To Cherokee Dam on the Holston went the message: 'Keep back the flow of the Holston.' To Chickamauga Dam just above the danger spot at Chattanooga: 'Release water to make room for the waters from above'. . . . The Tennessee was kept in hand. There was no destruction, no panic, no interruption of work.

Most of the water, instead of wrecking the valley, actually produced a benefit in power."

Such sure, integrated action would not be news if TVA floodgates and turbines were operated as the Pontine marshes were drained, for fascism can command. Also power can corrupt, and Mr. Lilienthal notes that even TVA, "if it were politically managed, could become a curse to this valley." The Authority moves in no authoritarian spirit, but in terms of responsibility and accountability, explaining each step and asking, not grudging consent, but popular understanding and support. The dams are multi-purpose, built for flood control and navigation, for better land use and for power. But TVA operates to further the common purpose of the people of the valley. In return the people are working with TVA management, and in a region of feudal enmittes well described as the Balkans of this continent, they are working together.

As head of TVA Mr. Lilienthal well knows the effort necessary to smooth out differences between the Authority's own experts, between federal, state, and local agencies, and between labor and business interests. But as a Jeffersonian thinker he rightly sees as most important the functioning of community groups which bring together a half-dozen or a few score farmers to demonstrate better methods of farming and living. Jefferson's unit of government was not state or nation, district or county, but the ward—a radius no wider than a schoolboy's legs could trudge. Today our nearest approach to the Jeffersonian plan is in the grass-roots "area demonstrations" in the valley.

Mr. Lilienthal notes that TVA's self-effacement in fostering local action has lost the Authority some credit to which it was entitled; and it may be true that had this book boasted of TVA's war-time achievements—aluminum for so many planes, so much smokeless powder and dehydrated foods—it might mean more to those who ask only to win the war on a physical level. But Mr. Lilienthal has chosen to write a more important book, about hard human problems. He stresses method, means as well as end; he says truly that "the physical job will be done. If not democratically, it will be done in an anti-democratic way. It will be done perhaps by a small group of huge private corporations, controlling the country's resources; or by a tight clique of politicians; or by some other group or alliance of groups that is ready to take this responsibility."

And now that even the Saturday Evening Post approves TVA's war-time efficiency, wouldn't it seem time to end the fight against it? Instead, the battle goes on. Immediately before publication of this book Mr. Lilienthal as chairman of the TVA directors signed a warning that under the Mc-Kellar amendments pending, and since passed by the Senate, "TVA, as it has been constituted, would cease to exist."

Congress may so act. Such is the McKellar hold on jobs in Tennessee that a carpenter going to work on a county school had to carry, along with his union card, a thumb-marked letter to prove his support of the Senator. It was too much to expect that McKellar would tolerate TVA's war-time employment of some 40,000 workers hired by examination, not patronage. The House may be wiser; Mr. Lilienthal notes that "it is now 'good politics' for political leaders themselves, in the Tennessee Valley, to urge that politics be kept out of TVA." But House leaders include

Martin Dies, who sat up nights listening to seditious Crusaders in his efforts to get something on TVA, and John Rankin, who complains that Pickwick Dam wasn't named in his honor.

Congress in its present mood could, conceivably, override a veto to wreck TVA. But Mr. Lilienthal's book produces such calm confidence in human progress as to suggest that even so the work of the Authority would go on. If the people are so betrayed by their representatives, then surely they will rise and deal with those representatives as they deserve; else democracy in this country is already defeated and dead.

If STANDING among historians went by seniority, as in the committees of our Senate, Sir John Marriott would rank very high, for he is a veritable Nestor among the nurslings of Clio (this is a bit of Oxonian dialect). But he is considerably older than his years. He is as old as Polonius. He is so consistent in conventionality that he might deserve the ancient phrase: "Funny without being vulgar."

Unfortunately, history is not fun. It deals with facts. And Sir John handles his facts with lofty indifference to sequence or accuracy. My list of corrigenda would form a substantial addendum. He was bombed out of his library. We condole but cannot condone. Surely Macaulay's schoolboy must have left legitimate heirs in the city of York; and it would have been wise to consult them.

The jacket and the introduction to the American edition promise us a comparative study of political institutions in the two countries. This would have been of capital interest. In actual fact, this is practically limited to half a page which tells us that the old French Parlements did not correspond to the English Parliament. This contribution to knowledge is not cheap at $2.75.

The following, however, might be well worth the full price: "M. Blum probably interpreted aright the sentiment of most Frenchmen in basing his foreign policy upon firm alliance with England. But alliance with England meant non-intervention in Spain. . . . England, moreover, had no wish to become involved in the French commitments to the Little Entente, still less to the Franco-Soviet alliance. France, anxious to retain English friendship, might have been willing to cut herself free from her eastern commitments, but only in exchange for a firm military alliance with England. Hence a vicious circle in French diplomacy." The circle in British diplomacy was not very virtuous either.

England had won her "masterly game": France had no choice but to follow English leadership. The quality of that leadership comes out pretty clearly in Sir John's summary. I can hardly imagine the French placing themselves under such "trusteeship" again.

Cartoons Old and New

CARTOON CAVALCADE. Edited by Thomas Craven. Simon and Schuster, $3.95.

If THE comic may be defined in part as the recognition of the grotesque clash between personal desire and social restraint, then the change in the American humorous cartoon during the past half-century may be said to be in the degree of awareness of our inhibitions. That increasing awareness, so richly illustrated in Mr. Craven's anthology, is graphically reflected in the change from impersonal to personal comic symbols. The exuberance of the old cartoon has yielded to the nervousness belonging to that uneasy stage when sophistication has moved in on the mind but has not yet succeeded in establishing a modus vivendi with the finicky emotions.

Think of the early comic strips: Opper's Happy Hooligan, Alphonse and Gaston, Getting Square with Maud; or the Katzenjammers, Foxy Grandpa, Nervy Nat, Mutt and Jeff. The characters are comic types—brats, hobos, rustics, or immigrants—whose freedom from conventions was both ridiculed and envied, and about whom just enough was known to assure a feeling of good-humored superiority. These types were human only in their actions, which were exaggerated by every possible means—gesture, facial expression, explosive movement, and economy of line. Most significant of all, they exhibited the violent operation of a comic justice, which meted out rewards and punishments according to laws that were a travesty of social laws, as well as an ironic comment on their futility.

The old cartoons delineate the last great period of tremendous physical activity. The required comic release, therefore, had to be as active, direct, and generic as the external forces which drowned out individual characterization by keeping personal emotion submerged. Emotion was expelled by physical activity. It is no mere accident that the comic symbol which, more than any other, expressed the superabundant energy and impersonal vigor of the times was the swift kick.

In the early twenties the comic balloon burst. The practical joke became a symptom of weak-minded boorishness. The modern version of the old kick-in-the-pants symbol would be the timid, dreary nonentity—only idiots and superannuated fools are given the stature of an adult in modern cartoons—who wants to kick but can't, because it's undignified and because he is not convinced of the sufficiency of his reasons or of the sureness of his aim. He has qualms. "You wait here," says the timid man in Thurber's cartoon to the woman seated expectantly in the hotel lobby, "and I'll bring the etchings down."

The founding of the New Yorker in 1925 may be taken as the formal debut of the new cartoon. It was designed for the needs of a special audience, members of the literate middle class. Theirs is the historically classic position of insecurity, for their personal insecurity derives from their financial security. The financially insecure are far more likely to expend their energies in accommodating themselves to their environment; the financially secure spend their energies on themselves, making the chasm between the ego and the environment—as between boredom and amusement—ever more and more consciously wide. They can afford to laugh at themselves, and they must. Nothing is more ridiculous than ignorance of one's inhibitions. Consequently, from the depths of their sensitive insecurity, like a diable au corps, rises the nervous laugh, exposing the subterfuges of selfdeception and self-depreciation. Having laughed itself away, the flattered ego relaxes, released from all immediate necessity for action.

The new cartoon, unlike the old, depends largely on psychological situation and relies much more heavily on verbal humor. Only the best of them—those by Arno, Thurber, Price, and Wortman in particular—are more than illustrations of wisecracks. The old physical humor, verbal as well as graphic, has been socially ostracized; it is as dead as a doornail. Even the radio, where most dead humor is publicly buried, has found it necessary to personalize the old jokes by laughing at them because they are not funny. As for the comic strip, with the usual anachronistic exceptions it has been animated away. The current adventure and narrative strips are not comic. Popular humor in general, in the sense that the old comic strips had a universal appeal and the New Yorker cartoons have not, no longer exists.

Look at the pictures in this book and let Mr. Craven's text go. It's slick and sloppy. For the purposes of this book, at any rate, he is against "highbrow" culture, and against modern artists, who, he says, are futile and must always "adjust" themselves. He is in favor of cartoonists. "The only adjustment they had to make was to pay more taxes as their incomes mounted to the higher brackets." When they—the lucky cartoonists—hear the word artist, "they make as if to burp, seeing how a noble and joyous profession has been degraded by the highbrows." Make as if there were no Craven commentary.

FILMS

HERE is no reason, after all, why a movie musical should not be as good as any other sort of movie. "Cover Girl" is the first since "Top Hat" which even suggests the possibilities. There is nothing in it that approaches the dance in the jigsawed pavilion in the rain in the old Astaire-Rogers film. Much of "Cover Girl," for that matter, is not as fresh as it may seem; but its second-handedness and its occasional failures cannot obliterate the pleasure of seeing the work of a production company which obviously knows, cares about, and enjoys what it is doing.

The story, of itself, is conventional enough: a Brooklyn nightclub dancer (Rita Hayworth) leaves her boss (Gene Kelly), who loves her, for Broadway and for smoother, richer men (Otto Kruger, Lee Bowman), and ultimately thinks better of it; in period flashbacks her grandmother (Miss Hayworth again) describes a similar trajectory. But scene by scene-with some skids-this story is written with intelligence as well as wit and is acted sincerely and with a deft evocation of background, trade, character, and various true-to-life implisible in a Hollywood script. As a result, most of the Kelly-Hayworth-Bowman triangulations carry an interest and an emotional weight which are rare enough in straight dramatic films, to say nothing of musicals. In general, the songs and dances, besides being quite good as numbers, intensify the characterizations: Kelly, in fact, does his best acting in the course of singing two versions of "Put Me to the Test"; his nightclub and the observant charm of the best of the show are put exactly in their idealized-realistic key by the eight-girl chorus which-with a finely exhilarating bang -starts the picture. Most of the costumes are the most shrewdly pretty I have seen for a long time; many of the sets and colors are as good as those in "Heaven Can Wait." The color still goes manic occasionally-one moment the flesh of the chorus-girls is almost as happy-looking as if Renoir had been technical adviser, the next it looks as if the girls had just skipped out of a blood-bath. But there are some appreciative shades of brick, pavement, and blind glass in the night streets which for the first time, so far as I know, begin to colonize the proper potential universe of color in films. In a show so surprisingly full of cations which are not verbally permisachievement the failures set one's teeth all the more on edge. The period flashbacks slacken the picture and, within themselves, clash two periods forty years apart. The one big production number is just about like any average thing of its kind. Some of the Brooklyn sets are too cute and air-conditioned to support the relatively genuine characterizations or to help achieve the moods which are tried for. Some of the tunes and incidental music are pseudonacreous, routine Jerome Kern; some of the lyrics are Roget's-Thesauric, routine Ira Gershwin. Several of the dances. after establishing uncommonly good emotion, plan, and focus, lose everything in a mere dashing around. Even Kelly's most ambitious dance-a doubleexposed duet with his conscience, down a late-night street-in spite of some hair-raising moments, wavers between convincing and pumped-up despair. It is further vitiated by lush orchestration, after a very exciting start on bare-boned piano to which, I suggest, only the driest sort of drumming should have been

There are plenty of other letdowns. Yet "Cover Girl" would be worth seeing if only for Rita Hayworth at her prettiest (at certain other moments she looks as if she were daring you to stick your head in her mouth) or, still more important, Gene Kelly. Kelly is limited and is capable of failure, as he occasionally proves here. But I can think of no one in Hollywood, just now, who is more satisfying or more hopeful to watch for singing, dancing, or straight acting. JAMES AGEE

DRAMA

LIZABETH BOWEN'S use of plot in "The House in Paris"—I am speaking of the book-resembles that of E. M. Forster. She employs melodramatic, often arbitrary, events-which are inorganic to the main intention of the book and therefore basically irrelevant. The method has a double advantage: the superficial interest is heightened, yet the unlikelihood of any given event is incapable of destroying the central authenticity of the story. The plot, so to speak, is only the shining track along which the burden of the piece moves forward.

It is easy to see how adapters in search of play might, at first thought, see in the plot of "The House in Paris" dramatic and even sensational material suited to the uses of the stage. But the perceptive adapter would also see; on second or third thought, that since the plot is functional rather than organic, a three-act précis of that plot would have very little to do with the essential content of Miss Bowen's book-which is made up of atmosphere, background, characterization, and clashes of will on a level just below the surface of full consciousness or crude expression.

Messrs. Green and Feilbert, who made the adaptation which just ended a brief run on Broadway, didn't get as far as the second thought. They devised a three-act synopsis of the plot which, as a likeness of the book, reminded me of those silhouettes cut while you wait out of very black paper.

Bad casting in two crucial parts accounted for further distortion and reduction. The child Leopold-"He had a nervous manner. . . . She saw a darkeyed, very slight little boy who looked either French or Jewish"-was played by a blond cherub. Michael Ingram, cast in the part of Max Ebhart, the child's father, is dark and slim, but the intense smoldering quality of the Max of the book was missing. "Intellect, feeling, force were written all over him; he did in fact cut ice." His impersonator did not cut ice, and gave the impression not of frustrated strength but of disappointed weakness.

Ludmilla Pitoeff made her first American appearance as the ambitious Mme Fischer. Miss Pitoeff is a highly trained actress, she looked the part, and it seems to me that she did as well with it as the play allowed. But whereas in the book Mme Fischer's passion for domination operates in a subtle, complicated fashion, in the play the character was oversimplified and her machinations vulgarized.

Speaking of the physical appearance of actors in relation to the parts they play, that of Oscar Karlweis as Jacobowsky is so beautifully right that I find myself wondering where the accidental element of appearance ends and the deliberate art of acting, and even of make-up, begins. One has the feeling that Mr. Karlweis has never played any other part, that his adventure with the colonel is merely the most recent of a long series of tragi-comic adventures as the eternal refugee. He has no more edges than a rolling stone. He looks and acts as if he had been "trained down" by a lifetime of such adventures and as if it was this experience that had produced the unaggressive voice and manner, the patient sufferance of fools, the wry wit, and the economy and suppleness of movement that make his performance so fine. Yet in the quite different part of the prince in "Rosalinda" he was just as convincing.

Broadway producers had better have a conference, I think, on the kind of lingo to be spoken in plays peopled by inhabitants of Europe. In "Thank You, Svoboda" everyone presumably spoke Czech; yet Svoboda went on in a lingo devoid of articles that sounded like the broken English of an immigrant. The rest of the cast spoke ordinary English. "Jacobowsky and the Colonel" is set in France. The two principals are Poles. Jacobowsky speaks perfectly good English, which is the equivalent of perfectly good French. The Colonel, though he isn't as bright as Jacobowsky and has led a more sheltered life, might also be presumed to speak perfectly good French and, therefore, in this play, perfectly good English. In any case he would hardly speak the way he does. His language might correspond to the broken French of an uncultivated Pole, but hardly to that of a member of an aristocracy which, unless I am mistaken, learns French as a matter of course. Annabella, who is supposed to be a Frenchwoman in a play set in France, also speaks with a thick accent; and surely it isn't because she can't learn to speak the lines of a play in passable English. I suspect that the accent was encouraged. I suspect it because it would be of a piece with the decision to cast her in the part in the first place. Only the fact that she is a "name" can explain that, for she has no other qualifications. Her pretty innocuous face can perhaps be manipulated in the minute-by-minute technique of the movies. But a catchy name and a pretty face are not sufficient equipment for a stage actress.

MUSIC

THE late Frederick Stock was a conductor with the ability to get the Chicago Symphony to play as beautifully as you can hear it play in the recent Victor recordings of its performances. As a musician he achieved good results with comparatively modern works; but his recorded performances of older music-Mozart's G minor Symphony, Schubert's C majorshowed him to be without the feeling for plastic and rhythmic continuity, proportion, and coherence, and for subtle rhythmic elasticity, that this music requires, and that would have prevented the awkward discontinuities in pace, the rigidities alternating with tasteless rubatos. In the new Victor set (958; $2.50) of the performance of his orchestral version of Bach's great Prelude and Fugue in E flat for organ, then, you can hear the beautiful sound of the Chicago Symphony, recorded with superb richness and spaciousness, though with some lack of clarity because of the reverberant hall; you can hear the Prelude suddenly begin to gallop at measure 71 when the beats are broken up into rapid figuration, and slow down awkwardly when this figuration ends; you can hear the awkward changes of pace for the second and third sections of the triple fugue; and

The set also presents an example of Stock's work as an editor and transcriber of music. The first example that I encountered, many years ago, was his revision of Schumann's Third Symphony. Composers miscalculate in orchestrating; and even the most scrupulous conductor must correct such miscalculations. A great deal has been said about Schumann's inept use of the orchestra—his dulling of what should have been brilliant sonorities, his obscuring of important themes, by poor combinations and faulty balances of instruments. And Stock quoted Theodore Thomas's comment after a performance of the Third Symphony-"Such fine, noble themes, good workmanship, and yet such abominably poor orchestration" -as the impetus for his revision of the work. But actually Stock changed not only the orchestration but the themes and workmanship, adding new counterpoint which, he said, "[grew] out of the material which Schumann originated," inserting "a measure here and there in order to give greater clarity to Schumann's thought," writing a new coda, bringing the chief theme of the first movement in for the conclusion of the last movement, altering rhythms, displacing accents, and in sum doing the sort of thing Rimsky-Korsakov did with Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov." And the result proved Schumann, like Mussorgsky, to have been the better composer of his own music.

Bach certainly requires no help from Stock with the themes and workmanship of his Prelude and Fugue; but he gets it nevertheless in Stock's transcription of the work for orchestra. In the very first measure of the Prelude there is the first of the many alterations that Stock makes in Bach's rhythms; later Stock tacks on little introductions to the theme that is first stated in measure 32, adds lines of counterpoint, fills out thin contrapuntal textures with chords-all this to make Bach's work conform to his own taste. And you can get an idea of what that taste is from one detail of Stock's scoring: the theme stated in measure 32 of the Prelude is punctuated in the original by a single short pedalnote; and the orchestral equivalent would be a single bowed or plucked note of the string basses; but what Stock puts there is a broken chord of the harp-from which you also can get an idea of what the rest of the scoring

Recently a Chicago reader gave me a description of the orchestration of Schubert's great C major Quintet that Stock completed just before his death. "Not only did he pass the main themes of the movements around among different sections of the orchestra, now violins, now cellos, now woodwinds, now even brasses, until they were enfeebled, dissipated, and deprived of all distinguishing voice . . . but when the finale was eventually reached, it exploded into bursts of percussion, tympani, brasses, bells, and general racket similar to the endings Stock gave to his Bach transcriptions . . ."

The original scores of Schumann's symphony, Bach's fugue, and Schubert's quintet are still available to performers and public; but just as Rimsky-Korsakov contrived to make his revision of Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" the only version that we are able to hear to this very day, so the only published score of Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" is one issued in 1929 that incorporates changes in the orchestration made by Stock. Like Rimsky, Stock prefaces his revision with explanatory statements that turn out to be as false as Rimsky's. He performed "Kubla Khan" in January 1920, he says; and meeting Griffes the following autumn at the Pittsfield Chamber Music Festival, he suggested that the orchestration could be improved. "This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together. The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version." But Edward T. Maisel, in his biography of Griffes, points out that Griffes was dead in the autumn of 1920, and the conference must have occurred in the autumn of 1919; that Griffes continued to revise the work until he delivered it to Monteux for rehearsals for the first performance in Boston on November 28, 1919, and must have incorporated in it any changes suggested by Stock that he had found acceptable; and that Griffes expressed to a colleague his satisfaction with the sound of the work in Boston: "He told me that during the rehearsals he had never had to change one note. It was produced exactly as he had written it." Mr. Maisel might have gone further. It was not until after the Boston performances, not until a letter written late in December 1919, that Griffes for the first time mentioned Stock's name in connection with "Kubla Khan": "At present Stock has the score and parts, and I believe he intends to produce it sometime this month." This, then, even by Stock's own testimony, was when he first saw the score. But by this time Griffes had collapsed; and there was no time after that when Stock could have told him what he had found that could be improved. In other words, there was no conference and agreement with Griffes on the changes which Stock published nine years later; and Stock's action was like that of Rimsky-Korsakov who made after Mussorgsky's death the changes that Mussorgsky had rejected when alive. # Forget Politics—Open the Doors of Palestine!

The long shadow of death has reached out to touch the last scenes of Jewish survival. The Germans have occupied Hungary and also, it seems, Rumania and Bulgaria. Close to 2,000,000 Jews had escaped to comparative safety in these countries. They could have reached permanent safety if they had been admitted on time into territories under United Nations' control.

Politics vs. Human Lives

But ruthless indifference, and even hostility on the part of some governments of the United Nations, stood in the way of mercy and humanity. Palestine, closest, most practical haven, which could be reached directly from the Balkans by railroad or bus, was shut in the faces of those Jews who escaped. Many who managed to reach the shores of the Promised Land were driven back to die upon the high seas; others were sent to living death on the Island of Mauritius.

This inhuman policy is sanctioned law in Palestine, due to the White Paper. Six hundred thousand Jews of that country, who have direct and blood relatives in occupied Europe, are powerless to do anything for their kin. If news of the real facts were to reach the British people, they would abhor the tactics of their Colonial Office.

Lest It Be Too Late!

The American Government, with the creation of the War Refugee Board, opened a bridgehead of a new front against massacre. It must hold this bridgehead, and enlarge it by swift action.

But this complex problem of rescuing the Jewish people of Europe cannot and should not be the exclusive task of one Government alone. Other governments must cooperate as some are already doing.

We hope that victorious Russia, which already has done so much in saving almost a million Jews.

evacuating them deep into her territory, will pursue her same policy of mercy and will also take it upon herself to give a like official warning to the Germans and her satellites.

We hope that representations are already being made—or will be made soon—to the Turkish Government to let all Jews who escape from the Balkans pass through its territory on the way to Palestine, or to any other territory under United Nations' control.

The Doors of Palestine Must Be Opened

The most urgent task, however, is to use the good offices of the American Government in order to impress the British Government to immediately declare the doors of Palestine open to as many escaping Jews as may reach her shores.

This has to be done in complete independence of the political issues involved. The demand of this Committee has nothing to do with post-war Palestine. It has nothing to do with Zionist demand of a Jewish Commonwealth. It is an outcry to help people in their deepest agony and direst danger of their lives. If such danger were to strike any people close to the United States, let us say in South America, we would certainly demand that these people be admitted, at least temporarily, into this country. But the only large-scale channel of escape for the Jews of Europe is through Turkey to Palestine. This channel should not be locked.

To ask admission for these Jews in order to save their lives is not politics. To keep the doors of Palestine locked is politics—vicious politics. The hour is very late, and the night very dark indeed, for the remnants of the Jewish people of Europe. Great Britain, which has given the world the Magna Charta, the blueprint of liberty, can no longer block the way of rescue for the people who on Jews, gave the world the Bible.

The Shape of Things

THE RED ARMY'S PASSAGE OF THE PRUT. which brought it on indisputably foreign soil for the first time, was accompanied by signs of improved Allied cooperation in regard to the Balkans. In the military sphere, the attacks by long-range American bombers on Budapest and Bucharest gave timely support to the Russian advance by striking at bottlenecks in the German supply lines. But it was a stroke of political warfare that gave the best evidence of new coordination among the Soviets, America, and Britain. As the Russian troops crossed the Rumanian frontier, Foreign Commissar Molotov received the foreign press and gave out the text of a broadcast statement declaring that the sole purpose of the invasion was to pursue the enemy. It added that Russia had no territorial ambitions and no intention of "altering the existing social structure of Rumania." This statement had previously been submitted to Washington and London and won the hearty approval of Mr. Hull and Mr. Churchill. It gives the lie direct to much anti-Soviet propaganda, and it should serve to strengthen the anti-fascist forces in the Balkans. which, as Bogdan Raditsa points out on another page, are seeking Russian leadership, but not domination, both now and in the post-war period. Whether Russia's declaration will immediately influence the policy of the Rumanian government is more doubtful. The Rumanians, like the Finns and the Hungarians, would like to get out of the war, but they cannot make peace with Russia without fighting Germany. With the Nazis well intrenched in their country and determined to hold on to it as long as possible, there is no way of untying this Gordian knot. It must be cut by the desperate measure of changing sides in the midst of the battle and treating the Russians as liberators instead of invaders.

ALTHOUGH REPORTS FROM THE INDIAN front are difficult to interpret, the immediate outlook appears gloomy. The Japanese have already succeeded in blocking the supply route to the important city of Imphal and are threatening to cut the Assam railway, the main communications link not only for General Stilwell's troops in North Burma but for American and Chinese forces in China itself. While the British appear confident that Imphal can be held, the complacent tone of General

Sir Claude Auchinleck's communiqué and statements remind us unpleasantly of similar communiqués issued at the time of the Burma disaster in 1942. The Allied armies are much stronger than they were two years ago and have much better air support, but the Japanese remain masters of jungle warfare. And it would be unwise to assume their inability to solve the supply problem. Luckily, the Japanese drive can hardly be regarded as of major strategic importance. It has become apparent in recent months that the United Nations are not depending on the reconquest of Burma to open a main supply line to China. That task is to be accomplished by sea power in a drive directly across the Pacific to the China coast. Such a drive, for which preparations are being made in the daily bombing of Truk and other Caroline objectives, would not only make the job of supplying China infinitely easier but also cut off the Japanese forces now operating in Burma and India.

THE SOVIET CHARGE THAT CHINESE TROOPS violated the border of Outer Mongolia in seeking to head off the normal seasonal migration of the nomadic Kazakhs has been denied in Chungking. But the Chinese version of the border clash between Chinese and Outer Mongolian troops differs only with respect to the location of the incident and the direction in which the Kazakhs were supposed to be traveling. The significance of the affair has little to do with the Kazakhs or, for that matter, with the Outer Mongolians. For the fact that such an incident could occur is a clear indication of growing friction between China and the Soviet Union over the vast border region that lies between them. The present difficulties started about the time of Stalingrad, when the Sinkiang governor, for reasons never adequately explained, suddenly switched his political orientation from Moscow to Chungking. Although the region was nominally under Chinese sovereignty, its economic alignment, for obvious geographic reasons, had long been with Russia, and it had been militarily and politically independent. About a year ago, following the governor's sudden shift, Chungking began to send troops into Sinkiang. The Russians countered not only by withdrawing their rather large delegation but by removing the sma'l factories and other installations they had set up in the country, leaving Sinkiang in a rather desperate economic plight. This action was resented in Chungking, and relations between China and Russia have been tense ever since. Fortunately, other forces are operating to bring about better feeling between the two countries. The recent Soviet-Japanese agreement denying Tokyo use of oil from Sakhalin for the duration of the war will undoubtedly hasten the day of China's liberation, and should help to strengthen the bonds of the United Nations in the Far East.

THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT BY ITS decision in the Texas primary case has outlawed for the third time in seventeen years devices used in that state to bar Negroes from the Democratic primaries, A 1927 decision forbade such exclusion by statute; a 1932 decision held it equally unconstitutional to bar Negroes by action of the State Executive Committee of the Democratic Party. In 1935, however, the court upheld exclusion by decision of the Democratic state convention. This decision has now been reversed, the court ruling through Justice Reed that "constitutional rights would be of little value if they could be thus indirectly denied." Of the 1935 court, only two members remain, Chief Justice Stone and Justice Roberts. The Chief Justice joined in the reversal. Justice Roberts was the lone dissenter. He objected that to reverse a decision only nine years old was to breed confusion in the law. It is ironical to recall that it was Justice Roberts's reversal on minimum-wage legislation in 1937-a reversal that took place in little more than nine months—which helped to defeat the President's court plan. Justice Roberts says this new reversal will create "fresh doubt . . . as to the stability of our institutions." Justice Roberts has himself to blame if some elements in the South read this as a reference to their favorite institution, "white supremacy."

THE RECENT RESOLUTION OF THE SOUTH Carolina House of Representatives reaffirming "our belief in and our allegiance to established white supremacy as now prevailing in the South" and demanding that "the damned agitators of the North leave the South alone" does not meet with the approval of all white South Carolinians. Twenty prominent professional and business people of the state, none of whom could be called radical, have issued a "Statement on the Race Problem in South Carolina," expressing a diametrically opposite point of view. The daily press, which gave such wide circulation to the House resolution, has generally ignored this statement. It lists seven specific ways in which Negroes are discriminated against, and makes a number of specific recommendations for improvement. For example: "Provision should be made for Negroes to serve on juries. Negroes should be allowed representation on boards which have to do with administering affairs that involve Negro citizens and their property; Negro policemen should be provided in Negro residential districts. We should enlarge our educational efforts for the Negro. . . ." On the question of Negro suffrage the statement is less explicit. It sees "no immediate solution." However, it goes on, "We do not believe that disfranchisement of all Negroes in South Carolina can endure indefinitely." The type of thought represented by the statement is not so rare in the South as is generally believed. One of the signers, in a private letter to a Negro newspaper editor on the House resolution, said: "You may be sure that there are a large number of white people in the state who suffer from acts of this nature fully as much as Negroes suffer. Indeed, their humiliation is greater, because it is white people who have thus held up the state to scorn."

THE DECISION OF THE FORMER RIGHT WING of the American Labor Party in New York to form a new party in the state seems to us unrealistic and unfortunate. The only raison d'etre of such a party is its opposition to the left which won control of the A. L. P. in the recent primaries. Other issues do not exist since both factions were committed to a win-the-war program, support of the New Deal, and the reelection of Roosevelt and Wallace. The platform of the new party will consist of one plank: the A. L. P. is now run by Communists; Hillman is a Communist tool; therefore we must fight the A. L. P. The chief effect of such action will be to injure the C. I. O. Political Action Committee of which Hillman is chairman. The right wing knows as well as the left that almost the only hope of stimulating vigorous labor opposition to the reactionary swing in the country lies in the successful development of this committee on a national scale. Certainly there is no other independent organization of similar character in the field. For the right wingers to risk weakening it in order to build a back-fire against their left opponents in New York seems to us an irresponsible political act. Divisions in the labor and progressive movements are numerous enough without creating parties to foster and magnify them.

DR. GINA LOMBROSO FERRERO, WHO JUST died in Switzerland, was a living refutation of some of her own most ardent beliefs. She wrote books and many articles to prove that women were essentially non-intellectual and found happiness in domestic life rather than outside activities. But she was herself an intellectual if ever one breathed, and her close and happy home life never interfered with a distinguished career in several other directions. She had doctor's degrees in medicine and philosophy; she studied economics; she wrote numerous sociological studies and children's books. She lectured and traveled, and in recent years she directed a small publishing house which put out the writings of Italian anti-Fascist exiles. Her home in Geneva was filled with political refugees from every Axis-controlled country. Everything conspired to turn this philosophical antifeminist into a practical feminist. She was a daughter of the famous Italian criminologist Cesare Lombroso, and wife of Guglielmo Ferrero, the historian, and she worked closely with both men, sharing their intellectual life as well as developing her own. She was a woman who was driven into broad fields of human activity not by ambition or conviction but by her own generous impulses. Her energy and curiosity and a warm interest in life survived even the difficulties of exile and a succession of personal sorrows.

Lessons of Wisconsin

NE does not have to be a Willkie partisan to admire the spirit of his fight for the Republican nomination or to feel profoundly depressed by the overwhelming defeat he has suffered. His foray into Wisconsin—the Bible Belt of isolationism—was a daring enterprise in which he neither gave nor asked for quarter. Single-handed he assailed his foes on both flanks: on the left the Administration, and particularly its foreign policy; on the right the masses of his fellow-Republicans who believe they can scull to victory with muffled oars.

Mr. Willkie's attacks on the President were often biting, but for the most part they remained on a high level. He refused to exploit issues like rationing or Selective Service in order to catch votes. Again and again he emphasized his belief that the Republicans would not win next November, or deserve to win, unless they developed a forthright and forward-looking program based on international cooperation. In regard to domestic policy he condemned the tendency of his party to hark back to the good old twenties and talked in terms of economic progressivism. In this field, however, his policies still lacked definition, and he tended to confine himself to soothing generalizations on such knotty problems as post-war employment, labor relations, and social security. But at least he always talked about real issues, treating his audiences as intelligent and earnest citizens who were seeking enlightenment and not cheap oratory or circus tricks.

It was magnificent, but apparently it was not politics. Mr. Willkie's meetings were large and often enthusiastic, but whatever converts he made, he convinced the professionals that he was not their man; and when the polling places opened, the machine went to work. That it had semething solid to work on cannot be denied. The old Wisconsin spirit of isolationism, which led its Congressional delegation to vote unanimously against every measure of aid to Britain before Pearl Harbor, every step toward preparedness, is obviously very far from dead. Dewey and MacArthur, who by the nature of their following may be fairly identified in this contest as nationalist, together received far more votes than the internationalists Willkie and Stassen.

Governor Dewey's cagy policy appears to be paying big dividends. He has won the majority of the Wisconsin delegates not only without committing himself to anything but even after publicly disavowing their use of his name. The nature of his support in the Midwest will not prevent his sponsors from using the internationalist appeal in the East. He himself remains on the record as a non-candidate, under no obligations to take a stand on dangerous issues. But the machine he built up in 1940, and has assiduously nursed since, is hard at work playing up his vote-getting prowess and spreading the news that the Governor's corness does not mean that he would prove unresponsive to a draft. In fact, his supporters are now talking of his choice at Chicago by acclamation.

The new situation, however, offers some opportunities for deals and maneuvers. Governor Bricker's friendly statement on Willkie's withdrawal suggests a hope of cashing in on resentment against Dewey and luring some Willkieites into his camp. Stassen's followers will also seek to pick up enough Willkie delegates to give their man at least a nuisance value. And General MacArthur's showing in Wisconsin was sufficiently impressive to encourage his champions to go ahead with plans to organize the extreme nationalist vote.

What are the lessons of Wisconsin for the Administration? I. F. Stone, in this week's Washington letter, reports a marked degree of pessimism among New Dealers and notes a tendency to accept Willkie's overthrow as proof of a reactionary mood in the country, to which the Administration itself must conform. Our own reading of the lessons suggests a different conclusion. It is that an unclear and undemocratic foreign policy undermines faith in the internationalism for which Mr. Roosevelt has hitherto stood and plays into the hands of the isolationists. As Mr. Willkie said at Omaha, the Administration "is promoting confusion, cynicism, and distrust among us" by not admitting the people to its confidence in regard to the political conduct of the war.

We hope, therefore, that the President will not act on the assumption that, with Mr. Willkie eliminated, the unattached progressive and internationalist vote is in the bag and proceed to concentrate on appeasing the reactionaries. In this game he can never compete with the Republicans. His hope of victory, rather, lies in a return to that vigor and clarity, in regard to both domestic and foreign policy, which marked his earlier years of office.

Civil Service Snoopers

IN ITS issues of July 17 and July 24, 1943, The Nation published two articles entitled Washington Gestapo, by an anonymous government official. Those articles told of the unfair methods used in investigations of government employees. When Representative Celler of New York called the articles to the attention of Harry B. Mitchell, president of the Civil Service Commission, Mitchell denied that such methods were used by his agency. "The whole tone of the Nation articles is false, and the basis is false," Mitchell assured Mr. Celler. Six months later the charges made in The Nation found support in an article by Henry F. Pringle, Snooping on The Potomac, in the Saturday Evening Post for January 15. Now PM has published a series of fully documented Civil Service Commission cases by our Washington editor, I. F. Stone. The facts disclosed in them make it impossible for Mitchell or anyone else to deny that the procedure used in determining the loyalty and fitness of federal employees is grossly unfair.

At the time we published the Washington Gestapo articles, the only evidence available was the little that could be elicited in confidence from frightened employees and angry executives. No independent and formal inquiries into charges brought against government employees had been made by responsible agencies. This is no longer the case. Mr. Stone has made public the contents of two reports turned in on February 1 last by a three-man investigating board at the Foreign Economic Administration. This board was set up after the Civil Service Commission had ordered the discharge of two government employees, a man and his wife, both persons of reputation in the academic world. These people had gone to Washington, after Pearl Harbor, at some personal sacrifice, on the request of a government agency and had been doing excellent work for eighteen months when their dismissal was demanded. Suspicion seems to have been aroused because the wife is the cousin of a writer for the New Masses, but the Civil Service Commission found no basis for charging them with subversion. They were, however, branded as grossly immoral on the word of a malicious neighbor actuated by anti-Negro and anti-Jewish prejudice. This was the conclusion of the FEA investigating board, and its findings forced the commission to reverse itself.

But in addition to its report on the case of Professor and Mrs. X, the FEA board drew up a separate report for submission to the Civil Service Commission. This report pointed out that under the present investigatory procedure, accused employees have none of the elementary safeguards traditional in Anglo-American law. They may not be represented by counsel or confront and crossexamine their accusers. They do not have the right to know just who their accusers are or to know exactly what the charge is. They may not see a transcript of the testimony against them. They are not given a bill of particulars. They are examined in star chamber on what the FEA investigating board called "a cat-and-mouse basis." They learn only by indirection what is held against them and never know whether a question is prompted by previous information or is merely a trap. The accusing witnesses are not sworn; they are not subject to perjury charges if they lie or to suit for slander if they circulate false and damaging gossip.

The FEA board recommended that accused employees be allowed to cross-examine witnesses against them, to have a bill of particulars before trial, to have counsel present during trial, and to argue their case in advance of final decision. Unfortunately Leo T. Crowley, head of the FEA, has refused to allow this report to be submitted to the Civil Service Commission for consideration, and he and some of his subordinates have done their best to suppress it. The commission itself, while admitting that a declaration of disloyalty or unfitness may be fully as damaging to an employee's reputation as a criminal conviction, falls back on an excuse common to the secret police of dictatorships. The commission says in effect that the protection of the government is the first consideration, that people would not give information against employees unless safeguarded by anonymity, and that the burden of proof is on the employee. The situation is made worse by the fact that so many of the commission's investigators seem to be political illiterates, the kind of people who often regard the New Deal as "communistic." Not a few of them exhibit anti-Negro and anti-Semitic prejudices. When people of this kind are given a free hand to collect the garbage of gossip and to examine employees in star chambers, no one need be surprised by the result. We think the time has come for a formal investigation by Congress of these Gestapo-like procedures.

Washington Blues

BY I. F. STONE

FEW New Dealers have thought for some time that Mr. Roosevelt ought not to run for a fourth term. Their number has been increased by the defeat of Mr. Willkie in Wisconsin. The earlier argument against the fourth term was that Mr. Roosevelt even if reelected, would probably have a Republican and certainly a more hostile Congress to contend with, and that he would be unable in those circumstances to solve the problems of demobilization.

It was argued that with Mr. Roosevelt in the White House, the ordinary voter would feel that the New Deal was in power, though virtually all key positions are already held by conservatives and the President is to a large extent their prisoner. Unemployment would be blamed on the New Deal, the reactionary trend intensified, and a liberal comeback long postponed. "The right is running the show," said one New Dealer back in uniform on a furlough from his post abroad. "Let them bear the responsibility."

This view assumes that there will be severe unemployment after the war, at least for some time—an assumption I share, since I see no evidence of any steps, private or public, that can insure anything like full employment. Others, who agree, are nevertheless all the more strongly for a fourth term, on the ground that Mr. Roosevelt's presence in the White House may provide some check in what may be a dangerously reactionary period. But those of the President's advisers who are thinking primarily in terms of international rather than domestic problems want Mr. Roosevelt reelected no matter what situation is likely to confront him at home. The more optimistic of these believe that Mr. Willkie's withdrawal increases Mr. Roosevelt's chances. Previously they had regarded Mr. Willkie as the one Republican who might take progressive votes away from the President on domestic issues while winning the support of conservatives who would accept Mr. Roosevelt rather than risk any relapse into isolationism.

What worries the President's political advisers now is not so much what happened in Wisconsin as its effect in New York. Had Mr. Willkie made a strong showing, he and Governor Dewey might have killed each other off in the convention. Mr. Willkie's withdrawal now seems to have assured the Dewey nomination, and with that New York appears to be more than doubtful territory. The nomination of New York's governor plus the ugly sectarian quarrel in New York's American Labor Party makes many people here fear that Governor Dewey can carry New York against Mr. Roosevelt. If he can, a fourth term is unlikely. Talk in Congressional Democratic circles of a Byrd-Farley ticket reflects this feeling, and the open desertions from the not too crowded fourthterm band-wagon are evidence of how strong doubt has become. It is unlikely that Mr. Roosevelt will risk the great prestige he might possess and the influence he might exert as an undefeated elder statesman if he thinks his chance of winning is slight.

But few people here have the temerity to count Mr. Roosevelt out already. Many things may happen. The course of events in Europe, the opening of a second front, and the measure of its military success, will all have their effect. The American people may be much less warweary when they are actually fighting on a major scale than they are when millions of men are being drafted for little visible purpose. Mr. Roosevelt is no quitter. He has shown his fighting heart and buoyant courage under circumstances that would break most men. At home he has provided the leadership in, and given his name to, one of the great periods of American history. He is, from every indication, determined to do what he can to bring a more stable international order into being. He must have personal commitments to and from Churchill, Stalin, and Chiang Kai-shek that would be endangered by his defeat. He must be far more strongly aware than most of us of the threat to a permanent peace settlement were the four-power coalition to break up. Part of his strength lies in that very wiliness for which we assorted idealists, liberals, and leftists are most apt to criticize him. The President may do things we shall find hard to justify in the next few months.

I admire and honor Mr. Willkie. It was a pleasure to hear and read the words of a man who said what he thought and proved that he was prepared to bear the consequences. But the consequences were serious. It was a pleasure that was also a luxury. Mr. Willkie demonstrated again that politics is no place for a man who chooses to speak plainly. It is only in times of extraordinary, imminent, and visible danger that he may hope to achieve leadership. I think the career of Mr. Churchill, a more conservative but no less outspoken personality, illustrates the same point; he was passed over for the mediocre and the equivocating until his country's great moment of peril, and in such a conjuncture Mr. Willkie may some day be called upon.

It is easy to oversimplify the results of the Wisconsin primaries. Wisconsin cannot be equated with the Midwest; many factors make it the worst possible place for n representative test of the general attitude toward foreign policy. The strong vote polled by former Governor Stassen of neighboring and equally Midwestern Minnesota, where both Stassen and Senator Ball are strongly pledged to international cooperation, indicates that Mr. Willkie's defeat was not simply an isolationist victory. But Mr. Willkie's failure, at this writing, to win even one pledged delegate indicates (1) on domestic issues, that even in Wisconsin, the home of progressive Republicanism, the liberal Republican and independent voters to whom Mr. Willkie thought he could appeal don't amount to very much; and (2) on foreign policy, that the active internationalist minority is far weaker than the active isolationist minority, while the inert mass in between doesn't feel deeply about the question-even so eloquent, attractive, and sincere a man as Mr. Willkie was unable sufficiently to move them. The result is not likely to lead Mr. Roosevelt to heed Mr. Willkie's advice and be more outspoken and clear in his foreign policy.

There Stands De Gaulle

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE diplomatic war between the President of the United States and the President of the French Committee of National Liberation has reached a new stage of crisis. Mr. Roosevelt has casually, even contemptuously, dismissed the claims of the committee to be accepted as the provisional government of France. General de Gaulle has asserted that claim in a series of vigorous speeches and administrative acts and has assured his fellow-countrymen that France "does not need to listen to what is said outside her frontiers regarding the manner in which she will establish liberty at home." The issue between the French and the American leaders is clearly joined, and not even the latest elucidation of American policy by Mr. Hull reached the underlying sources of conflict.

President Roosevelt's peculiarly virulent opposition to De Gaulle, which can only be compared to his bitter stubbornness on the Spanish issue, is one of those politicopsychological conditions that cannot be simply explained. But in anlayzing its twisted roots one factor must always be remembered—the influence and strategic position of Admiral Leahy. Champion and friend of Pétain, our last ambassador at Vichy is now the President's Chief of Staff. Leahy's job at Vichy was to try to induce the French puppet government, or certain elements in it, to favor the Allied cause. It was under Leahy that Murphy assumed the task of subverting Vichy officers and agents in North Africa. To the Admiral and his mission, indeed to American policy as a whole, the resistance of De Gaulle was more than a rebuke; it was a threat. Fighting France could not be an ally as long as American plans depended upon the connivance of Vichy. When De Gaulle slowly forced his way into the situation, he had to defend his precarious political beachheads in North Africa against the combined opposition of French fascists and British and American "liberators." (The British played a halfreluctant but useful role in this campaign.) De Gaulle won position after position, and he did it by demonstrating in every way open to him the solid backing of the whole resistance movement in France.

To this strategy American diplomacy has had no effective answer. Moreover, the United States could not openly oppose the will of the forces of resistance. In the hour of invasion they will be on our side; they stand for all we claim to be fighting for. The vigor with which they have rallied to De Gaulle; the rapid evolution of the Committee of Liberation from an uneasy union between two hostile factions to a full-fledged government representing all political tendencies; the rise and active participation in policy-making of the Consultative Assembly, peopled in large part with delegates from the various political groups inside France—all these factors have given De Gaulle a prestige and solid authority which is testified to by every correspondent in North Africa.

And De Gaulle himself has on the whole measured up to the demands of leadership. He has been firm in his dealings with his allies, flexible in his expanding relationship with the representatives of the people. He has steadfastly asserted what his followers want established beyond all doubt—the sovereign power of France. One has only to read De Gaulle's remarkable speech of March 18, a large part of which is reproduced in this issue, to get a sense of the assurance of the man and his grasp of the problems involved in France's rebirth as a nation. Many discussions of this speech have been published. Some have given the impression that De Gaulle was engaged in fighting his allies or demanding his rights in an angry or defiant mood. No such tone emerges from the text itself. De Gaulle recognizes and regrets the reluctance of the Allies to accept the Committee as the provisional government of France, but he proceeds calmly with his plans for carrying on the functions of government. He goes farther and suggests a closer relationship among the nations of Western Europe and offers to help lay the foundations for such a regional union. Nowhere does he argue or remonstrate. Perhaps his calm assurance is one of the qualities Mr. Roosevelt resents.

The President can no longer argue that De Gaulle stands alone, that he is a dictator, that Giraud is an equal factor, that military necessity dictates a different choice. Every argument has fallen away except one. The President still clings to the old formula of "self-determination." Like "neutrality" and "non-intervention" toward Republican Spain, our policy of "self-determination" for liberated France is a cover for a particularly nasty technique of enforcing our will. It is designed to play into the hands of every agent of reaction from the old Marshal to the unknown Darlan who may arise after the invasion to be "chosen" by Eisenhower as one of the authorities with whom the Allies will deal. How do we know, asks the President, what the people of France really want? Nobody from his office has been there for a long time and a lot has happened lately. The French people themselves, after they are freed and after the prisoners of war and deported workers come home, must decide on their government. Meanwhile the process of liberation may uncover new groups or new leaders who may deserve our support. General Eisenhower will have to decide with whom he can best deal; it is primarily a military matter rather than a political one. The assertion by Mr. Hull that the De Gaulle committee, while "of course not the government of France," will be encouraged to "exercise leadership to establish law and order under supervision of the Allied Commander-in-Chief" does not rule out the possibility that other elements may be similarly encouraged. Only recognition of the Committee of Liberation as the provisional government, which Hull explicitly refuses, would dissipate the uncertainty that breeds suspicion and demoralizing rumors.

Indeed, political speculations recently reached a point in Algiers which forced the State Department to deny openly that the United States intended to deal with the Vichy regime or with other collaborationist elements once the invasion begins. But even after this denial it was pointed out, and not only by interested Frenchmen, that the United States has other possible alternatives to De Gaulle hardly less detestable than Laval or Pétain.

There is, for example, the interesting case of Noguès. This able general fled from North Africa with American help and thus escaped the fate of Peyrouton, Boisson, and Bergeret, fellow-fascists who have been imprisoned by order of the Committee of Liberation. Noguès went to Portugal, and with him or before him went all the gold of the Bank of France in Morocco. He has gathered round him there a number of like-minded Frenchmen who were similarly able to duck out of North Africa or out of France. More than one observer on the spot has brought home disquieting stories of continued American relations with this astute and ambitious officer. And why should we not discuss plans and possibilities with Noguès? He is one of the men with whom we came to terms as soon as possible after our landing. He followed Darlan into the Allied camp and after Darlan's assassination helped select Giraud. He is one of our own collaborationists.

Might not Noguès, who has a considerable following in the upper officer ranks of the French army, be found useful when the Allied forces reach France? It is even whispered that he has been tentatively chosen as Premier in a new government which would include George Bonnet as Foreign Minister, Bergeret (presumably released from prison) as Minister of War, Lemaigre-Dubreuil as Finance Minister, and would find places for such other admirable non-Vichyites as De Monzie and Leroy-Ladurie. This government of appeasers, fascists, and financial corroborationists may be no more than the nightmare of an embittered Gaullist. It may, on the other hand, represent one of the possible plans that lie in the minds of some of the President's advisers. Certainly these persons are no more unsavory than those chosen when we moved into North Africa and Italy, and if we did not find the behavior of De Gaulle to our liking after we land in France, they might well be adopted as new Darlans and Girauds. The refusal to recognize the Committee of Liberation makes sense only if our policymakers are in fact holding the door open for such deals in case expediency should make them seem desirable.

Friends of the President, persons who know that he represents the best remaining hope of a decent international policy, must feel doubly distressed that he should persist in an attitude so fatal to the influence and democratic standing of America in Europe. But even in a campaign year no good end can be served by pretending that a line of action is good when it is clearly dangerous. The only sensible course for progressive supporters of the Administration to take is to urge the President to free himself from the obsessions that have controlled his policy toward De Gaulle, to get rid of reactionary advisers like Leahy, and to accept the logic of his best and most generous announced aims.

Mr. Stettinius is in London "exploring" the political problems which confront the Allied powers. Britain is said to feel strongly that recognition of De Gaulle should not be delayed any longer. Perhaps Mr. Eden can convince our representative that the trailing remnants of America's Vichy policy must be abandoned before the Allied armies attempt to land on French soil. Not all the subverted traitors in France could compensate us in arms or influence for the hatred of the French underground and the enmity of its acknowledged leaders.

Russia in the Balkans

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

THE Russian armies are hurtling across the River Prut, ready to strike at the heart of Rumania. It seems probable, therefore, that it is the Russians—aided by the various national armies of liberation—who will bring about the collapse of German military strength in the Balkans, and not England and America, allthough the Western Allies are giving substantial assistance to the Partisans in Yugoslavia. Moreover, the great people's movements emerging from the chaos of Balkan politics have derived inspiration and courage from Russia's example and will reinforce Russia's influence on the peace.

Resistance to fascism in the northern Balkan states has been less articulate than among the Greeks and South Slavs. When Rumania fell to the Nazis, the king and his military clique submitted to all Hitler's demands and abandoned the wise foreign policy which had been formulated by Nicholas Titulescu. (Eduard Benes and Titulescu were the only statesmen in the Little Entente who understood that friendship with Russia could be of enduring value to Southeastern Europe.) No vigorous popular movement has developed in Rumania, although an underground certainly exists there and large numbers of Rumanians have joined Marshal Tito's Partisans.

The amount of resistance in Hungary is something of a mystery. Count Karolyi broadcast from London an appeal to Hungarians to join Tito's armies, and lately many have done so. The deep abyss between the ruling class and the masses of the people in both Hungary and Rumania has unquestionably heightened the significance of Russia for the masses. For them the Soviet government is the embodiment of the people's will, and when the present rulers of Hungary and Rumania go down, as they inevitably must, Russia's influence on the new political structure to be built will be profound.

The Bulgarians, like other Balkan peoples, have been frustrated by a foreign king, a military caste, and an aggressive bureaucracy, but they have made their will known. Strongly pro-Russian, they have organized an active resistance movement and outlined a concrete program of political action. Although Bulgaria is in the Axis camp, it maintains diplomatic relations with Russia; the Soviet legation is still in Sofia. It is possible that the government allows this incongruous situation to continue as a concession to the Bulgarian people and in the interest of domestic peace.

The main stream of Balkan energy flows of course from Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav National Army of Liberation has become a powerful instrument for the coordination of Balkan resistance and the unification of Balkan aspirations. Its growth is proof of the revolutionary character of this war, for it expresses not only the people's resistance to German domination, but their repudiation of the policy pursued by the Yugoslav government between the two wars.

An understanding of the political and military forces at work in Yugoslavia and throughout the Balkans will be furthered by a brief review of some recent political happenings in this storm center of the European continent

Up to the end of 1940 Yugoslavia had not recognized the Soviet government, and only the constant pressure of democratic elements upon Prince Paul induced him finally to send an envoy to the Kremlin. Behind this intransigent anti-Soviet policy were the late King Alexander, Nicholas Pachich, leader of the Serbian Radical Party, and his successors, part of the Serbian Orthodox church, the Foreign Office, and the army officers, all of whom despised the Soviet system as much as they had respected the Czarist regime. For twenty-three years after the Revolution the old Czarist Ambassador, Baron Strandmann, remained in Belgrade as Russia's accredited representative. He was actually on the diplomatic list until 1940.

Strandmann was for years the most influential personality in Belgrade society and diplomatic circles. He lived in the old Russian legation, across the street from the royal palace, just as in former days when Russia considered itself the guardian of Serbian interests. He disposed of 30,000,000 dinars a year (approximately $600,000), provided partly by a special item in the Yugoslav budget and partly by the secret funds of the Foreign Office. This enormous sum of money was spent primarily for the dissemination of anti-Soviet propaganda in Yugoslavia and abroad.

Immediately after the Russian Revolution the Czarist General Wrangel established two military-cadet schools in Yugoslavia, where young White Russian exiles were instilled with rabidly anti-Soviet doctrines. The banners of General Wrangel's army waved ostentatiously in the center of Belgrade. These same White Russians have a strong grip on the puppet Belgrade government, and after the collapse of Yugoslavia an effective German fifth column, quite ready to cooperate with the Gestapo, was recruited from among them.

During the First World War, Frano Supilo, a Croatian politician, visited St. Petersburg, the capital of Czarist Russia. The Russian Foreign Office, he learned, had no dossier on the Croats and Slovenes and no interest in the formation of a "Yugoslavia." It was concerned only with the Serbs, Bulgarians, and Macedonians, who could form a bulwark against the Austro-Hungarian Empire. When Supilo told Sazanov, Russia's Foreign Minister, of the growing feeling for a great Yugoslavia, Sazanov was reluctant to accept the idea. He had already signed the London pact, which militated against the vital interests of Croats and Slovenes and temporarily paralyzed the efforts of the South Slavs to achieve a united nation.

In 1924 the popular Croatian democratic leader Stefan Radich visited Moscow, the capital of Soviet Russia. He found a vastly changed attitude at the Foreign Ministry from the one Supilo had described. When Radich returned, he told his people—and his words have become a slogan—"With Russia we are something; without Russia nothing." Soon afterward Radich was arrested, and later killed, by the men who were preparing King Alexander's dictatorship under the influence of White Russian émigrés and other reactionaries.

Official relations between the Yugoslav government in exile and Soviet Russia have always been strained. The former has consistently followed the old pre-war line and has built up Mihailovich to lead the struggle against Russia. In 1942 Molotov proposed a friendship pact to the Yugoslav government in exile, but Foreign Minister Ninchich turned the offer down, actuated either by his belief in Hitler's victory or by his fear of Bolshevism.

After the Moscow and Teheran conferences it was clear that the Big Three recognized Tito's army as the real fighting force in Yugoslavia. Churchill virtually abandoned the Yugoslav government in exile. Bewildered and apprehensive, Prime Minister Purich turned to Russia. He offered a pact of friendship. He even thought of transferring the government from Cairo to Moscow. But any hope of obtaining support for King Peter's Cabinet from that quarter was blasted. The Soviet government reminded Dr. Purich that the question of a Soviet-Yugoslav pact had been raised during the spring of 1942: "The Yugoslav government, then located in London, did not give the pact the same importance that it seems to attach to it now." Dr. Purich's proposal was flatly rejected.

The Yugoslav people have been and are unalterably opposed to the policy of their government. They regard an alliance with Russia as a logical necessity for the Slavs in the Balkans, not as a mere expedient. The interest of the Soviet government in a united Slav nation was made clear to them by Radich, His words have been confirmed by the subsequent activities of the All-Slav committees in Moscow.

Recently the Yugoslav Ambassador to Russia, Stanoye Simioh, severed his connections with the Purich government. Mr. Simich is an extremely capable young Serbian diplomat, an ardent anti-fascist, and a consistent supporter of the concept of Yugoslavia. He explained in a letter to Marshal Tito that his resignation was prompted by the refusal of the government in exile to organize "Yugoslav army units to fight on the Soviet-German front against the common enemy." A Yugoslav unit has now been equipped in Russia. It will fight under the flag of Marshal Tito and under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Mesich, who deserted from the army sent by the puppet Pavelich to aid the Germans on the eastern front.

The restoration of the Russian Orthodox church has done much to overcome distrust of Soviet Russia's attitude toward religion. The Partisans have deep respect for their bearded priests. There is, indeed, a saying in Yugoslavia today that "a beard is worth a brigade." Tito's Minister of the Interior is a Serbian Orthodox priest. Other church dignitaries have not only refused to condemn the Partisans but have joined their fighting forces.

Since the Yugoslav people found their leader in Marshal Tito, his army has become a rallying-point for all the democratic forces of the Balkans. On March 26 the Free Italian radio, Milano Libertà, announced that the general staff of the National Liberation Army of Yugoslavia, the British, American, and Russian military missions, and representatives of the Rumanian, Bulgarian, and Hungarian liberation armies had held an important conference at Tito's headquarters. The aim of the meeting was to coordinate all liberation movements and their armies in the Balkans under Marshal Tito. The Greek resistance, under the inspiration of the left wing of the E. A. M.—E. L. A. S. group, has recently formed a provisional governing committee modeled after Marshal Tito's committee.

The old Balkans, with their oppressive ruling classes, their semi-legitimate monarchies, their unscrupulous politicians and ambitious generals, and their diplomats who permitted their countries to be used as tools by the great powers, are dying. All these elements became puppets of the Germans when their countries were invaded. Now they have accepted German occupation without a murmur, because it is their only bulwark against advancing Soviet armies and Soviet influence. But that bulwark is doomed. And the people, led by new leaders with a new understanding of the popular spirit, will make their will felt.

Dr. Benes said some days ago that Stalin was "definitely opposed to the imposition of communism upon the Balkan countries." The Balkan problem does not demand such a solution. The Balkan masses have seen how fragile was the structure of a world made up of small ultranationalistic states. They realize that their security lies in union, plus the friendly support of Soviet Russia. The Balkan peoples have come to understand that the dam which Europe built against Russia was an essential cause of their own collapse, as well as of the collapse of all pre-war Europe; they know that Europe cannot live in peace if that dam is rebuilt.

American economic support will be greatly needed throughout the region, and in making political decisions the Balkans will lean heavily upon the Allies. Thus a full understanding among Great Britain, the United States, and Russia—before the Balkans have been liberated—is of the utmost importance, not only for the Balkan peoples but for the general settlement of Europe when peace has come. After Italy, the Balkans will be the test of what the United Nations consider their mission in this war.

G. I. in India—II

THE lot of American soldiers in India who are stationed in or near large cities is quite different from that of men stuck away in remote valleys and jungle outposts. When it was reported that a Senatorial party touring India had spent an evening in Duration Den, the luxuriously appointed American Red Cross club in New Delhi, listening to the griping of the soldiers there, the news provoked derisive comments in this monsoon-washed valley. Men who had spent a year or more waiting for a ten-day furlough in Delhi or Calcutta—"sweating it out" they call it here—wondered "what the devil the 'hotel' soldiers had to complain about."

The life of "hotel" soldiers, most of whom live in barracks or tents, in India is not an extended lark, but neither is it especially difficult. My first six weeks in India were spent at a desert camp some fifteen miles from a fairly large city, and despite occasional sand-storms, heat which often hovered around 110, and swarms of evilly persistent flies, life was bearable. The city did not come up to an American's notions of cleanliness, but it offered a modern motion-picture theater, several good restaurants, and a variety of rather interesting shops.

An Indian-operated bus line ran between the camp and the city, and most of us went in three or four times a week. Indians are fatalists, or at least drive as if they were. One afternoon a friend and I hitched a ride on a bus carrying Indian laborers. It was ancient in a way no American jalopy, however rickety, ever is. The cab, in which we rode, was held together by old pieces of rope and a few casually placed nails, and all the gauges on the dashboard read zero. But it went down the road at an astonishing speed, passing camel caravans and other buses. Twice in passing it careened off the road on to the sand and almost turned over before it careened back again. After the second time the driver, apparently feeling that he owed us an explanation, smiled pleasantly and said, "Steering wheel loose, no brakes." I found myself silently remonstrating, "It's all right for you. As a Hindu you believe you'll be reincarnated. But what about us?"

People in Blank, which is as far as the censor will permit one to go in naming the city, were generally friendly. We had some misgivings at first, because "Quit India" was scrawled across almost every wall we saw. But this did not appear to be directed at us. They did not throw flowers into the streets when we rode by, but they were hospitable.

American influence was conspicuous in the shopping district. Goodyear and Kodak signs were frequent, and stocks of American goods, though they were pathetically small, were displayed proudly. In a crooked, unpaved lane I came across a furniture shop full of Grand Rapids "modern." When we went into shops which had American goods, the proprietor would point to them and say, "Theekhai," which, roughly spelled, is Hindustani for O.K. One grocery store had American canned goods, but the prices were fabulous—$2.10 for a 19-cent can of Libby's fruit juice, 90 cents for a 10-cent can of Heinz soup, $5 for a crock of cheese.

We had been told that our money would go three times as far in India as it did in the states, but we soon realized that we had been grossly misinformed. At least for American soldiers, nothing in Blank was cheap. This was partly because war shortages had boosted the price of articles we wanted, and partly because Indians believe all Americans have more money than they know what to do with. Beggars and vendors all over India invariably approach us with, "You rajah, me poor man." When I tell a shopkeeper that a price is more than I can afford, he is likely to smile condescendingly, as if to say, "What a quaint sense of humor you Americans have."

Bookshops were almost as plentiful as curio shops, but they had a curious collection of English books. In the city's largest bookstore I found a second-hand copy of a Warwick Deeping novel, a brochure on animal husbandry, one on Basic English, the "Bhagavadgita," and Dale Carnegie's "How to Win Friends and Influence People." To Americans eager to learn all they could about the country this was disappointing. Several pamphlets by Indians introducing India to American troops were for sale, but they were largely devoted to the glories of India's past and were written almost exclusively in superlatives. Considerable literary traffic went on outside the shops. A newspaper hawker who came out to camp each day brought with him such selections as "The Escapades of Erotic Edna," "My Sins—Private Life of a College Girl," "True Confessions of an Indian Girl," and "The Hidden Side of Sexual Science."

The Anglo-Indian newspapers were our best source of information on contemporary Indian life. They had only four pages, but they contained a respectable amount of news and illuminating editorials. Once one ran a long editorial on Louis Fischer's articles in The Nation about the Cripps mission, and the next day reprinted from The Nation a piece by a Charles Williams on Harlem and the War. It gave me a strange feeling.

The favorite American hangouts in Blank were three "in-bounds" restaurants run by Chinese. There we could eat duck with ginger, chicken with pineapple, crab meat and melon soup, steak that was good though it did not remind us of home, and ice cream that did. Prices were lower than in other restaurants I have been in here, and one could dine very well for less than two dollars. The quantities of food we consumed surprised and amused the Chinese waiters. Another gathering place was the Manhattan Soda Fountain, where we could buy hamburgers on toasted English muffins and amazing banana splits, play "Star Dust" or "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes" on a dilapidated music box, and become thoroughly homesick.

I had long social conversations with the shopkeepers, who occasionally offered tea even when it was plain that I was not going to buy anything. Many of them spoke apologetically of India's backwardness. One of them said in a way that showed he had said it many times before, "We are a hundred years behind, a hundred years behind." We had been told not to discuss politics in India, and Indians rarely introduced the subject, but one curio dealer spent the better part of an hour talking about India's sectional differences. He was a Hindu and he said, "Moslems are all right but hard in the head." Nehru, he thought, was a great man, and Gandhi he called the "uncrowned king of India." It struck me that Gandhi might see some irony in this description.

THE SWISS REFERENDUM appears to be having a "boom" in this country just now. In the legislatures of New York and New Jersey as well as Massachusetts bills are pending looking toward its incorporation in the state constitutions.—April 5, 1894.

THE WOMAN-SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT received further impetus last week in the passage by the Iowa legislature of a bill giving women the right to vote at municipal or school elections. . . The movement has also made more headway in Massachusetts this year than ever before. . . . A bill which had passed the House by a large Republican majority was . . . defeated in the Senate through the Boston Journal and Henry Cabot Lodge, now the recognized machine manager of his party.—April 12, 1894.

ONE OF THE MOST extraordinary phenomena in the literary history of Germany is the hostility which is still manifested toward Heine, almost forty years after his death—an enmity based in about equal proportions on chauvinism, anti-Semitism, and the wrath naturally felt by Philistines toward men of genius. . . . The project of erecting a monument to Heine in his native city of Düsseldorf, a few years ago, met with so much opposition that it was dropped. Soon thereafter the committee took up Mainz as a suitable place, but nothing definite has been done as yet.—April 19, 1894.

THERE COULD HARDLY be a better illustration of the audacity, we were going to say depravity, of Senator Lodge's demagogy, than the phrase, "when not in contravention of any existing treaty," in his resolution in favor of putting discriminating duties on British products. . . . Lodge knows perfectly well that we are bound by the treaties of 1794 and of 1815 not to impose on British goods any duties which we do not impose on those of other nations. . . . The contributions of Massachusetts and Harvard College to federal politics during the past two years in the persons of Lodge and Quincy really seem like a freak of nature, and we respectfully call the attention of the Board of Overseers to the phenomenon.—April 26, 1894.

THE FIGHT BETWEEN Bragg and Naftel in Alabama, in a private room, in which Bragg was killed and Naftel dangerously wounded, arose out of Naftel's saying that Bragg at a meeting had not acted like a gentleman, by, in some manner, obstructing his view. It is unfortunate that Bragg should have thought it necessary to kill Naftel for this statement. But the criminal code of gentlemen at the South is one of appalling severity.—April 26, 1894.

A Pan of Bones

BY LUCILLE B. MILNER

N NEW YEAR'S EVE, 1939, Elmer Rogers, his wife, and his four-year-old son were brutally murdered in their home near Fort Towson, Oklahoma, Another son, eight years old, saved himself and his baby brother. The Rogerses were killed with a shotgun and mutilated with an ax; then the house was set afire, burning all three of them.

It was a hideous crime—the most revolting in the state's history—and the entire community was aroused. Soon several white prisoners from a nearby prison camp were arrested. This brought much unfavorable publicity about the Oklahoma state-prison system, and Warden Jesse Dunn* of the state penitentiary, put on the spot, went to Fort Towson to make an investigation. The Governor asked Vernon Cheatwood to report on the matter to him. Cheatwood had been the Governor's special in extension of the seven years and had had a good deal of experience in obtaining confessions. Early in January the convicts who had been arrested for the crime were released, and a young Negro, W. D. Lyons, was arrested in Hugo, charged with the murders.

On the night of January 11 Lyons was visiting his mother-in-law and left her home to get some illegal whiskey hidden in the woods. On his way back he met Ennis Aikens. They saw several cars of police officers drive up to the house, and Lyons asked Aikens to go ask his wife "what the trouble was down there." When Lyons started for the house he was met by two men, Reasor Cain and Oscar Bearden, the former a special officer of the Frisco railroad. With drawn revolvers they seized him, bound his arms behind his back with his belt, and started to take him to the jail.

About three blocks from the jail Cain broke off a piece of one-inch board lying on the street and Bearden struck Lyons on the head with it. He also kicked Lyons and told him they were going to burn and kill him by degrees unless he confessed to the Rogers murders. When they reached the jail, Leonard Holmes, the jailor, greeted Lyons by striking him in the mouth with the jail keys.

Bearden told Holmes to "get some more officers and we'll drag him through 'colored town' and let the rest of the niggers learn a lesson." But Holmes could find no more officers at that time, and so they took Lyons to the top floor of the jail. There Deputy Sheriff Floyd Brown knocked him to the floor and kicked him in the stomach and ribs. Then they threw him into a cell. But not for

 On August 10, 1941, Warden Dunn was killed in a prison break by four long-term prisoners who held him as hostage and murdered him when his rescue was about to be effected. long. After about five minutes, Lyons was taken downstairs to a small room adjoining the sheriff's office where were gathered the sheriff, two deputy sheriffs, the state ballistics expert, two highway patrolmen, and the Governor's special investigator, Vernon Cheatwood.

One of the officers made Lyons stand against a wall with his arms stretched above his head while another kicked the skin off his shins. Cheatwood kicked him in the stomach and blacked his eye. The sheriff called a halt in order to question Lyons for about thirty minutes, and then the beatings were resumed until the sheriff again stopped them and had Lyons taken to his cell.

One evening a week or so later, about dusk, Deputy Sheriff Brown and two highway patrolmen took Lyons from his cell to the office of the county prosecutor, a room about fourteen by sixteen. During the course of Lyons's examination from ten to twelve men were in this room. Lyons was handcuffed and placed in a chair; Vernon Cheatwood sat directly in front of him, less than a foot away, with a blackjack in his hand, his "nigger beater" he called it. During the questioning Cheatwood struck Lyons on the knees, hands, arms, and legs with the blackjack. "Every time he hit me with it," Lyons says, "something in it would rattle like buckshot." Every now and then Reasor Cain would strike Lyons with his fist, and "when he got tired the highway patrolmen would take it a while . . . and they beat me that way all night, yelling questions. . . . They would say, 'You killed those people, didn't you, you god-damned son-of-a-bitch; you're going to tell before we turn you loose!'" Now and then a highway patrolman would take Lyons from the chair and bend him across a table while Cheatwood would beat him on the back of the head with the blackjack. The father of Mrs. Rogers, E. O. Colclasure,* and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Vernon Co'clasure, testified that Cheatwood boasted to them of what he had done.

At about 2:30 in the morning an officer brought in a pan of bones and placed it on Lyons's lap. "They said they was the bones of Mrs. Rogers, Mr. Rogers, and the baby," Lyons testified. (No attempt was made by the prosecution to explain how these bones were produced twenty-two days after the Rogerses were murdered.) "I never seen bones of a dead person before; I never seen dead people before, and I was afraid of those bones on my lap. Mr. Cheatwood would lay the bones in my hands—teeth bones and body bones—and make me hold them and look at them . . . he wouldn't let me turn my head away . . . and beat me on the legs and knees." Finally Lyons gave in and answered their questions. Even then he denied killing the Rogerses but later said yes: "I was forced to . . . I was beat with a blackjack and tortured all night, and I was afraid I would get some more torture."

This over, Lyons was lifted from the chair and led downstairs and over to the sheriff's office to wait while the officers ate their breakfast before taking him to the scene of the crime. There Lyons was again threatened with death. A fire was built and he was told that he would be burned unless he confessed that he had hidden the ax which was shown to him. For four hours this went on. At 8:30 Lyons, with one eye closed, his lip broken, and his nose bleeding, was taken back to jail. In the middle of the afternoon Cheatwood brought Lyons a paper to sign. When he asked what the paper was, he was told "never mind," and in utter desperation he signed. Later he was driven to the jail at Antlers.

At sundown Lyons was taken from the jail at Antlers and driven to the penitentiary at McAlester. On the way Deputy Sheriff Van Raulston continued to threaten him.

"We ought to hang and bury him right here," the sheriff told his companions, explaining that they could tell the court Lyons had tried to escape. Lyons was taken at once to the Warden's office. "Is this the nigger who did the shooting?" Warden Dunn asked, and Deputy Sheriff Van Raulston replied that Lyons had "already admitted same in the confession in the jail house," When Warden Dunn questioned Lyons about the murders, Lyons said he knew nothing about them, and the deputy sheriff, with an "I'll make him talk," started beating Lyons. This continued for almost two hours. Lyons had been without sleep since Sunday-this was Tuesday. He had been without food the entire day and without water since early afternoon. He "couldn't stand no more"; so he answered their questions as he was instructed to answer them. A stenographer was called to take down the "confession," which Warden Dunn and Deputy Sheriff Van Raulston dictated in a low tone to the stenographer while Lyons nodded his head in assent. The "confession" signed, Lyons was placed in the death cell in the basement of the jail, about fifteen feet from the electric chair. There he spent the night.

While he was confined at the penitentiary awaiting preliminary hearing, Lyons was threatened and beaten until he agreed to take the stand and admit his "guilt." The preliminary hearing was held at Hugo. Up to this time Lyons had had no lawyer. At the hearing two local attorneys appointed by the court to defend him refused to act and were excused, and the hearing proceeded without counsel for the defendant.

"ARGENTINA? SI, SI, MEIN FÜHRER.....YOU'RE THROUGH

With the exception of the alleged confession, the only evidence against him produced by the state was testimony that Lyons was carrying a twelve-gauge shotgun wrapped in a newspaper in the colored section of Fort Towson on the day of the murder, that he had bought six No. 4 shells from the local store on the day of the murder, and that the Rogerses were killed with No. 4 shot from a twelve-gauge shotgun. Lyons admitted that he had borrowed a twelve-gauge shotgun on that day to go hunting with, that he had bought some shells, and that he carried the gun wrapped in a newspaper because he did not have a hunting license.

Lyons was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment. The prosecution's entire case depended on the alleged confession made in the warden's office at McAlester, admitted over the objection of Lyons's counsel, which was provided by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The first "confession" was excluded from evidence, the court ruling that "the defendant might have been frightened into making [it] . . . by long hours of questioning and by placing bones of the purported bodies of the deceased persons in his lap during the questioning." The court admittedly was under the impression that several days had elapsed between the two confessions but did not withdraw the second confession from consideration by the jury when it was revealed that both confessions were made on the same day with virtually no rest for the prisoner in between.

An appeal to the Criminal Court of Appeals, taken in behalf of Lyons by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the American Civil Liberties Union as amicus curiae, on the ground that he had been denied due process of law guaranteed by the Constitution, resulted in a unanimous decision upholding the conviction. The United States Supreme Court has granted certiorari, and arguments will be heard during the last week of April.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that use of a confession obtained by force and violence is a violation of the Constitution. "The rack and torture chamber may not be substituted for the witness chair," the court declared only recently in reversing a conviction obtained in a similar case in Mississippi. A long line of court decisions has firmly established the principle that any confession made after one confession has been obtained by force and violence is likewise inadmissible unless the state can prove beyond a reasonable doubt that all the influences which forced the accused to confess previously had been completely removed. The Supreme Court has not yet passed on this point, but in a case which came before it recently (Canty v. Alabama, 309 U. S. 629) it granted the prisoner's petition for certiorari and reversed the conviction without even permitting the state to argue as to the merits. In that instance the prisoner was tortured in a police station at Montgomery, Alabama, then carried miles away to Kilby Prison, where, allegedly without force and in the presence of persons who were allegedly not at the earlier scene, the prisoner made a confession.

The New France

BY CHARLES DE GAULLE

[The following address was delivered by General de Gaulle on March 18 before the Consultative Assembly in Algiers. We believe that it expresses more clearly than any previous statement the attitude of the Committee of National Liberation toward the post-war problems of France.—THE EDITOR.]

ENTLEMEN, whatever may be the date or speed Tof the liberation, the urgent problems which the government will then have to solve will be farreaching and difficult, as the Assembly knows full well. The most important of these problems concern the pursuit of the war, side by side with the Allies; French participation in the elaboration and application of the European armistice conventions; the maintenance of public order and the establishment of a purged administration; the working of justice; the supply of currency and the payment of salaries; a labor policy and the organization of production; foreign exchange and communications; public health; the reestablishment of individual and union rights; freedom of the press and the regulation of information; the return of our prisoners and deported workers; the movements of refugees; and lastly material preparations for the great national consultation from which will emerge the Constituent National Assembly which will build the Fourth Republic. . . .

Although it is impossible to know exactly how the French people will be feeling and thinking, since this will depend on the many trials which they must still experience before they can breathe the air of freedom, we have judged that the preparation of general solutions should be vigorously undertaken despite the lack of means of investigation. Such constructive work is absolutely necessary and urgent, and your final decisions in these matters will be of the highest importance. Without wishing to influence the definite arrangements, which must be adopted as soon as possible, I should inform you what the government considers necessary, so that the conception of these arrangements today and their application tomorrow may fulfil the conditions.

First, nothing can be done without order. Order is an imperious necessity for any accomplishment in the situation in which our country will be placed by the battles on its soil, the enemy's retreat, the many kinds of destruction suffered, the collapse of the present system of oppression. Consequently, and I say so with emphasis, there can be no other public authority than that which proceeds from the responsible central power. Any attempt to maintain in part or in camouflaged form the Vichy organization or any artificially created authority outside the present government would be intolerable and to be condemned in advance. As soon as local authorities are designated by the French Committee of National Liberation, citizens will be duty bound to conform strictly to the instructions of these authorities, without prejudice of course to the role which will be played by advisory organizations provided by our committees of liberation, pending the constitution of local assemblies as foreseen. Woe to him who acts against national unity!

We must admit that the exceedingly difficult economic conditions into which France will be plunged in the initial period of reconstruction will exclude any rapid improvement in matters of supply and distribution. It is painful to have to tell a nation which has greatly suffered that the landing of French and Allied forces will not immediately bring comfortable conditions. But it is the government's duty to take the strict measures relative to rationing, prices, exchange, and credit which will enable everyone to receive an equal share of the necessaries of life. As production increases, as food and raw materials arrive from foreign countries or overseas France in accordance with plans on which the government is at present collaborating with competent international organizations, and as interior and exterior communications are reestablished, this situation will improve. But we must realize that the improvement will be slow. . . .

Having set up this initial distribution system, the government intends to stimulate, by every possible means, agricultural production and industrial reconstruction. Obviously, however, it will not tolerate coalitions of interests, private monopolies, or trusts, whose existence at the beginning of this new period would imperil the economic and social reforms desired by the great majority of Frenchmen, reforms which are to be decided on by nationally elected representatives. In pursuance of these same ends, wealth obtained in the midst of general privation, particularly wealth gained by activities directly benefiting the enemy, will be quite simply taken away. The new France recognizes fair profit as useful, but will consider illicit any concentration of business which might throw the state's economic and social policy out of gear and dictate the condition of men.

The government will not wait until all France is freed from the enemy before taking action to insure the nation's existence and to restore the laws of the Republic. As the armies of liberation advance, the task of reconstruction will begin. It is obvious that if the government is to function in zones where fighting is going on there must be cooperation between the Allied military command and the local authorities designated by the government. For such cooperation to be easy and efficient, arrangements for it must have been made in advance by the French Committee of National Liberation and our American and British allies. The government, for its part, has made the necessary arrangements and has informed Washington and London of its plans. It has also decided how it will proceed with the administration of territories that gradually come under its jurisdiction. These decisions and projected arrangements represent our determination to furnish the armies on our territory with all the facilities they will need for the conduct of operations on which the destiny of the world depends and in which French troops from outside and inside France will participate in every way possible.

At this point we come to what makes the foreign relations of France so difficult at present. While the government must defend abroad the rights and interests of the country, rights and interests that extend to all parts of the world and into the future, the conditions under which it functions do not permit it, in relation to the other great powers, to have a hearing proportionate to its sacred obligations. As a result France has comparatively little part in the discussion of certain political and strategic questions presented by the war-a fact of which the nation and its friends are profoundly conscious. This is a practical issue, whose solution cannot be postponed. The government's policy in this matter is to try to make itself heard and understood, despite many obstacles, by bringing the greatest possible cooperation to the common effort, and to remain entirely uncommitted on the position of France with respect to questions which concern her if attempts are made to settle them without consulting her. At the same time the government intends to insure, by its attitude and its patient vigilance, that this transitory state of affairs shall not change the fundamental and indispensable friendship of the French people for the great Allied nations. . . .

THE ROLE OF FRANCE IN EUROPE

Europe knows what it is worth to mankind and is confident of emerging from its sufferings enlightened by its trials and able to undertake constructive work, material, intellectual, and moral, for the reorganization of the world. It is eminently capable of this, once it has crushed the major cause of its tragedies and divisions—the frenzied might of Prussianized Germany. The action, the influence, in a word, the value of France will then become necessary to Europe, to guide it and to help it to renew relations with the world. The government, while carrying on the fight, has prepared by its attitude and policy for the European role which France will play tomorrow to the advantage of all.

In order that the Continent, when it is made over, may arrive at a balance corresponding to modern conditions, it would seem that certain groupings of nations should be formed, without, of course, any encroachment on the sovereignty of the various states. We believe that it would be advantageous for France to become part of some Western European group, formed primarily on an economic basis and as inclusive as possible. Such a group of nations, if it were extended to Africa and had close relations with the Near East, particularly with the Arab states, which are legitimately seeking to unite their interests-with the Channel, the Rhine, and the Mediterranean serving it as arteries-could constitute an important unit in the organization of production, exchange, and security throughout the world. Like all the projects for the near future, this must be prepared beforehand. The French government is willing to begin right now, together with the other states concerned, to study all the plans and negotiations that will be necessary.

THE NEW FRENCH STATE

The task of the provisional government of the Republic will come to an end when national sovereignty has been reestablished. From that moment, our institutions, disrupted by the unforeseen circumstances of the invasion, will resume their legitimate functioning; and the de facto powers which we have assumed in order to direct the nation's war effort and insure the liberation of the sovereign, or rather the captive, French people will be relinquished as having accomplished their purpose.

The permanent form of French society is not within the competence of the Consultative Assembly to decide, for it cannot proceed with free, direct, and general elections under sufficient conditions of national stability. But if events force France to wait before deciding such matters for herself, a great deal is taking place in the minds of the French people. Rising above their sorrows, they are looking toward the future. In what they say and what they think there is apparent a common tendency which already enables us to distinguish the main lines that our restoration will follow.

Our people want a democracy that will have a new machinery and, particularly, new politics. To conform to their wishes, the new regime must be based on national representation, with all the men and women of France participating in the elections. But the legislative procedure must be vastly different from that which finally paralyzed the Third Republic. As to the government to which this national representation will intrust executive authority, it should be invested with all the power and stability which are necessary to the authority of the state and to France's greatness in the world. The French democracy, however, must insure to everyone the right to work and guarantee the dignity and security of all through an economic system planned with a view to developing our national resources and not to furthering private interests. In this system the great sources of national wealth will belong to the nation, and the direction and control of this wealth by the state will be undertaken with the assistance of workers and entrepreneurs. Lastly, it must be made possible for high intellectual and moral elements . . . to cooperate directly with the administration.

This political, social, and economic regime will certainly be completed by assuring, within the French community of peoples, the future of those whose fate is bound to that of France. Lastly, this French system will work in harmony with every other nation cooperating within an international setup so arranged that, in a world where henceforth independence will be law, each nation can develop along its own lines, without having to bear political or economic oppression....

The Pucheu Trial

BY A FRENCHMAN

Algiers, March 27

THE Pucheu trial is over. What was its political significance? Let us briefly recall the essential facts. A former student at the Ecole Normale Supérieure who left education for the world of heavy industry, Pierre Pucheu entered the Pétain government in 1941, serving first as Minister of Industrial Production, then, very soon, as Minister of the Interior. An active, intelligent, and bold man, the political friend of Doriot, he left the government when Laval returned to power and in November, 1942, fled to Spain, where he received General Giraud's permission to come to North Africa. From the very beginning of Pucheu's negotiations with Giraud, General de Gaulle demanded that the ex-Minister, together with Peyrouton, Boisson, and others, be eliminated.

Pucheu was charged with collaboration with the enemy, with responsibility for the persecutions carried on by his ministry, and, in particular, with the creation by him and his colleagues of a special tribunal which condemned patriots to the guillotine. The court overlooked his part in the designation of hostages to be shot by the Germans but produced from the Journal Official enough orders bearing his signature to establish to its satisfaction his treasonable relations with the enemy. The five judges—two magistrates and three generals—condemned him; General de Gaulle refused to pardon him.

Politically, this verdict is significant for several reasons. First of all, it means that Algiers refuses to absolve treason, even two-faced treason. It is probable that Pucheu did play a double game. His conversations with one of the civilian heads of the Resistance in 1941. while he was still minister, his relations, after his resignation, with various generals known to be hostile to the Germans, and his flight from the Gestapo in November, 1942, lead one to believe that although he was completely loyal to Pétain at first, he remained so later on only so far as internal affairs were concerned—in the matter of the révolution nationale and the destruction of democracy; he seems to have wanted to betray the Germans, whose fate he realized was sealed. In the eyes of the men of Algiers, however, these two attitudes cannot be separated: to betray the Republic and to adopt the terroristic methods of the enemy constitute for them just as abominable a crime as to serve Germany against France and its allies. Such is the first significance of a verdict that will ring ominously in the ears of Pétain's ministers and former ministers.

Secondly, the verdict will give great encouragement to the Resistance movement in France. Martyred by Pucheu, the Resistance bore him a fierce hatred. It will be strengthened by knowing that punishment will be meted out to Vichy's hangmen. Any other verdict would have engendered in France a wave of discouragement and perhaps of despair. This is the conviction of the great majority of the representatives of the Resistance movement who are now in Algiers.

Thirdly, the verdict shows that the political influence of Giraud has now, in the eyes of all, virtually disappeared. Although Giraud had encouraged Pucheu to cross the Mediterranean, he did not save him from the firing squad. Moreover, of the five men who designated Giraud as the successor of Darlan, three—Bergeret, Boisson, and Peyrouton—are in prison, and the other two—Noguès and Chatel—have fled to Portugal. Between the country and the men of Vichy an impassable chasm has opened. The role of Giraud in the Pucheu drama is one sign of it. Backed by the people of France, De Gaulle alone has strength. The Allies will be obliged to recognize this.

From an international point of view, the Pucheu trial might better, perhaps, have been postponed, or at least limited to secondary counts punishable by imprisonment, leaving the more serious charges until after the liberation of France. Some fairly influential Frenchmen were of this opinion; they were not heard. This, however, is a delicate subject, one in which the whole question of the independence of the French nation is involved, a question to which Frenchmen are legitimately most sensitive. It is therefore best merely to mention this aspect of the problem without going into it.

Let us remember in conclusion that Pucheu, traitor in the eyes of the France that resists but traitor also in the eyes of Vichy, defended himself forcefully, sometimes even dominating the proceedings, and died with a bravery to which his most bitter enemies paid tribute.

BOOKS and the ARTS

ABSTRACT ART

BY CLEMENT GREENBERG

THE full significance of the revolution in Western painting during the last sixty years will not become apparent for some time. But that part of its meaning which concerns the concrete medium itself is already plain. It is only necessary to put it in historical perpective.

The previous great revolution in Western painting led from the hieratic flatness of Gothic and Byzantine to the three-dimensionality of the Renaissance. Its stimulus was a fresh awareness of space provoked by expanding economic and social relations in the late Middle Ages and by the growing conviction that man's chief mission on earth is the conquest of his environment. The immediate problem in painting was to fit the new perception of depth and volume into the flatness of the picture surface; the less obvious though more difficult and crucial problem was to synthesize depth, volume, and surface in both dramatic and decorative unity. Within the conservative format of the wall painting Giotto created a synthesis which, through simplification of shapes and surfaces and the exclusion of small detail, made his murals hieratic and decorative, yet at the same time dramatic and three-dimensional. The profane appetite for the round was disciplined, volumes were inflated at low pressure to acknowledge the flatness of the wall, and the background was pushed no deeper than the back-drop on a stage.

The Sienese a little later arrived at perhaps an even more conservative synthesis in the altar piece and easel picture. Sassetta subordinated three-dimensionality to decorative principles borrowed from the Gothic or Oriental miniature. The format of his "Journey of the Magi"-in the recent Griggs bequest to the Metropolitan-is surprisingly small: the spectator has to get close enough to read it. Against a neutraltoned background in low relief, color is picked out in a staccato pattern of flat notes by forms handled with a slight attempt at volume. The drawing is fairly correct, but the claims of correctness are not allowed to interfere with the decorative function of line. For the moment Sassetta's art has arrested the transition, having found a style in which the artist is fairly sure of saying exactly what he wants to. This contrasts with the insecure style of another fifteenth-century Sienese, Giovanni di Paolo, in his "Presentation in the Temple" (in the Blumenthal bequest to the Metropolitan), where the old tradition of the Gothic and Oriental miniature is shown in outright conflict with the new one of naturalism. The flat, shallow, but richly detailed architectural background does not provide room for the figures in the foreground; the sculptural modeling of their garments bulges from the picture surface and creates an effect of overcrowding. In his figures Giovanni has explored the illusion of the third dimension farther than Giotto, but since his background is even more strictly two-dimensional, he has failed to attain either structural or decorative unity.

With the aid of the flexible medium of oil, the conflict between three-dimensional form and the plane surface was resolved finally by the annihilation of the second. The Italian or Flemish painter of the fifteenth century managed so to immerse himself in the illusion of the third dimension that he instinctively conceived of his canvas as a transparent rather than an opaque surface. Yet some of the difficulty of controlling the emphasis on volumes still remained. There was a tendency to insist simultaneously on the brilliance of surface which oil permitted and on highly sculptural modeling, a combination often too rich. But the Quattrocento was preoccupied with techniques and the accumulation of data: its painters preferred, for instance, to portray old people because their faces offered more details to the brush. They had not yet reached that point of repletion at which there is a readiness to sacrifice and simplify for the sake of large effects.

It was only toward the close of the fifteenth century and in the sixteenth that Verrocchio, Leonardo, Perugino, Raphael, Michelangelo, Correggio, Giovanni Bellini, Giorgione, and Titian perfected means of consistently achieving structural, tonal, and decorative unity in three-dimensional painting. These were-aside from scientific perspective, which could disorganize as well as organize a picture—the indication and ordering of the illusion of vacant three-dimensional space which forms interrupt (Raphael), the subordination of local color to a dominant tone or key, and the patterning of shade and light. It was necessary to believe enough in the illusion of depth to organize elements within the illusion and at the same time to suspend the illusion sufficiently to see them as the flat forms they are in physical reality. But the tendency was to forget almost all about the last, and thus there was a loss involved here as well as a gain. Post-Renaissance painting sacrificed too many of the qualities intrinsic to its medium. Pictures were organized too exclusively on the basis of the illusionist effect and with too little reference to the physical conditions of the art.

The nineteenth century began to dissolve the facts and make obsolete the general conceptions under which illusionist art had functioned. It came to be realized that the earth could no longer afford to Western man, or his economy, indefinite space in which to expand; that verified facts were the only certainties; that each of the activities of culture could be exercised with assurance only within its own province and only when that province had been strictly defined. The age of specialization and of limited intellectual and spiritual objectives sets in—after Hegel, for instance, philosophers stopped constructing world systems.

And with Manet and Courbet Western painting reversed its direction. Impressionism pushed the faithful reproduction of nature so far that representational painting was turned inside out. Incited by a positivism borrowed from science, the impressionists made the discovery—stated more clearly in their art than in their theories—that the most direct interpretation of visual experience must be two-dimensional. The new medium of photography helped provide evidence for that. Sensations of a third dimension are not given by sight qua sight but by acquired associations with the experience of movement and touch. The data of sight, taken most literally, are nothing but colors. Notice, therefore, how a flatness begins to creep into impressionist paintings, how close to the surface they stay, in spite of "atmospheric perspective," and how openly the physical nature of the canvas and of the paint on it is confessed—by way, too, of emphasizing the difference between painting and photography.

The successors to impressionism have made all this more explicit. Painting, become anti-idealist, has surrendered itself once more to the literal plane surface. Correctness of drawing, black-and-white chiaroscuro, three-dimensional light effects, atmospheric and linear perspective, etc., etc., have been progressively, though not consistently, eliminated. The uniformly smooth and transparent surface behind which the picture used to take place has been made the actual locus of the picture instead of its window pane. To acknowledge the brute flatness of the surface on which he was trying to create a new and less deceptive illusion of the third dimension, Cézanne broke up the objects he depicted into multiplicities of planes that were as closely parallel as possible to the canvas's surface; and to show recession, the planes were stepped back with comparative abruptness-even the receding edges of objects keep turning full-face to the spectator like courtiers leaving the presence of royalty. Furthermore, Cézanne's parallel, roughly rectangular touches of the brush echo the outline of the canvas. And it was the new realization of the importance of every physical factor that also compelled the distortions of his drawing, and of Van Gogh's and Gauguin's—determined just as much by the tensions between the frame of the picture and the forms within it as by expressive compulsions. There were still other ways in which the physical nature of the medium and the materialism of art were asserted: pigment was sometimes applied so thinly that the canvas showed through, or it was piled in such impastos that the picture became almost a kind of relief. (There was a paradox in the fact that both Van Gogh and Gauguin were trying to rescue painting from the materialism into which they accused the impressionists of having sunk it.)

The Fauves, early in the first decade of this century, constructed pictures with flat, high-keyed color which was arbitrary in any representational sense and more or less dissociated from contour. Cubism, parodying by exaggeration the traditional methods of rendering volume and light in a despairing effort to restore the third dimension by Cézanne's method, finished by annihilating the third dimension; resulted in paintings that were completely flat-and thus accomplished the counter-revolution in principle. Picasso, Braque, Gris, and the others through whose art cubism evolved refused to accept its ultimate conclusions, and once they had arrived at pictures from which the identities of objects had disappeared, they did an about-face and returned to representation; other artists, however, later on accepted in full the logic of cubism and become outright abstractionists, resigning themselves to the non-representational and the inviolability, more or less, of the plane surface. With a speed that still seems amazing one of the most epochal transformations in the history of art was accomplished.

The deeper meaning of this transformation is that in a period in which illusions of every kind are being destroyed the illusionist methods of art must also be renounced. The taste most closely attuned to contemporary art has become positivist, even as the best philosophical and political intelligence of the time. Fiction, under which illusionist art can be subsumed, is no longer able to provide the intensest aesthetic experience. Poetry is lyric and "pure"; the serious novel has become either confession or highly abstract, as with Joyce and Stein; architecture subordinates itself to function and the construction engineer; music has abandoned the program. Let painting confine itself to the disposition pure and simple of color and line, and not intrigue us by associations with things we can experience more authentically elsewhere. The painter may go on playing with illusion, but only for the sake of satire. If he finds the limited depth of the plane surface too confining, let him become a sculptor—as Arp, originally a painter, has done.

But even as a sculptor the artist can no longer imitate nature. There is nothing left in nature for plastic art to explore. The techniques of art founded on the conventions of representation have exhausted their capacity to reveal fresh aspects of exterior reality in such a way as to provide the highest pleasure. But the trouble lies also with exterior reality itself. Byzantine art was abstract in tendency because it subordinated exterior reality to a dogma, regardless of whether that reality confirmed the dogma. In any case reality was not appearance. Naturalist art submits itself to appearance; if any dogma is involved it flows from appearance, and appearance is assumed to be the true and the real. Today we know that the question what a corporeal object is can be answered in many different ways, depending on the context, and that appearance is only one context among many, and perhaps one of the less important ones. To give the appearance of an object or a scene at a single moment in time is to shut out reference to too many of the other contexts in which it simultaneously exists. (And have not science and industry dissolved the concept of the entity into the concept of a process?) Instead of being aroused, the modern imagination is numbed by visual representation. Unable to represent the exterior world suggestively enough, pictorial art is driven to express as directly as possible only what goes on inside the self-or at most the ineluctable modes by which that which is outside the self is perceived (Mondrian).

Painting approaches the condition of music, which according to Aristotle is the most direct and hence the most subjective means of expression, having least to do with the representation of exterior reality. The gain that helps cancel the loss entailed by the restriction of painting and sculpture to the subjective lies in the necessity that painting become, in compensation, all the more sensitive, subtle, and various, and at the same time more disciplined and objectivized by its physical medium.

Art is under no categorical imperative to correspond point by point to the underlying tendencies of its age. Artists will do whatever they can get away with, and what they can get away with is not to be determined beforehand. Good landscapes, still lifes, and torsos will still be turned out. Yet it seems to me—and the conclusion is forced by observation not by preference—that the most ambitious and effective pictorial art of these times is abstract or goes in that direction.

Plain Talk About China

SHARK'S FINS AND MILLET. By Ilona Ralf Sues. Little Brown and Company. $3.

PEAKING of fights: 'way back in late 1940, before the great Japanese blizzard, a bunch of American marines had a fight with a bunch of Italian marines. The fight took place in a White Russian dance hall on Blood Alley in the French concession in Shanghai, next door to one of the many hop joints. Just as the fight was at its best, with beet bottles flying, an American marine grabbed an Italian marine, dragged him to the piano, and ran his face up and down the keyboard, rubbing off all the Fascist glamour.

In this book about China Miss Sues has rubbed all the glamour off the face of the ruling clique of our Far Eastern ally. Needless to say, in all such fights all kinds of people get hit, some deservedly and some less so, and even innocent bystanders are not safe. Many people are going to be furious with Miss Sues, and they may even hire someone to write a reply, just as they once hired her and other Occidentals.

Miss Sues is a Polish woman, speaking many languages, who worked for seven years in Geneva for the Anti-Opium Bureau of the League of Nations. She could do a good book on that subject, but only one section of this one is devoted to her disillusionment. When the Japanese occupied Manchuria and later when Italy occupied Abyssinia, the League looked the other way and instead of doing something effective against the aggressors started a Committee for the Protection of the Whale.

Miss Sues could not stomach this, and eventually she took her cat and her typewriter and went off to China, which she believed to be an enigma, yet on the whole noble. She began by trying to chase down facts about opium but found herself chased down by one Tu Yueh-seng, opium king of China, whom the Generalissimo of all the Chinas had appointed chief "opium-suppression" officer; in previous years Mr. Tu was also chief "Communist-suppression" agent of Shanghai and did the bloody job so well that he controlled labor and sent his own henchmen to Geneva to sit on the Labor Bureau of the League. Miss Sues thinks she got the better of Mr. Tu in her interview with him-but no one ever got the better of the double-barreled Al Capone of China. His disciple, Mr. Chu Hsueh-fang, who represented Chinese labor at Geneva, will also represent it at the coming International Labor Conference in Philadelphia.

Miss Sues sat near one of the seats of the mighty, turning out publicity for China, a job to which she was appointed by Madame Chiang, who in turn did what the Australian, W. H. Donald, "advised" her to do. Miss Sues admires Donald still, but she calls him the "Richelieu of China" because, she says, he controlled Madame Chiang and, through her, much that the Generalissimo thought and did. Donald's ambition was to make Madame Chiang the "First Lady of the World," and Miss Sues thinks he achieved a great deal, inducing her to turn slightly democratic and to modify her Wellesley view of life. Madame Chiang, she says, was a mixture of many things, but within her own four walls she was a "selfish, petty, capricious prima donna."

Many of the things that appeared in print under her name were written by Donald, Miss Sues, and a number of other Occidentals, including missionaries. The Chinese masses, so Miss Sues declares, judged the three Soong sisters in the following terms: "One loves wealth, one loves China, and one loves glory." It was Madame Sun Yat-sen who loved China. However, this graphic phrase most surely came from student sources, not from the masses.

Intent on getting the scalps of the ruling clique, Miss Sues makes many statements against men who were really victims of the clique. But others deserve what they get, on the whole, for many of them drew salaries merely by virtue of their Kuomintang membership, while one would endure every indignity as long as he could eat his way through life. Miss Sues makes liberal use of satire to prove her points.

When it comes to the revolutionary movement, Miss Sues is on insecure ground, for she had but little time to know it. She was one of a group of five foreigners who made a short tour to the Eighth Route Army and the Communist headquarters in the northwest. Her interview with Mao Tzetung, the Communist leader, is excellently, even brilliantly done, but she makes herself appear ridiculous as she stands in trembling awe before Mao with her gift, a tin of cigarettes, pressed to her heart.

This section of the book contains many small factual inaccuracies. For example, the children known as "little devils" in the Eighth Route Army did not fight in battle and were not the terror of the Japanese; some romantic student perhaps told Miss Sues this tale. Her admiration for the American "volunteer" fliers in 1938 is beyond my comprehension, for they were mercenaries who would bomb anything they were paid to bomb. Also, while Dr. Robert Lim, director of the Chinese Red Cross Medical Corps, met ceaseless and bitter opposition, still he and I were not condemned wholesale for trying to "pamper coolies" (soldiers) by making first-aid kits. Dr. F. C. Yen did not oppose us but helped us. Nevertheless, the general braying and baying that went on against Dr. Lim was sufficient to give Miss Sues the impression that every man's hand was turned against his work. I come out well in this book. Miss Sues generously records my strong points, forgetting my weaknesses; but I am a little surprised at some of the words attributed to me.

Miss Sues states that, had weather conditions not been unfavorable, General Ho Ying-ching, Minister of War, would have bombed Sian in December, 1936, and perhaps killed Generalissimo Chiang, who was a prisoner there. As one who was in Sian, I must state that the weather was excellent. Planes brought the Red Army leaders to the city, General Ho's planes reconnoitered over the city, his bombers bombed nearby towns, and a plane came and went from Nanking; and eventually the Generalissimo and his party were flown out.

So there are many sides to this picture of China. Miss Sues defends the democratic side, and rightly, but her reasoning is so disjointed that one finishes the book still not knowing what she really believes in. She gives a picture of one part of China—a part that has its counterpart in America, England, Italy, and elsewhere. The world is now small and very, very round, as a friend of mine is wont to say.

The South and the Negro

RACE AND RUMORS OF RACE: CHALLENGE TO AMERICAN CRISIS. By Howard W. Odum. The University of North Carolina Press. $2.

PROFESSOR ODUM has set down in a very readable manner—one might even say entertaining were it not for the often tragic implications—the various rumors which were circulating in the South during the latter half of 1942 and the first six months of 1943 concerning the Negro's attempt to escape from his traditional status. These rumors are presented against the economic and cultural background of the South and the social changes which have been accelerated by World War II. In order to understand why they were believed, the author holds, it is necessary to understand the Southern credo in regard to the Negro. The twenty-one items in the Southern credo, as the author states it, amount to the belief that the Negro is not human and must be kept in an inferior position. This explains, for example, why kindly and generous Christian Southern whites can resort to "cold-hearted torture of Negroes" and even burn them. The behavior and the demands of the new generation of Negro youths, who are better educated than their parents, are a threat to everything that the South holds sacred. As a result there is a crisis in race relations involving three militant fronts-the Negroes, the North, and the white South. The North figures because of its influence on the thinking of Negroes and its attitude toward the Negro problem.

The catalogue of rumors is divided into four groups. The first comprises stories of attempts on the part of Negroes to get out of "their place." Many of these rumors grew out of the fact that Negro women were escaping from the servitude of poorly paid domestic service. The most celebrated were those concerning the organization and activities of the Eleanor Clubs, whose slogan was nearly always a variation of "a white woman in every kitchen by 1943." Because of the importance of the Eleanor Clubs, the author devotes a special chapter to the folklore that grew up around the name of Mrs. Roosevelt. This folklore was often so disgraceful that the author is moved to state that the South forgot its tradition of chivalry and good manners toward women. The second group of rumors consisted of "stories of Negroes taking over white women" or having the "bold intention to achieve the hated 'social equality.' " The author feels that rumors in this class were so widespread and readily believed because of the dormant heritage of fear of Negro men among white women. However, to the reviewer it appears that they were also related to a sense of guilt on the part of white men, who have had access to Negro women while white women have been taboo to the Negro man. In many cases Negro men were reported to have told white men in uniform or about to be drafted that they would "take care of the women." The third group has to do with preparations for revolt, including the widespread rumor that Negroes were buying up ice picks. Other rumors were difficult to classify; some appeared to have been planted for the purpose of sabotage. For example, it may surprise many readers to learn that there was a rumor current that "when Hitler takes over" the Negroes would gain their rightful place in America. Negro children were reported to be singing to the tune of "America":

> My country's tired of me, I'm going to Germany Where I belong.

As one might expect, there were similar rumors concerning the Negro's expectations in the event of a Japanese victory.

The third part of the book, which deals chiefly with The Way Out and The Way On, is likely to prove disappointing to the reader. Professor Odum presents the statement of Southern Negro leaders at the Durham conference, which was followed by a sympathetic reply by white leaders assembled in Atlanta. The latter conference came out for the "legitimate aspirations of the Negro," which included civil rights and a fair share in educational facilities and social services. Then follows a long list of questions-literally over a hundred-to which an answer must be found if race relations in the South are to be improved. Heeding the author's caution that this is not the time to call names and blame individuals, the reviewer does not hold him altogether responsible for the indefiniteness and inadequacy of this section of the book. Professor Odum, like most Southern liberals, is in the same dilemma in which the South finds itself. Therefore, unlike Northern liberals, he must always emphasize his loyalty to the region in which he lives. This results in occasional confusion in an otherwise clear analysis of the situation. For example, in appraising the "rightness" of the three groups, he freely admits that the Negro is "most right" because he has Christian ethics and democratic principles on his side; and that the North is second "most right." But when he comes to the South he first admits that the South is "least" right or "wrong" and then goes into a long explanation to the effect that the South is "right" in that it reflects "its natural evolutionary pattern," possesses state rights, and has been subject to certain cultural conditioning. One might remind Professor Odum that Nazi youth has been "culturally conditioned" to exterminate inferior races and that Germany is probably reflecting "its natural evolutionary pattern," but that in a world which is struggling to create a single moral order the behavior of the South as well as other political entities must be judged by accepted ethical standards and political principles. Evidently Professor Odum shares this opinion, for toward the end of his book he asks whether the South can experience the "conviction of sin" and "surrender" its stubborn heart.

In view of Professor Odum's sympathetic presentation of the outlook and aspirations of Negro youth and his excellent analysis of racial rumors in relation to Southern society, one would be inclined to overlook certain inconsistencies if they were not bound up with the central problem of the Negro in the American community. Professor Odum is no "isolationist" in respect to the place of the South in the nation; he is, nevertheless, opposed to what he calls "outside agitation." In view of his presentation of the Southern credo, one would like to know whether he thinks that the national government should allow the South to continue to rob Negroes of their proper share of educational funds and of the various social services and subsidies which are financed by the national government. However much the Southern liberal may deprecate "outside agitation," he cannot deny that he must still look to the outside for support of his position. If he does not openly accept this support, he must at least offer an alternative program. This was implied in a recent editorial by Virginius Dabney, who in advocating the abolition of Jim Crow transportation in Virginia stated that the white South had to determine whether the leadership of Negroes was to rest in Atlanta or in New York City.

With Straw

BRICKER OF OHIO. By Karl B. Pauly, G. P. Putnam's Sons, $2.

OVERNOR JOHN W. BRICKER was born in a log house, went to a little red schoolhouse, made the senior honorary society at Ohio State University, was a chaplain during the last war, and likes baseball, hunting, and fishing. As a high-school orator and college debater, he opposed the direct election of Senators and government ownership of telephone and telegraph systems and favored compulsory military training.

He has spent his adult years playing politics the traditional way—joining lodges, going to county fairs, making speeches, and shaking hands. As a public official he has whittled expenses, turned a deficit into a surplus, had feuds with "bureaucrats," fought centralization of authority, and given Ohio the sort of government that satisfies the Republican business moguls.

He has never been to Europe or manifested much interest in foreign affairs. He is for "an international cooperative organization" but against any "central world authority." His ideas about the next peace are—as Mark Sullivan said of Warren G. Harding's speech accepting the Republican nomination in 1920—"clearly vague."

These facts stand out in the campaign biography of Governor Bricker written by his friend Karl B. Pauly, a reporter for the Ohio State Journal. The same things could be said of dozens of rural American politicians. But this "detailed information" is presented as the basis of Governor Bricker's plea for the next Republican Presidential nomination.

The book is painful reading, but it should be read thoughtfully. For it reveals what mediocre and provincial, though honest, leadership some Republicans propose to give our country in the midst of global bloodshed. Mr. Pauly damns his hero with such irrelevant and picayune praise that people aware of the world's plight will lay his book down thinking they'd as soon vote for Mickey Mouse as for Bricker for the Presidency this fall.

Fiction in Review

REVIEWING Eduardo Mallea's "The Bay of Silence" (Knopf, $2.50) in the New Yorker of March 18, Edmund Wilson brings to our notice the important fact that in translation this novel by one of Argentina's foremost writers has been cut by some hundred thousand words. Although it is of course unforgivable if this alteration was made without Mr. Mallea's permission, I am afraid I cannot go along with Mr. Wilson in the generous assumption that it is ruthless cutting which makes the difference between a successful novel and a "puzzling" and "unsatisfying" one. It is annoying in the extreme to be given a book in which characters disappear while they hold, as it were, the center of the stage, but ignoring the gaps in the narrative and judging "The Bay of Silence" by the 339 pages we are given, or any one of them, it is my guess that Mr. Mallea's novel might have been twice as frustrating rather than twice as rewarding if it had been twice as long. That is, while I agree with Mr. Wilson that Mr. Mallea's book "has a tinge of distinction," I find persistent evidence of an inherent vagueness of thought which can scarcely be blamed on either translation or editing; I recall a similar puzzling quality in "Fiesta in November," the novelette which is Mr. Mallea's only other work to have been translated into English. There is little question that Mr. Mallea is a sophisticated, welleducated, and sensitive writer—one intuitively appreciates his intention—but he seems to me always to be hinting around what he has to say instead of coming right out with it.

This amorphousness or indirection or inconsequentiality whatever one might call it—is most apparent in the political discussions that make up such an important part of "The Bay of Silence." Mr. Mallea's hero-protagonist-the story is told in the first person-is an Argentinian writer who passionately loves his country and devotes himself to finding the way in which Argentina can throw off both its corrupt native leaders and corrupting foreign influences and assert its best strength; in his twenties the young man hopes to achieve this goal through a left-wing magazine called Enough; in his thirties, somewhat wearied but still hopeful, he puts his political energies into his fiction. But from the dozens of conversations between Mr. Mallea's protagonist and his friends, and from the endless thought-passages of the writer himself, we grasp only the vaguest general political directions, never the distinct line of political purpose or argument. The people in "The Bay of Silence" are very well-informed, but they always seem to speak at a tangent to clear sense. For example, when a newcomer to Enough wishes to write some articles for the magazine on the theory of the coup d'état, Mr. Mallet sets forth his subject for him in the following words: "He wanted to comment on Curzio Malaparte, to go back to the days of the Florentine Republic and attempt an interpretation of Dante Alighieri" -surely an odd, muddled, and pretentious enterprise but one which the author does not present as odd, muddled, or pretentious. This is simply the way in which people speak and think in his novel.

This style of thought, by the way, is not peculiar to Mr. Mallea among contemporary writers who concern themselves with the political scene, and that is another reason why I cannot blame the vagueness of "The Bay of Silence" on its editing or translation. I have come across this same inability to grasp the political point, to enunciate it clearly and develop it logically, in any number of modern European novels. It is what makes Aldanov's "The Fifth Seal," in its non-satiric sections, read like an allegory to which we have never been given the key; it is persistent in Jules Romains—my head would swim if I tried to give a redaction of the political soliloquy in the first chapter of the latest volume of "Men of Good Will"; it is part of what makes one so angry with Ilya Ehrenbourg's "The Fall of Paris" or Hans Habe's "Katharine." Indeed, this weakness appears to be so endemic among contemporary novels which deal with social-political issues that it would be tempting to look for an explanation in the times or issues themselves. But the fact is that American and English novels of the same order, whatever their other faults, seem never to suffer from this one. At least in their fiction, writers of the two English-speaking countries seem to be able to speak to the point, if not always to the right point—an observation I throw out at full risk, I know, of being accused of Anglo-Saxon chauvinism.

"Dangling Man," by Saul Bellow (Vanguard, $2.50), in both length and conception resembles an extended story rather than a novel. It is the diary of a young man who has been classified 1-A, has given up his job and made all his preparations for going into the army, and then waits month after month for his induction; it is the exploration, that is, of the strange period in a young man's life when he has given up his normal habits and responsibilities but has not yet had his new habits formed for him, or his responsibilities taken over for him, by an outside agency. Thrown back on his own resources, Mr. Bellow's dangling man finds that he has no resources, he has only exacerbated nerves; the raw emptiness which he faces reflects the raw emptiness of contemporary life.

Mr. Bellow is talented and clever and he writes with control and precision. But "Dangling Man" is not the kind of novel I like. I find myself deeply opposed to novels of sterility-or, rather, to small novels of sterility. It is not that I think fiction should be blind to the badness or even the horror of certain aspects of modern life or that it should refuse to despair; it is, simply, that I demand of pessimism, more than of affirmation, that it have a certain grandeur. I have never understood why it necessarily follows from the loss of political hope—and it is at the core of the unhappiness of Mr. Bellow's young man that he is a disillusioned radical-that one must see human nature as robbed of drama and variety and even the physical world as non-dimensional. Art is a wonderful bootstrap by which to raise life above this mean level. DIANA TRILLING

DRAMA

OE AKINS'S newest play is an American cousin of the fiction of Evelyn Waugh; and like the proverbial American cousin, "Mrs. January and Mr. X" (Belasco Theater) is more awkward and less polished than its English relative. But it has a vitality of its own; it is not an imitation. After the fashion of Waugh, Miss Akins has invented a fantastic situation peopled by fantastic characters. Likewise, the fantasy is tethered to reality by an invisible thread, and it is the jerks of the thread that give the piece point.

Mrs. January is a fabulously rich and silly and pretty woman who has come, with a full complement of servants, to live in one half of a two-family house at forty dollars a month so that she will be prepared for the communism that is just around the corner—she's a Communist herself. The other half of thouse is occupied by the owner, who is an ex-President (he's an amalgam of Coolidge and Hoover).

There is a good deal of wit in the writing. Billie Burke and Frank Craven are perfectly cast as the principal characters, and they know their trade so well that it is a pleasure to watch them plying it. But only up to a point. For somewhere along the way Miss Akins runs out of breath. Her balloon bounces along the ground instead of riding the skies—and Miss Burke's voice gets monotonous. In a word, "Mrs. January and Mr. X" doesn't come off, but I hope Miss Akins will persist in this folly.

"Only the Heart" (Bijou Theater) might have been news in, say, 1922. It's pretty dated now. Because of the part she plays, June Walker seems a little dated too, but Eleanor Anton, who makes her debut on Broadway, is charming.

I've seen nothing lower than "Chicken Every Sunday" (Henry Miller's Theater) as far as bad taste goes—except the audience that applauded it.

ART

As Bonnard and Vuillard show, there were possibilities in impressionism which the nineteenth century failed to exhaust. Some of the last of these have been capitalized by Arnold Friedman in his most recent landscapes, in which, after years of working in a neo-Ingresque vein, the artist has discovered himself as an impressionist. His current show (at the Marquié Gallery through April 15) demonstrates that something can still be said with atmospheric envelopes, complementary colors, and optical mixtures. In Friedman's successful pictures vibrating color surfaces move toward and away from each other like incidents in a well-told story. In his unsuccessful paintings there is that tendency to monotony and excessive naivete which has always been a liability of the impressionist method: there is a failure to emphasize, accent, modulate: only paint quality and texture are offered, while the compositional elements cancel each other by their equivalence. This is particularly true in the still lifes, which are too evenly focused, and in some of the landscapes, where the approach is frontal and four-square. But when the artist can rely on atmospheric interference to select and unify he produces paintings which dramatize art as well as nature. One such picture, "Approach to Town," in small format, points out a path beyond impressionism which Friedman should follow farther: abandoning broken tones and crusty impastos for the orchestration of facets of flat color. By and large Friedman's painting is praiseworthy for its honesty, for its renunciation of tricks and stunts-it is obvious that he has the equipment to paint as fashionably as anyone on the market, but it is also obvious that he has character.

EMPHIS BELLE" is the story of one bomber's twenty fifth and over Germany. You realize, as you watch it, that if the crew survives, it will be retired from combat service. What this means to the men of the crew, to those whose survival will not mean retirement, and to those who are not flying that day is so unobstreperously clear in the faces of all of them that I could not guess which shots were reenacted and which were straight records. This same vigorous and pitiful sense of the presence, danger, skill, and hope of several human beings so pervades the flying, flak, bombing, and fighting scenes that not even one of the dozen or so superhuman shots allows you to feel that either it or you are there for the view. Everything is seen, done, and experienced as if from inside one or another of the men in the plane. Color and the sudden amazements of the air help to create this immediacy, but so do the very experienced, vigilant photography, the even better cutting, and a general good taste which knows better than to use any rhetoric of image, word, or sound in dealing with such facts. "With the Marines at Tarawa" shudders like a new wound, and is as terrible to see. "Memphis Belle" does not have that kind of power or sensitiveness. But of its very different kind of war process, at once more aloof and mere intimate, it seems as good a record. Taken together, the films are documentaries with which for the first time we can look the English in the eye.

The man in over-all charge of making this good film was William Wyler, whose talent I respected in "Wuthering Heights" and even in "Mrs. Miniver," without caring for the pictures. Post-war planners should work out a better fate for him than going back to Hollywood.

MUSIC

BEETHOVEN'S Septet Opus 20 is a work for which Toscanini has great affection; but no matter how well it has been performed in its original form he has found the four strings insufficient to achieve proper balance with the three winds; and he has therefore performed it with a greater number of strings. There have been a couple of broadcast performances with the N. B. C. Symphony; and recently there was one with the Philadelphia Orchestra at a Pension Foundation concert in Philadelphia. The balance between strings and winds was perfect; and even with the increased number of strings the textures and proportions remained those of chamber music. The few performances I had heard of the Septet in its original form had left me with the impression of it as a work in the same class as the inconsequential Piano Quartet Opus 16; and I still have that impression of the first movement. But the theme and variations and the minuet which follow are-at any rate in the forms of living sound that Toscanini gives them-as lovely and charming as any of the best of Beethoven's early music.

At this Philadelphia concert the performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 2 also increased my awareness—which began when I heard Toscanini's performance of it with the New York Philharmonic in 1942—of the qualities which are presumably the reasons why on these two occasions he has played this work rather than No. 3. No. 2 employs the same musical ideas as No. 3; it works them into a structure which parallels that of No. 3; and the generally held notion of it is that of a sort of imperfect version of the final perfected achievement of No. 3. For many years I listened to it with that notion in my head, and therefore heard nothing to contradict it; but in 1942 I heard for the first time what made me realize that this was a different work. and in its own different ways as wonderful a work as No. 3. I haven't the score to refer to: but I can cite as one instance of what I mean the last measures of the slow introduction that lead to the first theme of the Allegro-the single line of sound of the string basses, a line that is prolonged, and that reaching the point where it seemed to be going rises unexpectedly beyond this point to delay what is coming, to increase the suspense in anticipation of its arrival, and to increase its effect when it does at last enter.

Also on the program was the "Pastoral" Symphony, which Toscanini played shortly afterward with the N. B. C. Symphony in a General Motors broadcast. The two performances were close enough to make noticeable interesting differences between the two superb orchestras. For one thing, a few differences in personnel. The N. B. C. solo flute and oboe are very good; nevertheless when they finished the imitations of bird-calls at the end of the second movement my companion whispered: "What silly music!"; but the way this passage was inflected by Kincaid and Tabuteau in Philadelphia made it one of the most exciting things in the work. And in the Philadelphia performance the second movement was not marred by coarse, insensitive phrases of the solo clarinet, as it was in the N. B. C. performance. In the playing of the N. B. C. Symphony as a whole, moreover, one heard a youthful, almost nervous vitality; in the playing of the Philadelphia Orchestra a quietly assured mellowness and other qualities that come with years of working together.

In the years since Stokowski's departure I have wondered—remembering the Philharmonic after Toscanini's departure—how the Philadelphia has managed to remain a great orchestra. The only clue has been its evident alertness and eagerness and pride when it used to play under Stokowski and on the recent occasions when I have heard it play under Toscanini; and I have concluded that it is esprit de corps and pride in its great past that have enabled it to keep itself at a high level in the present. But this is a matter on which no one can speak with the knowledge and understanding of the man who has himself played in orchestras; and I have at last received from such a person—a young man now in the army who played in college orchestras and in the National Orchestral Association and watched the Philadelphia Orchestra in action—an authoritative explanation of what I have wondered about.

The personnel of the Philadelphia, he writes, has remained largely intact, retaining a backbone, in its woodwind and brass sections, of "some of the greatest artists in the world on their respective instruments, and masters of ensemble playing," who set the pace; and "the strings are nothing but fine." In each section, moreover, the men play with the man who taught them at the Curtis Institute ("Torello and all his students from Curtis make a terrific bass section"); when a new man is needed a new Curtis graduate comes inanother great technician with solid musicianship." And at Curtis the men not only studied their instruments but were trained in ensemble performance by the great oboist who sits in the center of the orchestra and who has much to do with its playing like "just one big string quartet." In other words, the orchestra is composed of musicians who "seem to feel the same way about the music all together," and therefore it "pulls together." Nor did my informant fail to give credit for all this to the one who created it: the men of the orchestra "were brought up under the convictions of Stokowski in his better days; and they stick by them."

And here I might add that when I recommended Winthrop Sargeant's artiele in Life it was for his description of Toscanini's way of working with an orchestra, written out of the knowledge and understanding that Sargeant acquired from playing in an orchestra with Toscanini; and that some other details in the article caused this column's raised eyebrows department to raise its eyebrows. The statement, for example, that Toscanini refines most of the vigor out of Brahms would cause me to suspect that Sargeant, after leaving the Philharmonic in 1930, did not hear much more of Toscanini's playing of Brahms, and therefore did not hear the performances that had been swift and sinuous acquire the breadth and weight and power they have had for years now.

Freedom for Lesser Breeds

Dear Sirs: Going through my papers from Puerto Rico, where I spent some time as a visiting professor, I found again the cablegram from New York that reached me on October 10: "Salvemini, Sturzo, and myself will speak October 12 in great Carnegie Hall meeting on Italian situation. Please cable message expressing your opinion on Italian Darlanism. (Signed) Pacciardi."

I cabled: "Consider me present with all three of you. One is the protest as one is the hope."

It was a message succinct enough not to clog the line. But it did not reach the addressee. Pacciardi, ten days later, surprised me with a letter expressing his and our friends' surprise at my inexplicable silence.

The Western Union and the cable office, I immediately ascertained, were guiltless. Instructed by experts on the insular situation, I applied to the censor in San Juan. "It is my firm conviction," I wrote, "that nothing in the message violated war-time or other regulations, while it is my assumption that in dubious cases the sender is usually advised by the censor's office and asked to withdraw or to modify the message. A kind explanation would be appreciated." The censor replied that his records showed "no interference on the part of cable censorship." "Any further communication on this subject, he added, "should be addressed to the Chief Cable Censor, Washington, D. C." I thereupon sent the documents to the Chief Censor with my question appended thereto.

He answered, on November 29, as follows: "Your letter of 17 November, 1943, is acknowledged. It is not the policy of this office to give any information concerning the ultimate disposition of international communications, since all messages are filed at the risk of the sender and may be stopped, delayed, or otherwise dealt with at the discretion of the censor without notice. We regret that we cannot be more helpful to you. (Signed) Charles S. Sullivan, Jr., by direction."

Charles S. Sullivan, and those who direct him, are herewith courteously requested to stop and listen. Communications between the Caribbean island and the American mainland can be called "international" only by virtue of a figure of speech whose boldness only advocates of Puerto Rican independence can adequately appraise. That island, at any rate, is a possession of the United States, not the private estate of a political clique. It is a naval and air base, serving a national and supernational cause, not a reserved ground whereon any Mr. Sullivan is entitled to build a sanctuary of mute conformism in favor of the particular passions and interests he personally prefers. The censor's right and duty is to interfere with communications affecting our military security and secrecy, not with such as may perturb Darlans, Badoglios, and their patrons in the State Department, If, for reasons other than strictly military, he tampers with the freedom of speech of Puerto Ricans and of Americans in Puerto Rico, he misuses a power that was not granted to him in order that the island we hold in trust may be degraded to a most un-American colonial status. Much, of course, is left to what he calls his "discretion"; but discretion, to put it mildly, is not synonymous with indiscretion. G. A. BORGESE

Lesson in Calumny

Dear Sirs: Recently Earl Browder, general secretary of the Communist Party in the United States, attacked me as an "ambiguous and sinister figure." Mr. Browder's speech, delivered in Cleveland on January 30, was made a page 1 story in the Daily Worker the next day. It has just come to my attention.

I came to the United States in the spring of 1943 at the joint invitation of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and was received again in January, 1944, by representatives of United States labor groups. After a visit to the International Labor Office in Montreal, I was the guest at a luncheon given by a joint- committee of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations in New York, where I also addressed the C. I. O. War Relief Committee. A few days later I spoke before the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor at a few days after my departure from the United States. He also charged me with having pleaded in Washington "the case of pro-Nazi conspiracy," by which he meant the recognition of the Bolivian Junta which had just seized power. He charged further that I had "for some time been the special protégé of the Adolph Berle group in the State Department and of Jack Herling, head of the labor section of Nelson Rockefeller's organization," "These gentlemen," added Mr. Browder, "built up Ibañez for the role of opposition to Vicente Lombardo Toledano, president of the Latin American Confederation of Labor.'

Mr. Browder delivered his attack

I have for a long time held the belief that the average man in the United States is guided by high moral standards. Generally, he is an honorable and truthful man. Unfortunately, there must be some exceptions; otherwise it could not be explained how Earl Browder-I presume he is the same Earl Browder in whose behalf I signed on several occasions petitions for his release from jail, addressed to President Rooseveltcould attack me in a long list of incorrect statements and calumnies.

I do not know what reasons this gentleman could have for insulting me, but he is guilty of a shameful lie when he states that I am a protégé of Messrs. Berle and Herling, that I have argued in favor of the recognition of the present Bolivian government, and that I wish to dislodge Lombardo Toledano from the presidency of the C. T. A. L. Not a single one of these statements is true; and they reveal Citizen Browder as a man devoid of any sense of responsibility and incapable of expressing a dispassionate opinion.

I have been a humble but consistent anti-fascist fighter from the time fascism and Nazism first appeared in the world as a reactionary and anti-labor menace. I was anti-Nazi both before and after June 22, 1941. I shall continue to be while I have the strength to fight for social progress and human freedom. Mr. Browder is surely not the person to give me lessons in this respect. BERNARDO IBANEZ

The Legion Carries On

Dear Sirs: The Legion's self-assumed task of expounding and guarding 'Americanism' in the schools of the United States stirred up a tempest in Colorado recently when Harry Bridges, president of the C. I. O. Longshoremen's Union, was invited to speak at the University of Colorado. The local Legion post and the state Legion commander, with the blessing of national headquarters, tried to prevent the meeting, but were bluntly told by Dr. R. G. Gustavson, acting president of the university, that the institution "will not be run by any one group, including the American Legion." Dr. Gustavson's forthright statement was probably prompted by the fact that the Legion had been meddling with the schools of several Colorado cities, the most recent activity being the ousting of the superintendent of the public schools of Boulder, which is the home of the university.

Such a rebuff took the breath out of the legionnaires for a moment; then Benjamin C. Hilliard, Jr., a Denver lawyer who was in Indianapolis as a Legion national executive committeeman, rushed back to Colorado as the "crusader" who was "going to tell the university president off." He turned the protest against Bridges into an attack on Dr. Gustavson's fitness as head of the state university. He was so taken up with the "crusade" that in his five-page "remonstrance and petition" he failed to mention the American Legion.

Harry Bridges addressed the students, as scheduled. The auditorium was packed to the roof, even though classes had not been dismissed. It was an enthusiastic audience, and a great demonstration of support for Dr. Gustavson and of interest in a labor leader. Later the students, as well as the faculty, offered resolutions approving the acting president's stand.

But it was not a clear victory for "Gus," as he is known on the campus. The notorious Denver Post called the invitation a "stupid act." The Board of Regents met to consider the situation. One of them, E. R. Campbell, a Denver lawyer, had already said in a letter to Trevor P. Thomas, state commander of the Legion, "Occasionally it seems that the faculty or students construe freedom of speech as a license to invite any jackass to come and bray." Another regent, known for his incoherent jingoistic pronouncements, declared, "In the last twenty years Colorado University has lost considerable prestige because of teaching communism." Talk to him, and you will learn that "Communists" occupy the White House and the Supreme Court. Such men did not fire Dr. Gustavson, but they did reprimand him and say the university was in error in inviting Bridges to address the students.

Mr. Bridges's inoffensive talk on national unity received hardly a line in the columns of publicity. Even Mr. Bridges limself was almost forgotten in the attack on the university. Surely Regent Campbell designated the wrong party in this fracas when he used the term "braying jackasses."

For a New Era

Dear Sirs: Mr. Willkie is right: "We must have a fiscal policy that squarely faces the economic realities." But a fiscal policy, however taxes may be simplified and adjusted, that does not provide a basic and general principle for the just distribution of the wealth created by "free enterprise" is not facing squarely the economic realities.

Our industrialists, peerless in creative endeavor and in efficiency, have large-scale enterprises in prospect which will furnish employment for perhaps a million men. Such enterprise is the main-spring of our domestic economy. But in spite of economic conflicts, nothing has been said about a just distribution of the wealth thus created, without which there is no promise of domestic peace and security. Even the foremost advocate of economic liberty, J. S. Mill, foresaw the unreliability of the free play of economic forces in bringing about a just distribution of wealth.

Again and again we have been told that our economic salvation lies in a return to "free enterprise." But no attempt has been made to reinterpret "free enterprise" consonant with the progressive life of today and tomorrow. On the one hand "free enterprise" has created fabulous wealth for a few; and on the extreme other hand it has created an economy of enslavement from which a vast number cannot, unassisted, extricate themselves. In this age that is not good enough. This is looking economic realities squarely in the face.

The continuation of the capitalist system and permanent peace everywhere depend upon such modification of "free enterprise" as will bring order out of chaos, gradually mitigate inequalities, and establish justice and security for all.

In order to establish a basic, universal formula for the economy of "free enterprise" I propose that the President delegate the Secretary of Commerce to appoint a fully representative commission whose sole duty shall be to determine: (1) the ratio of profit justly due an employee as compared with an equally just ratio of profit due the employer or owner; (2) the ratio between profit and cost of production which in justice may be asked of the consumer for goods, services, or rentals; (3) recommendations for publishing these ratios and for appropriate legislation to make them effective in the economy of "free enterprise." These recommendations to be sent to the Secretary of Commerce and to Congress at the same time.

If power politics can be subordinated to more vital values and these ratios accepted as a general principle of our economy, a new era in the democratic way of life will have evolved with fair promise of justice, prosperity, and security for all.

The Shape of Things

IN THE PAST WEEK THE RED ARMY HAS cleared southern Russia of the enemy in a series of unparalleled victories. Unexpectedly, the Germans made no effort to hold Odessa, although, as the Russians showed in 1941, the city is well located for a stubborn defense. They apparently succeeded, however, in evacuating a considerable part of its garrison. The Nazi forces in the Crimea were less fortunate. Their long respite since the Red Army's advance bottled them up in this peninsula last November had, perhaps, made them overconfident. At any rate they were staggered when two Soviet armies struck simultaneously from the north and the east and their retreat became a rout in which a huge number of prisoners fell into Russian hands. When these victories are consolidated the Red Army will be in position to carry the war into the heart of Rumania. The Ploesti oilfields, now some 170 miles behind the front, are a natural objective which, it must be assumed, the Germans will defend desperately since they are the source of one-third or more of their petroleum supplies. In the West, preparations for "D-day" continue and there have been suggestions that it may not be far in the future. One significant development is the increased attention which Allied bombers are giving to the German airfields and the railroads leading to the invasion coast, These facilities must be largely put out of commission before General Eisenhower's forces can cross the Channel. and the job requires a huge tonnage of bombs since there are hundreds of Nazi air bases as well as a very complex communications system to be dealt with. Progress is being made, however, and the scale of the Anglo-American air offensive is ever increasing,

THE INAUGURATION OF A TOUGH POLICY toward neutral nations that are in any sense assisting the Axis was announced by Mr. Hull in his latest speech. Hitherto, he said, the power of the United Nations to influence neutral behavior had been limited. While we were moving from relative weakness to strength we could remind them that their very existence depended on a democratic victory; we could not ask them to expose themselves to certain destruction. But now that victory is assured, we have, the Secretary of State asserted, the right and duty to insist that the few countries fortunate enough to be at peace do not prolong the conflict by giving material aid to the enemy or by affording facilities for his spies and propaganda agents. Chief among the countries referred to are Spain, Argentina, Portugal, Eire, Turkey, and Sweden. We do not need to remind our readers that the first two of these have been consistently "neutral against us," and that even now, when their hopes of an Axis victory are fast fading, they are throwing as much sand into the machinery of the United Nations as they dare. For geographical reasons Argentina's aid to Germany may be chiefly ideological; Spain, in addition, affords it invaluable minerals and harbors innumerable spies, including a nest at Tangier that Britain is particularly anxious to clean up. We shall, however, get little response from Spain unless we are prepared to follow tough talk with rough action. A good start might be made by recalling our Ambassador to Madrid, Carlton Hayes, who seems far too anxious to shield Franco from the facts of life.

THE REFUSAL OF THE ALLIED AUTHORITIES to lift a hand to prevent the forced retirement of their protégé, General Giraud, is the most convincing sign so far that their policy toward General De Gaulle and the Committee of National Liberation has been modified if not reversed. Mr. Hull's promise that the United States would permit the committee to exercise administrative functions in France under the supervision of General Eisenhower left open several convenient loopholes. One of them was his explicit refusal to recognize the De Gaulle committee even as a provisional government. In the light of Mr. Roosevelt's comment-made two days earlier but after he had seen the Hull statement—that nobody knew what sort of government the French people wanted, this refusal was obviously intended to leave Eisenhower the option of dealing with other political forces if he saw fit. This loophole still remains open. But events of the past week indicate that De Gaulle will at least be given a chance to develop his policies and build his government without the constant interference he has suffered until now. General Giraud has been counted out by his erstwhile backers, and no new contender has been pushed into the ring. An Associated Press dispatch from London reports that an agreement between Britain and the United States, "now in the final stages of negotiation," empowers General Eisenhower to deal with the Committee of National Liberation as civil administrators of France and rules out all relations with Vichy, but specifically provides that the Commander-in-Chief shall be "free to deal separately with any resistance group which is disinclined to associate itself with De Gaulle." This seems to indicate the degree to which the Allies have shifted their position. Still more reassuring would be confirmation of a CBS report that Eisenhower has invited De Gaulle to London to discuss invasion problems.

WILLKIE'S DEATH AS A PRESIDENTIAL aspirant does not leave him entirely without influence for he has yet to make a will. With several would-be heirs hopefully eyeing his political estate he can afford to sit back for a while and observe their behavior. Stassen, perhaps, would be the most logical legatee, but there is a good deal of evidence that Willkie is resentful about the Minnesotan's entry into the Wisconsin contest. Moreover, while Stassen's followers insist that they are not climbing on anybody's band-wagon, there is a natural suspicion that they might eventually be willing to make 1 deal on the basis of the second place for their man. A Dewey-Stassen ticket would have that nice balance which appeals to the professional politician. Meanwhile Governor Bricker's hopes seem to have been revived by the Wisconsin results. If there is to be a stop-Dewey movement, it might well form about him. But such a movement would have to draw strength from both the internationalist and the nationalist wings of the party. Thus Bricker, while making goo-goo eyes in the direction of Willkie, is rushing around the country talking about the importance of hanging on to overseas bases. The Dewey machine, for all its prophecies of victory on the first ballot, is not yet strong enough to ignore the benefits which would accrue from Willkie's blessing. Roland Marvin, one of the two or three New York delegates pledged to Willkie, jumped hastily on the Dewey band-wagon and was assigned immediately to sound out the 1940 candidate. He seems, however, to have met with a discouraging reception. Mr. Willkie evidently is in no mood to respond to the flattery of appeals to be "regular." Before he commits himself to any candidate he wants to know to what policy that candidate is himself committed.

THE DRAFT SITUATION WAS ONCE AGAIN thrown into confusion by the order suspending the induction of virtually all men over twenty-six. While subsequent directives clarifying the order have enabled draft boards to settle down to the task of finding enough young men to meet their quotas, the Selective Service System had a few bad days in which no two boards seemed to interpret the order in the same way. The result of all of this has been a new outcropping of complaints and criticism of our selective service policies. The New York Daily News speaks of "cockeyed draft management," while the New York Post complains of "our stumbling Selective Service." There is much justice in these complaints, particularly as they apply to the suddenness of the changes in policy. On one day the government tells a twenty-seven-year-old father in a moderately important job that he is desperately needed in the army; the next day-after he has given up his job-he is told he is not wanted at all. Yet apart from the inconvenience caused by sudden shifts, there is much merit in the decision to take as many men as possible in the eighteento-twenty-five age group before drafting men over twentysix. It is a decision which probably should have been made many months ago; it is particularly defensible at a moment when the army has reached full strength.

THREE IMPORTANT LABOR DECISIONS WERE handed down by the Supreme Court last week. In the Pollock case the court held unconstitutional a Florida statute which makes it prima facie evidence of fraud to obtain money in advance for work and then fail to perform it. The law is an elaborate device for evading past Supreme Court decisions against debt-peonage laws. The same result was sought by sentencing men, usually Negroes, to forced labor for fraud instead of debt. The decision cancels a sixty-day prison sentence imposed on an illiterate Negro worker who was to pay off the debt by forced labor at less than nine cents a day. In the other two decisions the court strengthened the position of unions under the Wagner Act. In the Medo Supply Company case the court held that once wage negotiations have begun, an employer cannot disrupt a union by granting a "voluntary" pay increase. In the Frank Brothers case, the court confronted a situation in which a union, in the nine months between the filing of charges with the NLRB and the issuance of the NLRB complaint, lost members and no longer had a majority. On this ground the employer thereupon refused to bargain with the union. "A requirement that union membership be kept intact during delays incident to hearings," the court held through Justice Black, "would result in permitting employers to profit from their own refusal to bargain."

IF EVER A BREACH OF THE NON-STRIKE agreement appears justified, it is in the case of the employees of Montgomery Ward's Chicago branch. Shortly before the expiration of a contract with Local 20 of the United Mail Order, Warehouse, and Retail Employees Union, C. I. O., the company notified the union that they would not negotiate a new contract. The matter came before the War Labor Board, which ordered the company to extend the contract. Ward's then refused the WLB order, contending that the union no longer represented a majority of employees and that the WLB could not compel employers to sign closed-shop or maintenance-ofmembership agreements. The company's defiance of the board precipitated a strike in the Chicago plant and the War Labor Board has referred the matter to the White House. It is to be hoped that the President will support the WLB with the same firmness that he showed on previous occasions on this same issue. The prolonged war between Montgomery Ward, led by Sewell Avery, and Local 20, supported by the War Labor Board, will be discussed in detail in an article to appear in next week's Nation.

Price Control Works

PRICE ADMINISTRATOR BOWLES was in an extremely strong position when he appeared before the House Banking Committee last week to ask for a continuance of the Price Control Act in substantially its present form. He did not have to argue, as his predecessors have had to, that price control would save the country from a disastrous inflation. He could show that the OPA had stopped the vicious cycle of rising prices, that the line had been held for a solid year. His appeal did not rest on economic theory but on the facts that are there for all to see. A year ago the cost of living was rising at the rate of ¾ of 1 per cent a month. Despite lack of Congressional cooperation in the full price-control program and despite constant attacks from some diehard business groups, this rise has been completely halted.

Unfortunately, this victory has not prevented various groups on both the right and the left from sniping at the OPA. Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O., flatly challenged the report of the stabilization authorities and repeated his previous assertion that the cost of living had advanced 431/2 per cent instead of the 231/2 per cent shown by the official reports of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. An analysis of the C. I. O. cost-of-living report shows, however, that it includes such items as taxes, warbond purchases, and black-market purchases-none of which properly belong in a cost-of-living index. The analysis also reveals that many of the items selected for comparison were, strictly speaking, not comparable. And it is interesting to note that even the critics of the BLS index do not contend that the cost of living is still rising at breakneck speed. They implicitly admit that stabilization has been achieved by their use of the same figures month after month.

The C. I. O. attack on the accuracy of the official costof-living statistics is harmful chiefly because it has undermined public appreciation of the OPA's accomplishments. The C. I. O. does not want to undermine the OPA; it would like to see the Price Control Act strengthened. But in denying the eeffctiveness of OPA it is playing into the hands of a small but powerful group of business men and politicians who are determined to wreck the stabilization program by one means or another. The latest and most insidious attack on the program from this group may be found in a series of recommendations drafted by the Smith committee of the House. This committee has proposed three innocentsounding amendments to the Price Control Act which, it alleges, would alleviate hardships. They are: (1) permitting appeals from OPA regulations to the federal district courts; (2) placing the control of the price of foodstuffs, rubber, petroleum, and other products in the hands of the agencies concerned with their production; and (3) by striking out the word "generally" before the phrase "fair and equitable," compelling the OPA to fix a price profitable to all elements in an industry.

Adoption of any one of these three amendments would hamstring the OPA's efforts and threaten a complete breakdown of the stabilization program. If, for instance, the ninety-three federal courts were given jurisdiction over appeals from OPA rulings in place of the present Emergency Court of Appeals, great confusion would inevitably arise from conflicting decisions, and the entire program might be held up pending Supreme Court settlement. Placing price control in the hands of the agencies responsible for war production is wholly illogical, for if but one of the agencies fell down on the job a general retreat on the price front would become necessary. Experience has shown that the line must be held at every point if it is to be held at all. Most dangerous of all is the proposal that would force the OPA to set prices guaranteeing profits to every business, however incompetent its management might be. Such a proposal, as Mr. Bowles points out, would not only mean huge profits for the more efficient business units but would undermine the foundations of the system of private enterprise. The most effective answer to all these proposals is to be found in the success of the present law. We should permit no one to tamper with it.

Hull and Italy

Secretary Hull's radio speech on April 10 "met squarely the principal criticisms recently leveled at the Administration's foreign policy." But we are ready to acknowledge that, in some respects, it provided a more satisfying meal than has been spread by the State Department for some time past. The references to the French situation were welcome and were accepted by the De Gaullists, hungry for a friendly word, as a veritable bonne bouche. As we point out on an earlier page, the pressure of events has forced the State Department to change its tune in regard to France.

The Secretary's approach to the Italian problem was even more hesitant. He recalled the declaration of Moscow, made jointly by the United States, Russia, and Britain, promising the democratization of the Italian government, the removal of all Fascist and pro-Fascist elements from the administration, and the creation of democratic organs of local government. Declaring that this policy is being carried out, he added naively: "Only that part which calls for the introduction into the central government of more democratic elements has not yet been put into effect." And he explained this omission by asserting that a change of regime might have prejudiced the military situation.

The latest reports from Italy hardly confirm Mr. Hull's optimistic suggestion that the purge of Fascists has been successfully completed. At a meeting of the Allied Control Commission on April 14, Lieutenant Colonel G. H. McCaffrey, who has been regional commissioner for a large district in Southern Italy, reported that local governments were ridden with "grafting and looting" and that "various ministers are putting back the people we fire on the payroll." Some other officers attending the same meeting were more encouraging, but it is plain that cleansing "free" Italy is proving an uphill task.

Nor could this well be otherwise so long as the Italian government itself is largely composed of men who were loyal to Mussolini until the Fascist ship showed unmistakable signs of foundering. The real cause of delay in implementing the Moscow Declaration seems to be a reluctance to deal with the Fascist infection at its chief center in southern Italy-the House of Savoy. Instead of putting pressure on the King to eliminate himself, Allied policy has been to push the democratic parties into backing the king. And, unhappily, since Stalin indorsed them, these tactics have been succeeding. Emmanuel has now announced his decision to withdraw from the throne as soon as Rome is recaptured. But as he intends to leave his son, Prince Humbert, who has been just as fully associated with Fascism, to exercise his powers with the title of "Lieutenant General of the. Realm," this gesture is one of those changes which mean more of the same thing.

It has served, however, to split the junta composed of the six opposition parties which hitherto had presented an unbroken front against the House of Savoy. Inspired by the Communists, who several weeks ago indicated their willingness to waive their opposition to the monarchy until after the war, this body has agreed to share in the formation of a new government headed by Badoglio. Besides the Communists, the Christian Democrats, the Liberals, and the Democracy of Labor voted for this step. The Socialists abstained, and the Action Party formed a minority of one, refusing to pretend that there had been any change in the situation justifying a reversal of its position.

In his speech Mr. Hull foreshadowed this development with complacent approval. How, we wonder, does he reconcile it with the statement that "there can be no compromise with Fascism and Nazism"? Does he regard Emmanuel and Badoglio as untainted by Fascism? If so, we can only conclude that any Fascist who take the trouble to disguise himself with a handful of anti-Axis wool will be able to fool the State Department into believing him a democratic sheep. Giving Mr. Hull full credit for good intentions, his qualifications as a shepherd, charged with gathering the nations back into the democratic fold, are dubious, to say the least.

Return from Mexico

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THERE had been a gap of ten years in my Mexican experience. My last two visits in 1939 and 1940 had been too short and too near the end of the Spanish War to make it possible for me to absorb fully the fascinating process of evolution in a country of such vigorous personality. This time I went to Mexico determined to find out what was going on, especially how much truth and how much exaggeration there was in the stories that Mexico, under the present administration, had reversed its historic revolutionary trend.

The official purpose of my visit was not difficult to accomplish. It was to gain the support and cooperation of the Mexican government for a plan for the rescue of refugees, elaborated by the Free World Association together with other humanitarian organizations. The unhesitating agreement of the authorities in this matter was in itself an encouraging indication of Mexico's general mood. Reactionary tendencies and a warm readiness to welcome the victims of international reaction are not characteristics that match. A few days after my arrival this favorable impression was fully confirmed by an interview with President Avila Camacho.

On the morning that I was received by the President the notion that a few weeks later an attempt would be made on his life could never have crossed my mind. And yet when I read the news in New York I could easily reconstruct the incident, to its smallest detail. I could see the great square flanked by the palace and the cathedral and hear the gay sound of the bugle announcing the entrance of the President. I could see the antechamber crowded with officials and visitors waiting for an audience. And I could see Avila Camacho, solid and powerful, holding the assassin immobile until the guards took him into custody. Especially I could hear his quiet voice questioning the young man about the motive of the attack. Equanimity and calmness are the hallmarks of the Mexican President's character.

Avila Camacho's response to my request was instantaneous. He feels legitimate pride in Mexico's attitude toward refugees. No other country has, in this respect, a more admirable record. It is not the Spanish Republicans alone who have found in Mexico something much more important than shelter. Anti-fascists from everywhere have been received there, not only to be tolerated and given a chance to survive, but to carry on the fight for freedom. My interview with the President was excellent. He gave me an immediate sense of the political atmosphere of the country and provided an invaluable prologue to the full story of Mexico as it unfolded in the remaining weeks of my visit.

But the fact that the general political situation in Mexico is different from what some recent reports have indicated does not mean that reaction is non-existent or that progressive forces are not obliged to face the same problems as everywhere else. To begin with, I should mention one of the disturbing factors: the widespread discouragement with the way in which the war has been waged in the political field. If I choose that as my first point, I do so because on my return from Mexico I found some of my American friends in the same gloomy frame of mind.

The immediate reason for this discouragement is of secondary importance. It may have been caused by the recognition of Badoglio or by Willkie's retreat from the Presidential contest after the victory of reactionary elements in Wisconsin. It doesn't matter. What really matters is the loss of confidence resulting from the policy of the United Nations. The number of people who no longer believe a single word of official speeches and statements is increasing with alarming speed. They have seen how Darlanism followed close upon the speech proclaiming the Four Freedoms; how, in spite of the Atlantic Charter, the people of Spain, who are 90 per cent pro-Allied and anti-Franco, have been pushed aside, while Franco has been courted in the most disgraceful fashion. They have seen how this war for democracy has strengthened certain dictatorships in Spanish America, thanks to the financial and political support of the Allies. They have seen what has been done in Italy and what would be done everywhere else in Europe if certain officials in the various foreign offices had the last word.

After all, we cannot be surprised at their skepticism. The same attitude has inspired every independent columnist and radio commentator, here and in England, for the last two years. The same sentiments have been expressed week after week in The Nation. We have insisted that the lack of a clear, straight, democratic line in the conduct of the war and the delay in creating a Council of the United Nations must inevitably lead to confusion and disillusionment.

We can easily understand the state of mind of our Mexican friends and other people of the Western Hemissphere. But disbelief in the official policy of the Allies does not justify the defeatism into which a large section of the left is falling. That reaction has become aggressive and insolent, that it has everywhere taken advantage of the absence of vigorous democratic direction in the war, is perfectly true. But it is not true that reaction has won, or that it must necessarily win. We have with us still the majority of the people of the earth. There are still the movements of resistance in Europe, ready to destroy in the final round every Badoglio whom the governments of the United Nations try to foist upon them. There are still the people of Asia, for whom the war has been a signal for a revolutionary awakening.

There are still the people of Latin America, waiting for the day of victory to throw out their little dictators, no matter how respectable they have become by virtue of the honorary degrees bestowed upon them by American universities.

Mexican democrats in particular have no excuse for pessimism. It was their firm stand which only recently brought to a dead stop the reactionary forces in Mexico, just when those forces thought they saw a clear road ahead. In every country, Mexico and the United States not excepted, the people in overwhelming numbers want a better world and are willing to fight for it. No one on the left, no matter how depressing the present political scene may be, has the right to desert them.

[Beginning in an early issue, The Nation will publish several articles on Mexico by Mr. del Vayo.]

MacArthur's Political Foray

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 14

ONGRESS is back, in a more cantankerous mood than ever, and there is ample indication that it will spend even more of its time than before in baiting the President. The first stink bomb of the renewed session was the release of the Miller-MacArthur correspondence, but except in the Patterson-Hearst-McCormick press this is more likely to help Mr. Roosevelt than to hurt him. Some here are jubilant, thinking the letters will ruin MacArthur, but they may be rating popular intelligence too high. The letters show the Allied commander-in-chief in the Southwest Pacific in a very unsoldierly posture—disloyal to his commander-in-chief and a rather pompous and ignorant ass.

General MacArthur has as much right as anyone else to oppose the New Deal, but he would be in a better position if those letters contained at least one expression disassociating himself as a soldier from Representative Miller's extremely intemperate partisanship. Miller's letters are those of a fanatic to whom only one war has any meaning—the war against the New Deal and the President at home. In one letter he expresses the certainty "that unless this New Deal can be stopped this time, our American way of life is forever doomed." Representative Miller seems not at all aroused about that man in Berlin. The only reference to the Axis is the remark in passing that by the time of the election "the war with Germany and Italy may well be over." This is the letter which General MacArthur describes as "complete wisdom and statesmanship," with which "I do unreservedly agree." A general who agrees with Representative Miller is too unreliable politically to be intrusted with command, for Miller obviously believes that the great menace to America is at home and not abroad. If the situation were truly that painted by the Representative, it might be General MacArthur's duty to move his troops on Washington rather than Tokyo. There are some rightists who feel just that way. And they will be encouraged by General MacArthur's reference, in his letter of reply, to the "sinister drama of our present chaos and confusion." The "sinister" would seem to imply that there is something intentional and malevolent in the "present chaos and confusion."

Expressions of this kind from a commanding officer in time of war seem well beyond the limits of propriety. The General's not too subtle hint in his second letter, "I will be glad when more substantial forces are placed at my disposition," would seem an equally improper attempt to lobby in Congress against the military decisions of his superiors. An honorable and self-respecting soldier, however violent his disagreement with his superiors in time of war, should feel too proud to stoop to political intrigue and back-scratching.

It is significant that Representative Miller does not use the word fascism or Nazism. His second letter speaks of "the wave of communism and nationalism which seems bound to engulf the European countries, Asia, and South America," and identifies it with the "monarchy" being established at home by "left-wingers and New Dealism." This is the talk and the mood Goebbels would like to spread if he could as the basis for a negotiated peace in the West, but it evoked no reprimand, not even a gentle one, from MacArthur. It was this letter which the General described as "scholarly" and as "calculated to arouse the thoughtful consideration of every true patriot." General MacArthur modestly compares himself to Lincoln. The correspondence bears a stronger resemblance to the activities of the Copperheads.

Not much is known here of Representative Miller. He is a first-termer, and the MacArthur correspondence brings him for the first time into the headlines. He is a Republican from Kimball, Nebraska. He was graduated from a local high school and from Loyola Medical College in Chicago, and has practiced medicine and surgery in Kimball County since August, 1919. He was elected mayor of Kimball in 1933 and a member of the Nebraska unicameral legislature in 1937. He was state health director in 1941-42, just before his election to Congress. He lists among his past eminences the state governorship of the Lions Clubs (1931) and the presidency of the State Medical Association (1939). He is a fellow of the American College of Surgeons, a Methodist, a Mason, an Elk, and a member of the Knights of Pythias. He owns many farms in western Nebraska.

Representative Miller's record in Congress is, with one exception, exactly what one would expect. The exception is that he voted for the Fulbright resolution. The fact that a man of Miller's obviously isolationist views voted for this internationalist resolution indicates how little reliance may be placed upon it as a serious expression of Congressional attitudes, for Miller even voted against so mild, though concrete, an example of international cooperation as the extension of Mr. Hull's reciprocal-tradeagreements act. Miller has been a staunch supporter of Dies, Smith, Hobbs, and other reactionary Democrats and a consistent opponent of consumer subsidies, OPA, and other measures designed to hold down living costs. He voted for all anti-labor measures, for a mandatory increase in oil prices, and for abolition of the domestic branch of the OWI. He was not recorded on the polltax bill, but he showed up in support of Rankin's successful fight against votes for soldiers. The record provides a fairly typical portrait of a MacArthur admirer.

The MacArthur lieutenants here and in New York are encouraged by the half-million votes cast for him in the Illinois Republican primaries. But the more detailed reports beginning to arrive make it far from certain that the combined isolationist and crypto-fascist vote can carry Illinois in November. MacArthur, unopposed, polled 76 per cent of the Republican vote last Tuesday, but Dewey, unopposed, polled 86 per cent of the Republican vote in the Illinois primaries four years ago. In primaries free from any major contests the Democrats polled almost as many votes as and in one case more than were cast in the bitterly contested Republican primaries. Most significant of all was the vote cast in the primaries for nomination of Congressman-at-large.

The successful Republican nominee was Stephen Day, the Congressman who before Pearl Harbor was an associate of George Sylvester Viereck, the convicted Nazi agent. Day had the support of the Green political machine in Illinois and was renominated by it, but he ran far behind the rest of the machine ticket. The machine delivered some 560,000 votes for Governor Green but less than 400,000 for Day. Mrs. Emily Taft Douglas, who will oppose Day in November, polled almost 440,000 votes in the Democratic primaries, where there was no contest. The vote for Mrs. Douglas was not much less than the combined vote on the Republican side. Day ran far behind his ticket in the 1942 general elections and seems to be the weakest spot on the ticket again this year. The facts available here make Dewey look like a better Republican candidate than MacArthur in Illinois and the President a better bet in that state than either. Since Illinois Republicanism may be regarded as the stronghold of our contemporary "Copperheads," that doesn't speak too well for MacArthur's political pulling power elsewhere.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

T IS HARD TO FIX attention upon the activities of the peace conference while the whirlwind approaches across Europe. But it is worth recalling occasionally, as new governments arise and new revolutionary alliances are formed, that a group of elderly gentlemen in frock coats are still at Paris playing the old game of empire. While they arrange frontiers, the frontiers dissolve; while they talk of a League of Nations, half of Europe makes its own league of revolutionary peoples. Shall they fight or placate these new forces, starve or feed them, turn to the right or to the left? They do not know.—April 5, 1919.

PERHAPS THE MOST SINISTER STORY that has come out of the Seattle strike is the account of the work of the "Minute Men" told in detail by Kenneth Macgowan in the New York Tribune. Formed during the war to make patriotism compulsory in Washington, the Minute Men developed a highly organized spy system, based, according to the statement of its chief, on the German system of domestic espionage.—April 5, 1919.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA IS NOW taking shape as a nation. . . . No agreement has been arrived at with the 3,000,000 Germans living along the northern rim of Bohemia. . . . Instead, the flame of race hatred has been fanned by both sides. . . . Germany will now have a handle for the economic and political invasion of Czechoslovakia.—HENRY G. ALSBERG, April 5, 1919.

IT WOULD SEEM as though nothing could withstand the systematic and relentless efforts of Japanese imperialism to wipe out Korea as a moral fact.—April 12, 1919.

IT MAY BE SAFE to assume that the nationalist tremors that have lately been agitating certain Senators in regard to the future sovereignty and proud isolation of the United States will be laid at rest by the recent cabled revisions to the League of Nations Covenant. . With [the] simple requirement of unanimity among all nations, including those involved in a dispute, other articles of the Covenant providing for arbitration and adjudication of questions of international controversy seem hardly necessary.—April 19, 1919.

NEWS OF THE REVOLT of American troops at Archangel comes like a sudden squall to fray out still farther the fag-ends of our Russian policy. . . . ### Masquerade in Budapest

BY ROBERT PARKER

In THE fall of 1940 the German army moved in force into Hungary. Nazi officers went into telephone, telegraph, and commercial-radio offices. German soldiers patrolled railroads and bridges. Censors from Berlin established themselves in the Budapest post office. The Luftwaffe took over the airfields. Adolf Hitler was preparing for his attack on Russia, and thirty trainloads of German troops rolled daily through Hungary into Rumania and up to the Prut River, which formed the Soviet border. All these steps were reported by the American correspondents in Budapest, of whom I was one. Presumably the American legation told the State Department what was going on; at any rate it knew, for the American military attaché was arrested for watching German troop trains puff through Budapest.

Now, suddenly, three and a half years later, we are told that Hungary has been "occupied" by the Wehrmacht. Cordell Hull speaks of a "dastardly act." The usually well-informed Elmer Davis, in a letter to the Washington Post, calls the occupation the Führrer's "latest act of cannibalism," adding, "It is possible that Hitler found it necessary to occupy Hungary by force, violence, and fraud instead of by consent simply because the Hungarians . . . saw so clearly that Hitlerism was doomed."

Most Hungarians, including Regent Admiral Horthy and his gang, have known for years that Hitlerism was doomed. The late Count Paul Teleki caused a book to be published during his premiership showing that Germany couldn't win. Admiral Horthy told me in an interview before war broke out that the Nazis were licked before they started. The plain truth is that Hungary was occupied by Germany in the fall of 1940. It wasn't accomplished by "force, violence, and fraud"; it was done with the full agreement of Admiral Horthy and the Hungarian government. What has happened recently is only a further degree of occupation. The difference is that Horthy and his crew are now starting a long-planned campaign to try to convince the Allies that their hearts are in the right place after all. The amiable Tibor Eckhardt was sent to this country nearly three years ago to prepare the way.

To understand the situation we must take a look at basic Hungarian policy. Since Bela Kun's Communist regime was driven out of Budapest in 1919—incidentally, with the invaluble aid of the victorious Allies of World War I—Magyar policy, under Horthy's control, has been entirely devoted to the recovery of lost territories. The slogan Nem, nem, soha (No, no never) that was applied to the Trianon treaty's transfer of land to Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Rumania became the watchword of every Magyar government. National Socialism is, of course, anathema to Horthy and his reactionary followers. For them the rise of Nazism in Germany meant the ascendancy of the gutter element, with Adolf Hitler the chief guttersnipe. But at the same time the Führer represented the dynamic force in Europe, the force that could and would change frontiers. Horthy and his friends swallowed their pride, held their noses, and joined the Nazis in the belief that Hitler would give them back their lost territories.

After Munich Hungary did in fact recover a strip of land on its northern frontier from a prostrate Czechoslovakia. In March, 1939, it gobbled up Ruthenia, with Hitler's blessing. Next it demanded Transylvania, and in its acquisition of the northern part of this province lies the explanation of the "occupation" Secretary Hull now so vehemently deplores.

When Hitler prepared to attack Russia, he had to secure the Carpathian Mountains as a bulwark against a possible Russian attack before the Wehrmacht could launch its own. Believing that Rumania could not be depended upon to defend the mountain passes, he determined to detach northern Transylvania from Rumania and give it to Hungary, whose army officers were solidly pro-German and anti-Russian. All during the summer of 1940, therefore, Hungary was encouraged to scream for the return of Transylvania, which had been part of the Hungarian kingdom before 1918. When Budapest and Bucharest were sufficiently excited, Hitler haled the heads of the two governments to Vienna and forced Rumania to relinquish northern Transylvania.

It was no secret in Budapest that Hungary paid a stiff price. Horthy put his country's railways and munitions factories at Germany's disposal and promised to defend the Carpathians, with the Germans, against the Russians if there was need. That need has now arisen, and Hitler has moved his soldiers into Hungarian Transylvania to try to hold the passes against the victorious Red Army. The Horthy regime, however, chooses to forget its bargain of 1940, for Horthy's followers have told him it is time to adopt the Darlan-Victor-Emmanuel-Badoglio strategy. Hence the screams of "occupation." It's a convenient excuse and can be made to look genuine.

That Hungary would try to whitewash itself has been apparent for a long time. A Hungarian cabinet minister was very frank about it in Istanbul last summer. He said Hungary had recovered "sufficient" territory from Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Rumania. Now the question was how to make peace with the Allies. The first actual step, taken early this year, was an attempt to pacify the Yugoslavs lest they jump on Hungary's back at a later date. For there is still one item left on the Horthy program—get the rest of Transylvania from Rumania.

The attempt to pacify Yugoslavia has not proved very successful, chiefly because the Yugoslavs are not a people who quickly forget broken pledges—or such an incident as the massacre of fifteen hundred Serbian men, women, and children by Hungarian soldiery. This occurred in the winter of 1941-42, when Hungarian troops occupied the Serbian town of Subotica despite a year-old treaty of perpetual friendship between Yugoslavia and Hungary. One day the Magyar troops, obedient to orders, murdered a large part of the town's population. The Budapest government did nothing for two years. Then, early this year, when it became apparent that the time had come to make amends, it announced that the commanding officers at Subotica were to be tried by courts-martial for the "unfortunate incidents." In typical Magyar fashion, however, it failed to carry the affair through, and soon announced that the guilty officers had "successfully fled to Germany." Anyway, said Hungarian diplomats in neutral countries, the Serbs would know Budapest was very sorry.

The next step of the Horthy government was to send as new envoys to the neutral European countries men who had close ties with Englishmen and Americans. For example, a former chief of the Foreign Office press bureau who had an English wife and was personally a charming man became minister in Stockholm. He could be relied upon to put out the right stories at the right time. The first news of the "occupation" of Hungary came from these Hungarian legations in neutral countries. We have no other way of knowing what is going on inside Hungary.

The reports were somewhat astonishing, to put it mildly. Some said that "German parachutists fluttered down in the dark on Budapest"; others that "troops in transit to Rumania broke the seals on their coaches." Earlier, however, I had watched hundreds of troop trains roll through Budapest, and not one was ever sealed.

THE CARE OF DOVES

Usually the Nazis got out and spent the day walking around the city before proceeding on their journey. The government of Premier Kallay was superseded by one headed by a certain Doeme Sztojay, described as Hungarian minister in Berlin. Mysteriously, Sztojay became a field marshal overnight. There was no attempt to hide the fact that he and his Cabinet were legally sworn in by Admiral Horthy.

These events received immediate attention in Washington. Mr. Hull called on Hungary to fight Germany. An Associated Press dispatch said the appeal implied that if Hungary did so it would get better treatment at the peace table. The dispatch said further that "the American action carried with it an implicit promise that Hungarian resistance would earn the respect and friendship of the United States, which in victory would look more favorably on the status of Hungary despite its voluntary alliance with Hitler up to the moment of occupation."

You can be sure the Horthy government will now "resist" to the best of its ability. Of course, not much can be expected of it, since it was taken by surprise and the country has now been "occupied"! But its intentions, Washington can rest assured, are of the best—especially since "the respect and friendship of the United States" are promised in return. Above all else, Budapest wants the United States to "look more favorably on the status of Hungary" at the peace table. For there's still that one unfinished piece of business.

Hungarian diplomats with whom I talked in Istanbul were exceedingly frank about it. "Obviously," they said, "Transylvania must belong to either Rumania or Hungary. The two countries are equally guilty of having joined the Axis and having fought Russia. Both declared war on Great Britain and the United States. When the peace conference meets, the question will be which of the two countries is least guilty." They thought they could prove that Hungary was the lesser sinner. The first reports from Horthy's legations in the neutral countries said Rumanian troops helped the Germans to occupy Hungary. But the Rumanian legation in Ankara was quick on the trigger, too. It announced that Rumania had been "occupied" at the same moment as Hungary.

Votes for Negroes?

BY STANLEY H. LOWELL

THE recent decision of the United States Supreme Court (Smith v. Allright) invalidating the resolution of the Texas state Democratic convention that only "white citizens" should be permitted to vote in the primary was a triumph for progressive democracy. Yet it is imperative that the enthusiasm of liberals be tempered by a full realization of Southern tenacity where the Negro vote is concerned. Primarily, it is important to understand that the court did not establish or make any pretense of establishing a new constitutional principle. Justice Reed carefully pointed out that the court felt it had erred only in its former application of a previously extracted principle.

Suit was brought in 1942 by a Negro, Lonnie Smith, against two election judges who had refused him a ballot in the Texas Democratic primary which was to choose nominees for federal offices. The refusal was based solely on the race and color of the potential voter. The election judges were acting in conformity with a resolution of the state convention of the Democratic Party which restricted membership in the party and participation in its deliberations to "white citizens" otherwise qualified, The court held this resolution of the convention to be the action of an agency of the state of Texas. As such it was "state action" and came within the proscription of the Fifteenth Amendment, which provides that the right of citizens to vote "shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

If the discrimination had been the result of "private" action, it would not have been within the purview of this command of the Constitution. The court, therefore, thoroughly examined the primary system in Texas and decided that the state statutes made the party, which is required to follow the legislative enactments, an agency of the state.

Earlier in the opinion the court reaffirmed the postulate established by United States v. Classic (1941) that the protection of the Constitution extended to the right to vote in a primary involving the choice of federal officials, "where the primary is by law an integral part of the election machinery."

The legal solidity of the decision appears unquestionable. That the state of Texas was acting through the Democratic Party seems self-evident. The bitter battle which preceded this decision makes clear the state's studied intent to disfranchise its Negro citizens. Though continually forced into more devious methods, the state never abandoned its primary objective—the elimination of Negro electors.

One is struck by the peculiar "rightness" of such a victory at this time. We are a nation engaged in war against an ideology whose principal tenet is "racism" and its attendant theory of the second-class citizen. Enemy propaganda has feasted on the difference between our public pronouncements and our domestic actions. To those who believe in human dignity and freedom it is heartening that our highest tribunal has leveled another barrier to a more complete democracy.

However, the furor aroused by the decision in the South and the quick and angry reaction of political leaders in the eight states that have restricted primaries raise the question of the extent of the triumph. The former chairman of the state Democratic Executive Committee in Texas keynoted Southern feeling when he said that "soon a group of us will get together and after careful study devise a way to meet the situation." This was no idle boast.

Undoubtedly a way of nullifying the court's decision will be sought. Through the second decade of the twentieth century whites were "protected" by the so-called "grandfather clauses," under which voting privileges were permanently and automatically granted to those who were qualified or whose ancestors were qualified to vote in some pre-Civil War year, while others, in the main the mass of Negroes, were barred by stringent "literacy" requirements. After this means of stripping the Negro of the franchise was eliminated in 1915, the state of Texas prepared to strike the first blow in what was to develop into an all-out contest with the Supreme Court of the United States. There was full recognition in the South of the unimportance of the general election in those wholly Democratic areas. The Texas legislature, therefore, in 1923 enacted a statute which declared that "in no event shall a Negro be eligible to participate in a Democratic Party primary election held in the state of Texas."

A Negro, qualified to vote except for the prohibition of this statute, was denied the opportunity at a primary election involving federal officers. The Supreme Court in Nixon v. Herndon (1927) held that the action of Texas in refusing the ballot to Negroes by statute was in violation of the equal-protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The decision made no mention of the Fifteenth Amendment.

Since the Supreme Court held that the state could not act to bar the Negro elector, Texas snapped back in the very next year with a new enactment which seemed to fill this chink in the wall of discrimination. The state would not act; the new law declared, instead, that "every political party through its state Executive Committee shall have the power to . . . determine who shall be qualified to vote." Thereupon, the state Executive Committee of the Democratic Party promptly adopted a resolution which provided that "white Democrats . . . and none other [should] be allowed to participate in the primary elections." Texas itself carefully avoided saying

"no Negroes"; it pointedly sought to circumvent the court's decision by delegating the authority to another body—the party Executive Committee.

When the same Negro was again denied a ballot and again brought suit, the Supreme Court was not taken in by the subterfuge. It sturdily found (Nixon v. Condon, 1932) that the Executive Committee had derived its authority from the statutory proviso. Its action, being a delegation of state power, was "state action" and thus invalid as discriminatory under the Fourteenth Amendement. Unfortunately, the court faltered slightly and refused to decide whether a political party in Texas had inherent power to determine its own membership. This first sign of weakness was quickly pounced upon.

Just three weeks after the decision in Nixon v. Condon was handed down, the Texas Democratic state convention proceeded to adopt this new, court-suggested formula to accomplish the old purpose. This time the state would not pass any legislation, directly against the Negro or in delegation of authority. The prohibitions of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, directed as they are against the action of a state, would thus be effectively by-passed. The convention adopted a resolution limiting membership and participation in the Democratic Party to "all white citizens"—the very resolution reexamined in Smith v. Allright.

Once again a Negro who had sought and been denied a ballot asked for judicial support. But this time in vain. The Supreme Court decided in Grovey v. Townsend (1935) that determination of the membership of the Democratic Party by the state convention was a significant change from determination by the Executive Committee. One was the action of a voluntary private association, the other action by authority of the state. The court further declared that the denial of a vote in a primary was a mere refusal of party membership, with which the state need have no concern.

The decision of the court, written by Justice Roberts, was unanimous. The right of the Negro to vote in a Texas primary seemed effectively and permanently blocked.

Not until the opinion in United States v. Classite (1941) could the advocates of equality take heart. The court there determined that the occurrence of fraud in a Louisiana primary was a subject of Congressional enactment, and the corrupt acts of election officers were held punishable under the federal criminal code in primary as well as in general elections. Grovey v. Townsend was not cited or mentioned in the Classic case. Nevertheless, Classic did bear upon Grovey v. Townsend in that the recognition of the place of the primary in the electoral scheme made it clear that delegation to a party of the power to fix the qualifications for primary elections is delegation of a state function.

The door which had been so tightly shut six years before in the Grovey case had now apparently been pried ajar. The opening, however, was not yet wide enough to permit the passage of a colored citizen in the South. Shortly afterward, therefore, suit was instituted by Lonnie Smith to enable the Supreme Court to reexamine the Grovey v. Townsend case. The present opinion is the result.

But although this discriminatory barrier has been leveled, the Negro will be hampered in the future, in Texas and like-minded states, by other modes of disfranchisement. Already an extraordinary session of the Legislature has been called by the Governor of South Carolina for the purpose of keeping the Democratic Party primary "pure white." The primaries' structural foundation in state law having been emphasized by Justice Reed, all statutory reference to them will be eliminated. As an alternative, the Charleston News and Chronicle advocates editorially a return to the convention system and, if necessary, the revival of nominations in secret lodge rooms. Whatever the means used to prevent them, the Negroes, Senator Maybank has told Congress, will not vote.

The cloak of discrimination has more than one button to keep it safely fastened. Much thought, even genius, has gone into the problem of safeguarding white interests in the South. By clever devices apparently not aimed at race or color the great mass of Negroes have been barred from the vote. Strengthened and stringently enforced, these requirements will maintain the barricade. Each expedient takes some characteristic of the Negro and sets it up as a suffrage disqualification. In addition, white election officials must be "satisfied."

Exacting residence requirements penalize the migratory habits of colored citizens; lengthening the required period and tightening the mode of "satisfactory" proof will keep many from the polls. The poll tax, in some states cumulative, utilizes the impoverished condition of most Southern Negroes. Moreover, even if the money is available, an easily lost receipt or other "satisfactory evidence" of payment is necessary. Educational requirements take advantage of the Negro's lack of schooling. Literacy and comprehension must also be shown to the "satisfaction" of the examiner, and the standards of achievement demanded of a Negro and a white man may, of course, differ materially. Property qualifications which strike at low income and poor financial situation have been used in several states; ownership of forty acres of land or of personalty with an assessed valuation of $500 is often beyond the ability of the Negro.

Lurking in a corner, but not too shy or hesitant to show its face when the occasion warrants, is the oldest and most straightforward of all methods of eliminating the Negro elector—intimidation. If any or all of the methods referred to do not achieve the desired end, the problem may be resolved by force and fear.

In each of these stratagems care has been taken to avoid the constitutional pitfall by disqualifying the Negro without discriminating against him as such. Although the Supreme Court in Smith v. Allright inveighed against any indirect denial of constitutional rights, the circumventions described are well able to gain their object. The decision is important, nevertheless, as part of the ceaseless struggle of progressive forces to achieve complete democracy in this country. It strips the façade of legal protection, at least, from one more discriminatory practice.

India's Would-be Quisling

BY JOHN W. GERBER

AST September I reported in these columns on Subhas Chandra Bose and his plan for setting up an "independent" Indian government under the protection of Japan. At that time the idea must have seemed fantastic. Bose has now turned it into disquieting fact: units of his "Indian national army" have entered India and laid the basis of a "provisional national government."

I suggested in September that Bose's close ties with Japan were his greatest handicap, since China's influence in India was so strong. Bose and his Japanese overlords seem to have realized that weakness and are doing their utmost to overcome it. "The Provisional Government," Bose has said repeatedly, "is convinced that Japan has no political, economic, or military ambitions in India." Japan is interested, he insists, "only in destroying the Anglo-American forces in India, which are enemies not only of India but of Asia as well." The Japanese are backing Bose's penetration with a major propaganda campaign, making every effort to allay suspicion of their intentions.

Powerful forces are working for Bose. Not the least of them is Indian nationalism, which Bose seems to be turning very effectively to his own purposes. Japanese and Indian troops had no sooner entered India than Prime Minister Tojo declared that "all areas of India through which the National Army advances will be immediately placed under the control of the Provisional Government of Free India." A Bengali follower of Bose's, Azad Chatterji, was promptly named governor of the "liberated" territory. (He will, of course, have no more power than the Japanese puppets in China.) Chatterji has announced that the government is ready "to seek the collaboration of all suitable persons in the liberated areas for important tasks." Currency has been issued to drive out the British rupee, and the government claims to have founded its own bank in Burma.

Bose and the Japanese chose a strategic spot for their drive into India. The little state of Manipur has a long history of resistance to the British. The last recorded instance occurred during World War I. In 1917 the British raised a labor force in Manipur for service in France. When they tried to raise a second contingent, a rebellion broke out which was suppressed only toward the end of 1918, with the help of a large force of Assam rifles and Burmese military police. As a consequence, Manipur was deprived of all semblance of home rule, subdivided, and put under the administration of the neighboring Assam states.

Bengal, which includes Assam and Manipur, has been the scene of many violent clashes between the Indians and the British. It is Bose's home, and the considerable influence he still exercises in India is mainly concentrated there. Bose said last August that he expected Indian aid for his invasion; he invaded at the place where he was most likely to get it, and he is claiming now that a number of tribes have risen against the British and that deserters from the Allied camp are joining his forces. British military authorities in this country say that unrest has so far been insignificant.

The impression left on the Indian people by last year's famine in Bengal has been another weapon in Bose's hands. "A new economic order," as well as a "new political order," he has said, "will be instituted under the provisional government."

The basis of the new life is a well-planned economy, and the welfare of the Indian people will be secured by that plan. Without planning there would be chaos, with individuals trying to obtain the most profit, and therefore measures have been formulated to safeguard the welfare of the people. The fundamental principle will be to guarantee to each individual his essential rights, such as food, clothing, and education. It will be the duty of the state to provide these rights so that the people can live like normal human beings.

Bose has trumpeted loudly that he and his army are beginning a "march to Delhi" to "liberate India from British tyranny." His more immediate objective is to cut the new road to China. He announced last November that his army was "fully prepared to march into Bengal and Assam," and "when we do," he declared, "any hope entertained by Chungking of opening a road from Assam will be destroyed." As this is written, he is on the verge of achieving his goal. If he does, it will be a major political and military victory. He can use it to cast doubt upon the strength of our determination to aid China and to prove that Japan is quite capable of attaining its stated military objectives.

The United Nations can no longer ignore Bose; he has begun to turn his words into action. On the whole the people of India are disinclined to aid China's enemy. But Bose will receive considerable support from his own blind followers and from other violently anti-British elements. It may not be enough to enable him to reach Delhi, but it will help him to neutralize the efforts of the United Nations to make India a major base of operations.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

m OR}$  some time treasonable printed matter has been circulated secretly in Germany—and the police are making feverish efforts to discover the distributors, printers, and authors. Four specimens of it, all addressed to soldiers, have received particular attention. A booklet whose title may be translated "I'm Fed Up" is a handbook for soldiers who want to desert. One with the deliberately misleading title "Digest of Ballistics" gives instructions in the art of making oneself unfit for military service; it is alleged to have been written by medical students. A newspaper called The Soldier in the Mediterranean Theater, obviously printed in France for circulation among the occupation troops, appears intermittently to urge insubordination and peace. The first page carries a printed request to all Frenchmen "to hand this paper cautiously to a German soldier." A pamphlet entitled "Ten Commandments for the German Soldier" is another call to insubordination and desertion. One day copies of it were put in all the students' desks at the University of Leipzig.

All these booklets are described in an article in the St. Galler Tagblatt for March 25 written by an anonymous "special correspondent." This correspondent declares that a genuine German "underground" is gradually being built-quite a different thing from the fictional underground of the moving pictures and the propaganda journals. In general, stories about the underground should be received with a good deal of skepticism. By reason of their very subject matter they cannot be checked. The experienced and critical analyst, however, can tell by almost infallible signs whether a report is to be taken seriously or not. The test is a certain exactness of statement, an agreement in small details with already established facts. The article in the St. Galler Tagblatt impresses one as reliable, and is therefore worth quoting at some length.

The author notes first that opposition in act or in thought emerged in Germany only as the military situation began to deteriorate. An illegal broadsheet with the title "December Manifesto" was circulated in December, 1941, but at that time, with the German army standing before Moscow, it made little impression. A year later one called "Proclamation of the West German Peace Conference" had "noticeable echoes, particularly in the Rhineland and Westphalia," where there had been severe air raids. After Stalingrad came the well-known "Manifesto" of the Munich students, which had a sensational effect all over the country. Illegal activity has been increasing ever since.

The pattern of resistance is like that in the occupied countries, particularly France. As soldiers of the occupation armies, as civilian officials in occupied territory, or simply as workers in close association with foreign labor, Germans have learned about the methods used outside the Reich—and are beginning to copy them at home. An organization much like that of the French maquis, according to this account, is now active in Germany.

In Berlin and Breslau, for instance, representatives of the maquis systematically provide food cards, civilian clothes, and all kinds of permits. In 1943 official reports listed 56,000 deserters, only a small number of whom can have succeeded in escaping abroad. All the others live illegally in the maquis, using the identification papers of people who have died or disappeared. It has become necessary to reinforce the military police in order to cope with the rising wave of desertions. . . .

Students have become the main figures in active resistance. This is interesting since most students are soldiers who have been sent home to continue their studies. Shortly before the big raids on Berlin a Nazi Party representative was prevented from speaking at a students' social evening, and the gathering was dispersed by the police. As a result of the devastating air attacks German state services are not functioning with their usual clockwork precision, and the maquis is seizing the opportunity to destroy the prestige of the "omnipotent state."

The Nazis are reacting to these signs of opposition in two ways. Some, the article tells us, simply sneer—and "point confidently to the numerous anti-aircraft turrets on squares and at street corners, which have been provided with openings toward the streets to be used in civil warfare. 'As long as we have these strong points,' they say, 'the people cannot harm us.'" Others take the matter more seriously and, profiting by the example of the underground, "declare that in the event of a German defeat they will themselves go to a maquis and make life unbearable for a successor government or the Allied occupation forces."

NO MONARCHY

The Overseas News Agency has distributed a story asserting that practically every Spaniard is ready to accept the monarchy and that I myself was engaged in Mexico in the task of winning Republican support for the restoration. In thirty years of journalism I have seldom read a more idiotic story. I was, I am, and I shall remain an enemy of the monarchy. I believe that its restoration would be a disservice to the Allied cause and an insult to the Spanish people.

THE TIME OF THE ASSASSINS

BY LOUISE BOGAN

THE modern detective novel originated in times physically, and perhaps spiritually, darker than our own. The roman policier was based on the invention, new and terrible to the French, of the political police, under Fouché and Napoleon. Later Vidogc, an adventurer born under the Old Regime, managed under the new dispensation to make a transformation in which the chaos of the period is summed up: he became Chef de la Sureté and used his criminal career as a basis for his position on the other side of the law. His "Memoirs," published in Paris in 1829, intersected the legend of the Byronic hero. Here was something new, a product of another social situation, the beginning of a new legend. Vidoqc appears almost immediately in literature as Balzac's Vautrin, Meanwhile, and following closely in the steps of actual spies and agents provocateurs, Eugene Sue began to produce, in the '30's, his series of roman-feuilletons, which included "Les Mystères de Paris" and "Le Juif errant." Jean Cassou has stated that the development of the roman-feuilleton and the creation of the social sciences is parallel. The secrets of "sordid and terrible Paris" were sought out, in the first, under the cover of darkness. The rich and the poor, the intriguer and his victim, were linked together. "The poor adventurer, the pariah, the carbonaro, the artist, the regenerator, the adversary of the Jesuits . . . these were the phantasmagoria projected by [the beginning of] the nineteenth century." They were symbolic of the strange desire that had manifested itself in the midst of chaos: "to pass beyond the political to the social revolution."

The earliest detectives worked by mystery and ruse rather than rapidity and force. Roger Caillois, in his intelligent study of the genre, "Le Roman Policier,"* says that the detective is at first successful not through his logic but because of his disguises. He is, at the beginning, an inheritor of Fenimore Cooper, the infallible observer of the forest. The great city has become a new jungle, more dangerous than the solitudes of Canada. This pattern was soon abandoned, but it has returned in the spy and secret-agent stories of the present. But let us watch the closing in of the form, the development of "deduction," which at one point made the detective novel into an almost pure play of the logical faculties, a detached jen d'esprit.

This tendency toward rules was observed in the detective novel while rules elsewhere in nineteenth-century literature were being progressively rejected. The detective novel splits off from the surrounding anarchy of form. And within its closed universe Poe further limits its locale by inventing the convention of the locked room. The detective now has completely rejected his bloodhound role. He becomes the scientist "coordinating indices," the artist-priest astounding the world at large as well as his rather stupid human foil. The crime becomes as isolated from life as a chemical experiment. Rules to protect the reader emerge: "Give the reader an equal right with the detective . . . no supernatural or scientific marvels . . . no tricky architecture . . . no factors brought in at the last moment." And the acte gratuit, the novel and motiveless impulse, cannot function at this point; the diabolical machinery must work on the basis of accepted motives. Now, "the detective story must take from existence nothing but a frame. . . . It is not interested in passions or emotions except as a force to set the mechanism in motion. It is only interested in forming a complete and simple figure from incomprehensible and partial fragments. The novel attaches itself to the nature of man. This nature is a bother to the detective story, at this stage, and it supports it only unwillingly."

M. Caillois's analysis now reaches a crucial fact. Here is this new form, coldly opposed to everything literature stands for. But the pure exercise of the intellectual faculty, the detachment from emotion, the devotion of the detective to the penetration of "an artificial miracle"-all this is brought up against the unalterable convention that a detective novel must be based on a corpse. It demands a murderer-a person who has killed and risks capital punishment; no other sort of malefactor will do. And because of this anomaly between crude subject and skilled method, the detective story cannot remain a pure puzzle for long. "The cards must be shuffled." Suddenly "neither the murderers are real bandits nor the searchers real police." Variations multiply; here, in a late development, is Simenon's Maigret, a detective with a compassionate heart. "An obscure necessity obliges these policemen to make reservations in their role. They have a liberal attitude or a liberal profession. . . . They occupy a marginal place in regard to society, in the manner of the sorcerer or devil in the ancient tales who appears in the guise of a stranger, a horse dealer, a doctor, an itinerant merchant."

The closed circle begins to break. The puzzle begins to widen back toward the novel proper. Now the criminal has become anyone. "The most unexpected person" is now any man or woman, of whatever age or condition. And the elaboration of the setting becomes inexhaustible. Everywhere has become the scene of the crime. No situation, however sacred or cut off from life by money, power, or prestige, has been omitted. As in a fox hunt, every modern type and modern locale has been "blooded" by the detective novel. But the detective story has not by any means merced with the novel. It has, instead, drained off from the other form all its residues of "sensation." While apparently working with the most icy logical detachment, the narrative breaks off "complaisantly to recount scabrous scenes of cruelty or eroticism. The ambition of the intelligence is flattered while the appetite for sensation is satisfied."

The mention of death and dissolution has almost disappeared from modern middle-class and "folk" literature. The detective novel does not reject one detail of the macabre. And it openly accommodates fear and aggression, open or disguised. Certain authors specialize in the frozen will of the nightmare—or the neurotic symptom; their characters may not escape even if they could. The rat-in-the-trap, the spider-and-the-fly motifs recur. The baseless fears of the folktale or the psychiatric clinic are endlessly repeated. And the inveterate reader of detective stories can soon classify his reading into stories written by and for sadists, by and for masochists; into stories in which someone, under a pseudonym, is working off some obsession or perversion or fear that is sure to link up with similar aberrations in some reader. On a higher level we get a complete picture of paranoia in Kafka's "The Trial."

The obscure religious undercurrent in these dramas of sin and retribution cannot be overlooked. "One of the strange phenomena of the nineteenth century"-I quote a modern clergyman-"is the spectacle of religion dropping the appeal to fear while other human interests have picked it up." The Gothic novel that began in the late eighteenth century bore the marks of a broken-down, secularized, floating religion. It is the supernatural that intervenes. The trappings are Catholicism's ruined abbeys; the fumes are those of a Protestant personal hell. Ritual has dissolved. The detective story, on the other hand, has all the marks of a live cult, developing from primitivism toward complexity. The victim is always there, whether the sign of a brutal sacrifice or a more humane oblation. And the priestlike character of the detective was once very clear: Sherlock Holmes, in whose human reality many people believed, is the supreme example of this type.

"The present-day individual," writes a psychiatrist, "is more and more called upon to give up his aggressions. The repressed and therefore unconscious criminality of the normal man finds few socially harmless outlets: dream and fantasy life, the neurotic symptom, and some transitional forms of behavior. . . . " The break-through of the submerged unconscious, the symbolic struggle between good and evil-in the detective story we find a reenactment of these struggles. And the flight motif has returned, along with the tracking-down of-the-fugitive role of the official or unofficial police. Graham Greene, one of the most intelligent and exciting writers of the modern "thriller"-because his imagination seems peculiarly sensitive to archetypal subconscious themes-has recognized the role of the conscience in these dramas; he gives one book a title extracted from Francis Thompson's poem "The Hound of Heaven"-"The Labyrinthine Ways." And it is Greene who has stated that the history of contemporary society is being written "in hundreds of volumes, most of them sold in cheap editions"-the detective novels. The great and perceptive writers of the nineteenth century for we have been given history's greatest role. We cannot play this role as we must play it unless we understand the force we fight against. MEIN KAMPF, by Adolf Hitler, is the bible of Naziism, Germany's master plan. DER FUEHRER, by Konrad Heiden, is "the greatest book on Naziism ever written." These two extraordinary books are neither short nor elementary, but they are primers nonetheless for every American who has lent his brain and hand to the battle against "the cruelest tyranny."

from George Eliot through Henry James accepted the material and announced the themes, striking out across the world of devotion to "progress" and bourgeois complacency. At the moment continuous and sharp attention should be paid to this vehicle, in which every rejected and denied human impulse can be accommodated, from the petty but terrible Schadenfreude (joy in another's misfortune), bred from the poorer native qualities of the human heart as well as from the pressures of a competitive society, to the larger evil schemes of power and ambition. The detective novel, now snobbishly cut off from the main stream of literature, reviewed flippantly if at all, may at this moment have within it secrets of what we are and shall be. And the future may look back to it, as it now exists, through great works engendered by it, as we look back through Baudelaire's poems to Sue's Paris, and back through Shakespeare to the crude horrors of the Tragedy of Blood.

ANATOLE FRANCE: 1844-1944

BY ALBERT GUERARD

Et voici qu'elle se relève Du tombeau profond de l'oubli. O ma jeunesse, ô mon beau rêve, Ie t'avais mal enseveli.

T TOOK Victor Hugo seventeen years to recuperate from his funeral; I trust that after two decades Anatole France will rise "tel qu'en lui-même enfin l'éternité le change," transmuted by death into his essential self. All the minor graces, the pretty tricks, the smirks and naughtinesses that once delighted middle-aged sophomores have returned unto dust. We have forgotten the Living Classic, the Old Master, the bland Pontiff of Free Thought, who with ironical resignation allowed himself to be worshiped. What could he do, and whither could he flee? Touraine was no refuge; and the snobs, fawning and backbiting, would have beaten a path even to Shangri-La. We have forgotten the aged satur. sporting with red-kirtled Amaryllis in the Boulogne grove. We have forgotten there ever was a Brousson, exactly on a level with the Master's slippers. We have forgotten even that Anatole France "wrote beautifully of beautiful happenings," like the troubadour of Poictesme. How tenuous and remote the gossip, epigrams, and madrigals of vesterday appear. through the perspective of these haggard years!

Yet, merely as an artist, his place is assured. He was no weird Titan but a scrupulous craftsman. As such he will live by the side of good Théophile Gautier, definitely above the charming lyric acrobat Théodore de Banville, in the pleasant foothills of Parnassus; and men of gentle nurture will enjoy his urbane converse long after the vociferations of would-be geniuses have died away; for the still small voice need not be stern. But I am not jotting notes on Anatole France as a writer for some future textbook of literature. Anatole France did not work in vain; yet so far as the history of art is concerned, he might as well never have lived at all, for he created nothing. He combined delightfully Voltaire and Châteaubriand; ironical free thought, antiquarian curiosity, a gentle yearning for the past just before it mellows into oblivion. But Renan, not Anatole France, was the originator and the master of that exquisite and paradoxical blend. It was Renan who prepared "the purple shroud wherein dead gods repose."

The superficial charm of Anatole France is literary, and even bookish; his greatness, strange as it may sound, is of a moral nature. Half a century ago he would have been voted a decadent trifler, while Theodore Roosevelt, Rudyard Kipling, and Jack London were strenuous, red-blooded, twofisted he-men. Yet we are not sure how they would have stood the test of our times. They swaggered on obvious paths; compelled to probe their souls, they might have been bewildered, and veiled their confusion with bluster. We have no misgivings whatever about Anatole France. He was not the man to crave "a means of escape from responsibility, from the coherent, close-knit, waking self which has to make decisions." He was not "above the strife," like Romain Rolland; he did not profess, like Jules Romains, that synthetic "good-will" which is more than half mystification; he would have spurned the delicate equivocations of André Maurois;

He is with us. Read his "Histoire Contemporaine"; it is Vichy and the hesitant friends of Vichy that he denounced forty-five years ago, for the sorry triumph of Pétain is but the long-prepared revanche of the anti-Dreyfusists. By no stretch of imagination could you imagine him cooperating with the New Order of a crude and cruel fanatic; and you could not imagine him either doing obeisance to the Big Three for the sole reason that they are big. Clear-eyed and disenchanted he was, even cynical at times, but there are levels of "realism" to which he could not have stooped.

He was thought to be a dilettante, an epicure; when the test came, he never flinched. He served, modestly, even humbly, in unfamiliar, uncongenial fields. I have heard him address a Socialist meeting in a dingy hall crammed with rough men. This was no miraculous conversion. It was his culture that had tempered, pointed, and sharpened his mind until it could seek unerringly, in the heaviest armor of prejudice, the almost invisible and fatal flaw.

It was, I repeat, the Anatole France of "La Rôtisserie" and "Le Lys rouge" who had trained himself, unawares, for the ordeal he stood so well. Frivolous to the frivolous, these books are examples of intellectual courage, a courage so self-assured that it needed no bluster. The smile of Anatole

THE GREAT TRANSFORMATION. By Karl Polanyi. Farrar and Rinehart, $3.

ALBERT GUERARD

HIS book might well have been prefaced by that magnificent quotation from John Donne in which Hemingway found the title "For Whom the Bell Tolls"-"No man is an Iland, intire of itselfe; every man is a peece of the continent, a part of the maine." For its theme is the continent of society and the erosion that society has suffered from an attempt to force upon it an economic system based on purely individualistic values.

Rewriting the history of the last 150 years Karl Polanyi seeks an explanation of the collapse of nineteenth-century civilization. It was not, he finds, "destroyed by the internal or external attack of barbarians; its vitality was not sapped by the devastation of World War I nor by the revolt of a socialist proletariat or a fascist lower middle class. Its failure was not the outcome of some alleged laws of economics such as the falling rate of profit or of underconsumption or overproduction. It disintegrated as a result of an entirely different set of causes: the measures which society adopted in order not to be, in its turn, annihilated by the action of the selfregulating market."

The clash between the market system and the movement to protect men and institutions from its crudities has long been recognized. But as Mr. Polanyi points out, the apologists for laissez faire have been in the habit of ascribing all state interference with the automatic functioning of the market to a collective conspiracy of selfish interests. This charge, he argues, is absurd, and he cites in refutation the great variety of forms which the reaction against laissez faire adopted and the diversity of groups that at one time or another promoted it. In one of his most telling passages he quotes Herbert Spencer's attack on "restrictive legislation." To that Victorian diehard such measures as compulsory vaccination, the regulation of common carriers, the public inspection of food and drugs, the Contagious Diseases Act, and the institution of public libraries were anathema as attempts by the state to overthrow the "natural laws" of economics. Yet as this book makes clear, each of these measures dealt in the public interest with some pressing problem arising out of modern industrial conditions. Moreover, their sponsors, as a rule, were uncompromising opponents of collectivism.

The truth is that the effort to refer all economic matters to a self-regulating market was met by a spontaneous reaction. And this was particularly marked in the case of labor, land, and money, all of which the market system sought to reduce to the stature of ordinary commodities. One of Mr Polanyi's main arguments is that the attempt to treat wages as a "price," fixed solely by the forces of supply and demand, was totally destructive of social institutions. For it assumed that the worker was a man without ties, possessing complete mobility, who could always sell himself in the best market. Only the hobo fulfils these conditions, and a "perfect" labor market would mean a society of hobos.

The first spontaneous reaction to the paramountcy of the market was, according to this book, the Speenhamland system. This was essentially a plan for supplementing rural wages by payments from local taxes. Launched by the justices of the peace at Speenhamland, a small town in southern England, just as the Industrial Revolution was gathering momentum, it spread rapidly over a large part of the country. The results were disastrous, for instead of protecting the laborer from the rising cost of living the actual effect was to drive wage rates down and pauperize a large section of the working class. Moreover, to the extent that it did slow up the migration from the country to the new factories it served to maintain a supply of cheap labor for landowners and large farmers.

Mr. Polanyi does not defend this system: he exhibits it as a horrible example of the consequences of the collision between the market economy and intrenched social institutions. And in an acute piece of analysis he suggests that the situation produced by Speenhamland, the juxtaposition of a growing army of paupers and a rising industrial production misled the classical economists into enunciating such theories as "the iron law of wages."

The application of the market system to land and money, both social institutions rather than commodities, likewise produced a series of clashes which are discussed at length in this book. In the case of money, the gold standard made possible a self-regulating market and became itself a universal fetish. Mr. Polanyi's exposition of the ways in which nations, struggling to maintain stable currencies, sacrificed economic and political freedom to this fetish is not the least fascinating section of a fascinating and wide-ranging work.

In the space of a review it is not possible to do more than indicate the bare outlines of one of the most important and original contributions to economic thought in several years. I must warn the intending reader, however, that this is no bedtime book to be tackled with the brain half-asleep. It requires concentration, but it is worth it.

This warm indorsement is not to be taken as implying total agreement. On the contrary, reading this book, I found myself constantly questioning its interpretation of facts. I suspect, for instance, that Mr. Polanyi is giving too much weight to purely intellectual forces in the working out of the Industrial Revolution. Did the classical economists create a trend or merely rationalize one? Which leads to the question whether the social calamity in England for which this work blames the self-regulating market was not, in fact, an inevitable accompaniment of rapid industrialization.

Perhaps the answer is to be found in an analysis of the planned industrial revolution carried out in Russia over the past twenty-five years, at which Mr. Polanyi casts no more than a passing glance. There we had a conscious diversion of income from the workers for the purpose of industrialization under forced draft, a deliberate sacrifice of the standards of living of one generation for the benefit of the future, an intentional liquidation of social institutions which could in any way interfere with the over-all plan. True, the fruits of the resulting investments do not accrue to private persons. But the suffering involved in their creation has been no less real and is at least comparable in volume and intensity to that experienced by the British working classes in the first half of the nineteenth century. May I suggest to Mr. Polanyi that a comparative study of the English and Russian industrial revolutions might form a fruitful subject for a future book? KEITH HUTCHISON

The Web of Words

THE LOOM OF LANGUAGE. By Frederick Bodmer. Lancelot Hogben, Editor. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

BEFORE undertaking to review this distinctly novel, impressively learned, generally entertaining, occasionally witty, sometimes tedious, frequently exasperating, too often opinionated, and probably very useful book, one ought really to devote the free evenings of the next six months to learning to read the principal Germanic and Romance languages by the methods and with the help of the abundant paraphernalia that Mr. Bodmer has supplied. Although it attempts and succeeds distractingly in being several things at once, the chief aim of "The Loom of Language" is to lighten the burden of learning for the home student. The test of the recipe is the pudding. Accordingly, it is by its practical usefulness rather than by its considerable power to inform, amuse, and even astound its readers that the book should ultimately be judged. Since the procedure I have suggested is not feasible at the moment, this review should be regarded as merely a provisional report.

'The Loom of Language' belongs to the same series as the widely known "Mathematics for the Million" and "Science for the Citizen" and has a number of characteristics in common with them. If you have encountered any of its predecessors, you know in general what to expect of itan alliterative title, a vast quantity of fact-crammed reading matter, a disarmingly friendly tone, a real faculty for clear exposition, and a promise, provided you cooperate diligently, to make you an accomplished linguist-at least, to enable you to read and perhaps to write French, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, German, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish. There is a catch in it somewhere, of course, and it is an old, familiar one. No book, no matter how ingeniously devised, can eliminate the necessity of memorizing words and paradigms and of practicing their use unremittingly. Mastery comes only by drudgery.

Mr. Bodmer, however, believes that the amount of drudgery can be reduced materially. Many of the devices that he uses and advocates are no longer new in this country. For the past twenty-five years the tabulators of words, idioms, morphological forms, and syntactical constructions have been slaving faithfully at their unspeakably dull but useful tasks, and the results of their labors are now generally available for actual instruction. A full 160 pages of "The Loom" are devoted to three highly useful, intelligently compiled word-lists-the first giving English, Swedish, Danish, Dutch, and German in parallel columns, the second giving English, French, Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian, and the third listing the Greek words that form the basis of the modern scientific vocabulary in all European languages. Scattered throughout the book are a large number of tables and diagrams that put linguistic facts in their most assimilable typographic form.

More novel, and certainly questionable, is his contention that it is easier to learn several related languages simultaneously than to take them up one at a time. Many of us have humiliating recollections of our efforts to learn Anglo-Saxon and Old Icelandic, or Spanish and Italian, in that way; if Mr. Bodmer has discovered how to turn the trick, he will have conferred an inestimable boon on students. I hope he has done so, but this, as I have said, is only a provisional report.

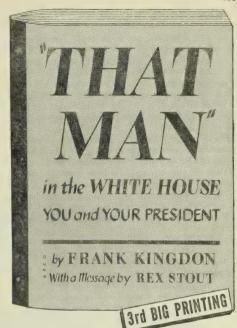

Mr. Bodmer is also over-optimistic, I feel sure, in his belief that a small vocabulary-approximately two thousand words-is sufficient for what he calls fluent self-expression in any language. Here I think he has misinterpreted the results of certain word counts and of C. K. Ogden's experiments with Basic English. No single conversation is apt to exhibit an extraordinary range of vocabulary, but in the course of a day an educated man engages in many conversations on a variety of subjects. That a word occurs seldom does not make it negligible. Basic English is a special technique of expression and not one that is ordinarily convenient to use. When Basic is employed to perform its more startling feats of communication, it becomes an exercise in perpetual definition, complex and cumbersome. Fluent self-expression with a meager vocabulary is possible only for halfwits, who have little to express, or for logi-

A BLUNT, COURAGEOUS BOOK BY A FIGHTING AMERICAN

THAT MAN IN THE WHITE HOUSE is the outspoken, courageous book that has exploded like a bombshell amidst the forces of reaction in America.

THAT MAN IN THE WHITE HOUSE is this very moment exciting nationwide notice because it minces no words. It speaks out openly on issues of flaming urgency for all of us.

"What is going to happen in 1944-and after?" Frank Kingdon's soldier son asked him, as millions of Americans are asking daily and anxiously. What about the next four years? What will happen to our jobs, our businesses, our returning fighting men? Who will sit in the fourth chair at the peace table with Churchill, Stalin and Chiang-Kai-Shek? Will it be a "peace" of blunders or one that will reward the blood, sweat and tears so wantonly forced upon us?

THAT MAN IN THE WHITE HOUSE is a thrilling, vital book-a weapon struck off at white heat for the millions of men and women who realize that our choice of a President in 1944 will determine the kind of world we shall live in for the next four years, and the years after. It answers the many questions you will have to settle in your mind before you choose your side in the coming struggle for America.

But most of Mr. Bodmer's suggestions for overcoming the difficulties of learning a foreign language are sensible and acute. He places great reliance on developing "language consciousness"—that is, intelligent interest in language as mechanism-as an aid to learning. Of course, it will work, but it is an unusual person who develops it. The late Edward Sapir had developed his language consciousness to the point, I have been told, where he could master a new language in the leisure hours of a voyage across the Pacific, but he was the most brilliant and profound student of language of our generation. We are not apt to see his like again. Unfortunately, the tendency in education for a number of years has been to assail the study of language at every opportunity so that the idea that linguistics is dull and useless is deeply implanted in the general opinion. It will require a thorough reform of our educational practice to change matters.

Yet that change is pretty sure to come. For several generations Americans have been the most persistently monolingual of all the great nations. Separated by the oceans from Europe and Asia, with our only linguistic frontiers—with French in the northeast and Spanish in the southwest—lying in sparsely settled territory, we have been but dimly aware that other languages might be worth knowing. Now, however, that men have flown around the globe in four days, and that an electric spark, transmitting a signal, makes the circuit in a fraction of a second, our linguistic as well as our geographic isolation has vanished. Although the English language will in the immediate future be more important than ever before, fewer English-speaking people will find their native language sufficient for their needs. German, French, and Italian will probably lose some, though not great deal, of their current importance; Spanish, Portuguese, Russian, and Chinese are certain to gain importance and prestige. Necessity will make linguists of us. "The Loom of Language," despite some serious shortcomings of method and of manner, is a book for the times by virtue of its intelligent discussion of linguistic problems and its resolute insistence that for the ordinarily intelligent adult there is no insuperable obstacle to the learning of several languages.

THE SHIELD OF ACHILLES: ESSAYS ON BELIEFS IN POETRY. By Horace Gregory. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE miscellaneous papers, chiefly enlarged and revised book reviews, that Mr. Gregory has assembled here under so challenging a title are linked together, he tells us, by the fact that they deal with the success of various authors in using Achilles's shield as they confront this perilous world. The shield "may be taken to mean the degree of self-knowledge that a work of art contains to protect itself against what has been so often called 'the ravages of time.' The shield, then, seems to protect the author of a poem, reviving his name even from the deepest obscurity and offering through its example a protection for the reader. There is little doubt that Achilles's shield dazzled and disarmed his enemies; and if the shield may be said to contain a moral purpose in its creation, it was rather more than artfully concealed within the arts of persuasion that it employed." Armed with this explanation of Mr. Gregory's chosen symbol, the reader feels safe in exploring these pages for instances of the way in which self-knowledge served a company that includes Samuel Johnson, D. H. Lawrence, Lewis Carroll, and Paul Elmer Moore, among others as diverse in their personalities and their performance. If the adventure proves somewhat disappointing-for it is rarely that the beliefs of his subjects are made as lucid or as significant as one has been led to expect-one ends by forgiving a writer who ranges so widely and who discovers a sufficiency of entertaining and arresting matters in the course of his travels.

Mr. Gregory says not a few good things by the way. Sometimes these are offered, as a poet should offer them, in a happy metaphor, as where he observes, of the usual pairing of Keats and Shelley, that "names in close company, like coins jingled too frequently together, lose their faces, and in literary discourse many names are worn to faceless brilliance in the jargon of studious research and reappreciation." Sometimes he says simply what has oft been thought but ne'er so well expressed, as when he declares that "Poe was more frequently the master of artifice than of art." Again, he introduces shrewd comparisons, such as the seemingly unlikely one of George Moore with Sherwood Anderson, or nice contrasts, such as that of Alice, Lewis Carroll's Alice, with Wordsworth, remarking that the practical little girl,

Triumph of Treason

By PIERRE COT

RIUMPH OF TREASON is a sobering and courageous account of the success of a plot to destroy a great nation.. But it is more than that. Change a few names, modify a few excuses, and it becomes a grim warning that what happened to France can still happen to us... despite Victory.

Pierre Cot speaks for n France in chains . . . and as her former Minister of Aviation, accused before the Vichy Court of Riom along with Blum, Daladier and the other defenders of French democracy, he speaks with an authority possessed by few men.

And as a fitting climax, the reader will find in an appendix one of the most precious gifts willed to the world by the Third Republic: the immortal statement of Léon Blum at Riom. Here the former Premier' accuses his accusers, and with deadly reasoning dares to fling in the teeth of the Vichy judges the bitter truth about the fall of France.

PUBLISHING COMPANY unlike the not impractical poet, "knew terror, but not grief." The essay on Alice and Wordsworth is one of the most stimulating in the collection. Here the author is fairly explicit as to his own demands upon poetry, asserting that it must always appeal to "our sixth sense, intelligence," and concluding with a statement of his requirements for the art that is full of interest. He would have it that the intelligence which enters into poetry is not merely "sensible of ethics" but also "of the devotional spirit," and since this is not the only passage in which Mr. Gregory pays his devoirs to religion, one could well wish him to be more expansive at this point. But just as one looks for ampler exposition and analysis, the author turns away, and the reader is teased by a sense of over-hasty dismissal. What is lacking here, as elsewhere in the book, is a sufficiently precise evaluation of belief.

But if Mr. Gregory does not quite succeed in his ambitious task of making clear just how well these men and women knew themselves and how this knowledge affected their art, and if he does not always compel agreement, he does show himself a thoughtful, discerning student of literature. He manages to avoid the pitfalls besetting the dogmatically social critics on the one hand and the preciously formalistic on the other. As his foreword suggests, and as the final essay in the volume makes plain, he inclines rather toward that scholarly and, in the best sense of the word. humanistic approach to letters so happily exemplified in the work of Edmund Wilson. And if he seems to plead for his saint rather too emphatically to make his own faith appear quite firm, and seems also, as befits so keen an admirer of eighteenth-century literary virtues, to be wanting in the enthusiasm that warms what it illuminates, his insistence on the moral implications of literature and on the obvious if not always recognized distinction between a vivifying humanity and a withering humanitarianism deserves attention. This emphasis is of special value in a period when letters are dominated by the man who runs, or more often flies, as he writes. BABETTE DEUTSCH

Islands and Mandates

JAPAN'S ISLANDS OF MYSTERY. By Willard Price. The John Day Company. $2.50.

R. PRICE has long been unique among journalists as the man who actually visited the Japanese mandated islands and survived to tell the tale. He made his trip I should guess-he doesn't date it precisely-some seven or eight years ago. His record of what he saw and did in the islands is a truly engaging narrative in which a travel story is bolstered by solid fact drawn both from observation and standard reference works. The result is by far the best book on the mandates for the general reader, and it will be a rare specialist in Pacific affairs who won't find a great deal of value in it. It certainly complements and supplements P. H. Clyde's "Japan's Pacific Mandate" (1935) and Tadao Yanaihara's "Pacific Islands Under Japanese Mandate" (1940). Yet it still remains true that the full story of what Japan did in its mandate will not be available until the war is over and the hot passions of today have cooled. Running through Mr. Price's narrative is the conviction, shared by other writers, that Japan's remarkable job at developing the economic potentialities of the islands was disfigured and debased by the subversion of economic policy by the military expansionists. Mr. Price leans to the conclusion that public works like harbor development were consistently executed more in relation to military than to commercial needs. Certainly the League of Nations Mandates Commission long suspected as much, but lacking an inspection service it could not prove its point. In fact, Mr. Price's book is another illustration of the fact that remarkably little about the military developments in the islands can be proved in advance of their actual conquest and detailed inspection. Even the recent Japanese boast about fortifications really proves nothing, for it may be chiefly designed to reinforce a widespread American conviction. The current conclusion that Truk-brilliantly described by Mr. Price-is not supplied with any very elaborate man-made permanent defensive works may be found to apply elsewhere. What the islands have is a God-made military importance which the Japanese have fully exploited by the use of their naval and air forces. This does not preclude the possibility that many of the islands are liberally supplied with pillboxes, but vast forts may nowhere be found.

Mr. Price offers a reasoned defense of island-hoppinga generally misunderstood expression—as a preliminary to his travel story, and concludes with a prescription for the future. The latter involves, among other things, the return of all Japanese in the islands to the homeland. This will create an economic vacuum which the natives are hardly prepared to fill and which I find it difficult to see being filled successfully. A lapse in Mr. Price's reasoning is his failure to emphasize that the economic development the Japanese achieved was fostered by a protected market for the produce in Japan. It could not have been accomplished on the basis of free world competition. I do not see that a listing of the products of the islands will interest Americans economically, for many of the products, notably sugar, would hardly be welcomed here by the established suppliers. The role of economic interests in the achievement of Philippine independence-where political progressivism and economic reaction wanted the same thing-has considerable illustrative value here.

Nevertheless, Mr. Price has written a first-class book. I'd like some day to meet the Australian mentioned on page 10. He is a curiously ignorant fellow, rare among his countrymen.

MARITAIN'S criticism and aesthetics do not make from his scholastic language, with which the contemporary reader may not be familiar, but rather from the tension of his prose. of this tension lies, if I may hazard a guess, in the fact that M. Maritain, though he is in one essential aspect of his personality as much of a "modern" as any of us, must harmonize his modern sensibility and interests with his own religious and philosophical views. These two components of his personality call, if justice is to be done to the claims of each, for thinking at a deeper level than we moderns are forced to do, for we accept modern art, as we accept everything modern, as a matter of course. The result is that M. Maritain has achieved a view of art and a conception of its place in the scale of human activities far more serious and liberal than that which is to be found in the writings of the majority of contemporary philosophers.

M. Maritain is able to assign to art a high place in the scale of values because he conceives of man's needs and destiny in a much more serious, more exacting way than we moderns can ever do. No sentimentalist, no mere humanitarian bent on making life easier at the price of emptying it of its highest values, M. Maritain's understanding of human nature and his deep religious faith-which he would say are intimately connected-keep him from kneeling, as we moderns do, in indiscriminate worship of man. M. Maritain respects man. But he knows what we moderns do not care to learn—that man can achieve full human stature only by serving ends higher than himself. What function, then, does he think art can serve? He does not assign to art the highest place, of course, for as a Christian he reserves that place for saintliness, but he does rate it high because he considers it to be a means to express a radical spirituality. And the artist expresses spirituality by "informing" matter with the radiance of an idea. And when successful the result is a "creation," in a fairly literal sense, and in more than one place he tells us that the artist continues the work of the Creator. This is to say that art is not a copy or an imitation of nature. Hence art "does not make the mind conform to reality, but reality conform to the mind."

That we would disagree with M. Maritain when he insists that to establish fully the dignity of art it is necessary "to go back as far as the mystery of the Trinity," is not here to the point. He is a dogmatist and does not wince either at the word or at its implications. What is to the point is that we moderns are not able to assign to art as serious a function as he. We moderns claim to have liberated our humanity from the bondage in which medievals like M. Maritain insist in holding it, and claim thus to have discovered its intrinsic dignity. But in fact we have not really exalted man or his activities, but have, in the main, deprived them of their true worth. Hence the essential weakness of humanism and the triviality of its problems. Take, for instance, the current controversy as to whether art can give us knowledge of reality or not. The quarrel is about the function of art, about its dignity; and on one side are those who tell us that the end of art is the "expression" of emotion and not knowledge, and on the other those who tell us, in Mr. Tate's phrase, that the end of art is to give us "complete knowledge of man's experience." But neither of the two sides seem to see that the controversy is purely verbal and that it misses the really important question. For if those who hold that art expresses emotion degrade it to the level of that which it expresses, their opponents, in defending the proposition that art gives us real knowledge, are not defending anything radically superior, as they seem to imagine. For of what use is their knowledge, what do they do with it, except to show it off like strutting peacocks? "Ah, through it we grow, we realize ourselves," they answer us. Yes, but to what end? so that you may realize yourselves? Are you so blind that you cannot see that self-realization for its own sake remains sheer self-idolatry?

In the last essay of this new book M. Maritain carries forward his inquiry into the nature of poetry begun in the older volume, "Art and Scholasticism." And if I understand him, what he wishes to make clear in this essay is that the power of the poet is indeed, as we moderns say but do not really believe, a truly creative power, that is, a free and not a determined gift, since the poem states more than the experience of the artist from which it grows, bubbling, when it is true poetry and not the slavish imitation of the academician, from the very deepest levels of the soul. But there is much more in this essay and in this thin volume than my last few sentences would seem to indicate. The first part of the book is made up of three essays calling attention to the religious aspects of the art of Chagall, Rouault, and Severini. The second part, entitled Dialogues, is made up of notes of varying length, giving us an inkling of how arduous and sustained has been the struggle that M. Maritain has carried on with his contemporaries. Some of these notes will be fully intelligible only to those who are familiar with the French scene and its personalities. It is interesting to note that one of M. Maritain's most formidable opponents is Gide, whose talents M. Maritain obviously respects profoundly, but with whose ideas, of course, he disagrees radically. In the third essay there are ideas and suggestions, like the distinction drawn between soul and spirit and magic in art, which most of his readers I dare say will like to see elucidated at greater length. But there is nothing in this book, obscure though some passages in it may seem, that is dead. All of it is quick and exciting to the imagination and the intellect. For this seems to be the peculiarity of M. Maritain as critic and as philosopher of art, however "scholastic" in the disparaging sense his philosophical treatises may seem to the reader who does not agree with his assumptions: when he writes on art he seems to join to the subtlety of the thinker and the fervor of the religious man the full-bodied sensibility of the poet.

ELISEO VIVAS

Fiction in Review

ALTHOUGH "The First Lady Chatterley" (Dial Press, $2.75) is only a first version of the famous nowel which D. H. Lawrence wrote three times before he achieved the book he wanted, it is announced on the jacket as "an original and hitherto unpublished novel," quite without mention of "Lady Chatterley's Lover," and it is delivered to the public with a happy air of overthrowing Lawrence's own judgment as to which version of the novel merited publication. Esther Forbes, who helped bring the manuscript to light, writes in her foreword: "Obviously he was a born novelist before he grew a beard, read Freud, and set himself up as the Prophet of sex." This single statement, as vulgar as it is patronizing, serves to indicate the fundamental difference between the first and final drafts of the Lady Chatterley story, and the reason why many readers will wish, like Miss Forbes, to disconnect the two versions of the book, with their preference all in favor of the first version. Sex—Lawrence's kind of sex—is perhaps even less popular today than it was when Lawrence published "Lady Chatterley's Lover." What he called the book-talking, book-thinking people prefer the class struggle, and the first version of Lawrence's novel buries in class conflicts the sexual theme which he was to proclaim in such full voice in the final version.

In broadest outline the two versions of the book are not dissimilar. In each Lawrence is telling the story of a woman who is married to a paralyzed husband and falls in love with a gamekeeper, but there is a drastic revision of detail and a profound shift in emphasis between the first and final texts. It is fascinating to read "The First Lady Chatterley" as the first step in the evolution of Lawrence's difficult idea. In several ways the first version is "artistically" superior to the third version: it is more economical, more visual, and wittier; it is also considerably less cruel. But clearly it not only subordinated but distorted Lawrence's sexual message and therefore had to be discarded.

The evolution of Lawrence's idea is best traced in the evolution of the gamekeeper. Even the name of Constance Chatterley's lover is different in Version 1 and Version 3. In the first draft Mellors is Parkin-an out-and-out proletarian, small, peppery, and ugly, uncouth to the point of cloddishness; when he loses his job at Wragby because of an ugly squabble with his estranged wife, he becomes a truckman in Sheffield and a Communist. In other words, the choice of sexual fulfilment would require Lady Chatterley to give up every educated taste and established value in her life. In "Lady Chatterley's Lover," on the other hand, the gamekeeper is personable, and if he is not a gentleman by birth, his sensibility gives him an air of breeding; his use of the local accent is not necessary, it is symbolic protest; his gamekeeper's profession is also a symbol, of the lonely man. Mellors's place in the social structure is conceived as classless, and it is his role not to threaten the security of the Chatterley class but to represent the power of sexual knowledge and completeness.

Now on the surface this transformation of Parkin into Mellors has the unpleasant look of snobbery. Certainly the promotion of the gamekeeper from a private in the last war to a lieutenant is hard to take; and we have evidence from his other writings that Lawrence was not untouched by snobbery. But he was a peculiar kind of snob. If he was attracted, as a man of his mixed background might well be, by the upper classes, he was at the same time fully aware of their dead ruthlessness. Conversely, although Lawrence had a tendency to romanticize the lower classes, he refused to blind himself to their deadness and their resentful idolatry of their masters. And so double a vision of society is an invitation to satire. There are moments in "The First Lady Chatterley," such as Constance's visit to the gamekeeper's friends, which are almost Shavian. Satire, however, was at odds with the passion in Lawrence's temperaJOHN DAY ment, and as he worked on the Chatterley novel he evidently came to see that his class issues were confusing the sexual issue. The transformation of Parkin into Mellors is the transformation of the Lady Chatterley story from a Shavian problem novel which asks the unanswerable—and pointless—question, "Is the whole world well lost for the sake of sexual fulfilment?" into a thesis novel which asserts Lawrence's passionate conviction that without a healthy sexuality life is meaningless and can turn vicious. The rewritten gamekeeper also saves Lawrence from the fatal error he was always on the point of making, of supposing that sexual neuroticism is a blight to which only the upper classes are subject.

And the transformation, from the first to the third versions, of the character of Mrs. Bolton moves in a similar line of sexual logic. In the early draft Chatterley's nurse is only a harmless gossip, a woman who, because she had once had a marriage of sexual happiness, is capable of a great generosity toward Lady Chatterley. But in the final version Mrs. Bolton is not the passive object of Chatterley's infantile sexuality; she herself finds a complex and rather malign gratification in her unhealthy relationship with her paralyzed master. It is a cruel, disturbing portrait, but its insight is based not alone in sexual understanding but in understanding of the subtle way in which social motives can intertwine with sexual motives. Just as, in the developing study of the gamekeeper, Lawrence rejected class simplicities for human complexities, so also, in the development of the character of Chatterley's nurse, he rejected sentimentality for a frightening reality.

I do not think that in the ordinary terms by which we judge novels "Lady Chatterley's Lover" is a great novel. I think it is a great failure, as a thesis novel is very likely to be, even at its best. Certainly its cruelty diminishes its quality as a work of art, and even as a text. For instance, I have never understood why Lawrence had to paralyze the husband of Lady Chatterley. If Clifford were physically normal, his sexual inadequacy would be less melodramatic and much more relevant to ordinary life; and although Lawrence tries to show us that Clifford's paralysis is only the physical counterpart of a deeper inner crippling which antedates the war, the fact that he was a war victim necessarily makes us sympathetic to him, or at least makes us wish to protect him against Lawrence's relentless pursuit. And all along the line the book is marred by an unforgivingness of judgment-quite as if people are to be condemned for weaknesses which they themselves would well be rid of; it is almost as if Lawrence were fighting a personal fight against their tragedies.

Yet the lesser cruelty of "The First Lady Chatterley" is not enough to compensate for the lesser insight. If the novel in its final form is in many ways horrible, it is still the nowel Lawrence had to write—a fierce truth toward the end of a lifetime spent in search of truth however unpleasant. One thinks of Lawrence writing his heart out with all his novels, and in no case perhaps more than with "Lady Chatterley's Lover," and one wonders whether to be sadder for him that the Chatterley story was once read for its dirty words or that it will now be read because there are scarcely any dirty words at all.

ILLIAN HELLMAN, in her latest play, plunges into a discussion of what are known as vital issues. She is an experienced craftsman, and there is some deft writing in "The Searching Wind" (Fulton Theater). But the play fails for lack of the clarity of thought and feeling essential to both art and political analysis.

This defect is all the more glaring because the subject of Miss Hellman's dissertation is confusion in our time confusion which, on one level, make an appeaser of Ambassador Hazen and, on another, poisons the personal relations between himself and the two women in his life. The unhappy triangle is disposed of in the end by means of a rather glib and far too easy appeal to Freud; on the political side we get a tag line which is a simple-hearted, not to say simple-minded, appeal to love of country. Miss Hellman doesn't even plump for collective security.

Appeasement is the nominal villain of the piece. But it is only named, never examined; and Miss Hellman offers no alternative save the vague patriotism I have mentioned, presents no point of view on which to base a judgment or a choice. Ambassador Hazen's son, who has been wounded in Italy, is bitter because his father is an appeaser, but his bitterness seems to be founded not on any real perception of the issue but on the remarks of his favorite buddy, a baker's son now dead in action, who had twitted him on the fact that his parents associated with appeasers. At the same time Miss Hellman's portrait of Ambassador Hazen is so full of "understanding" and compassion for his confusion that one can't help feeling that she at least forgives him. And finally what are we to make of the American liberal editor, the lovable old non-appeaser, whom she pictures, rather unconvincingly it seems to me, as retiring from public life when and because Mussolini takes power?

Miss Hellman reviews the rise of fascism and the triumph of appeasement in three flashbacks. The first two, showing the onset of fascism in Rome and Berlin, are well done, though both scenes are cluttered by the development of the love triangle, which goes relentlessly on right through the March on Rome, the German inflation, and Munich. The third flashback-which is less good but is notable for a delineation of a Nazi diplomat-deals with the Munich pact. I think there should have been a fourth one, commemorating the Soviet-German pact, but it is clear from the context that Miss Hellman is one of those people who assume that there is a moral difference, though they never explain why, between Chamberlain's attempt to turn Hitler east and Stalin's attempt to turn him west.

Because of her refusal or her incapacity to analyze the moral issues she has chosen to bring up, Miss Hellman has succeeded only in writing a confusing play about confusion—and since it does not really face issues but merely bandies them about, it is pretentious as well, in the worst sense.

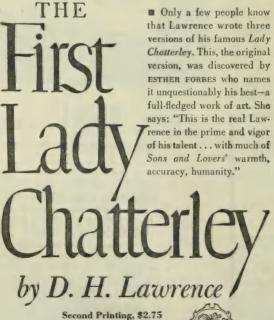

The only other of Miss Hellman's plays that I have seen is "The Little Foxes." She handled its neat, over simplified, and rather inhuman theme with skill and sharpness—she is very expert at the cruel, knowing line. To judge by the present play she is not up to larger human and social themes, though she can write adult dialogue and she knows how to construct a scene.

Dudley Digges gives a polished performance as the aged and peppery liberal editor, though the part is overdone, in both the writing and the acting. The best bit of acting is that of Arnold Korff as Count Max von Stammer—and the part is extremely well written. Montgomery Clift, as the son, wrings a great deal out of a rather barren part.

The two women as portrayed by Cornelia Otis Skinner and Barbara O'Neil hardly seem worth the attention lavished upon them—which is fully equal to that accorded to appeasement. And they are, in the bargain, badly dressed—to what purpose? Seemingly by direction the tension between them is held at such a constant high pitch that it becomes monotonous; and this forcing may account for an awkwardness and stiffness of movement. As for Dennis King, he is almost a burlesque of the diplomatic stuffed shirt—one finds it hard to believe in his passions.

ART

HE showing of Mark Tobey's latest paintings (at the Willard Gallery until April 29) deserves the most special notice. A man of fifty, Tobey has only comparatively recently discovered himself; yet he has already made one of the few original contributions to contemporary American painting. Like Morris Graves-whom he has influenced, it seems-Tobey comes from Seattle. He has a similar affinity with Chinese painting and likewise takes advantage of the carte blanche which Klee's example has latterly given to the graphic imagination. Tobey and Graves have also in common their renunciation of frank color. In the case of Tobey color is a delicate affair of pale tints, intensity being reduced by an omnipresent gray which filters every hue. Tobey's great innovation is his "white writing": the calligraphic, tightly meshed interlacing of white lines which build up to a vertical, rectangular mass reaching almost to the edges of the frame; these cause the picture surface to vibrate in depth-or, better, toward the spectator. Yet this seems little out of which to compose an easel painting. The compensation lies in the intensity, subtlety, and directness with which Tobey registers and transmits emotion usually considered too tenuous to be made the matter of any other art than music. And yet again—his painting is not major. Its mode, which consists in dividing and subdividing within a very narrow compass of sensations, gives the artist too little room in which to vary and amplify. It is obligatory that Tobey work to expand his range.

Those who question the capacity of the twentieth century to produce final statements in art should see the cubist still lifes and collages executed by Juan Gris in 1916 (in the representative show of his work at the Buchholz Gallery through April 29). They are already archaic—in the best and fullest sense of the word. There is the same counterplay of the structural and the rhythmic, the symmetrical and the dynamic: monumental silhouettes in creamy blacks that seem to include the whole spectrum are counterpoised by the lyrical space between their edges and those of the canvas. Gris's best cubism was synthetic rather than analytic—that is, he dissected his theme and only put it together again when new relationships between its parts had been invented. The reconstruction was usually embalmed under a heavy waxen finish which gave it an old-master look of inevitability and permanence. But much more than a finish is responsible for the old mastery of Gris's art. A picture such as the "Still Life with Collage" is the best touchstone I know by which to compare and assess the work of the ambitious painters of our time.

ITH each new and greater victory of the Russian armies all that Stalin has to do is order a salute fired by a greater number of guns. But for his composer-laureate the task of producing a greater pronouncement each time is more difficult. After the halfhour of noisy commotion in the first movement of his Seventh Symphony what more can Shostakovitch do in the first movement of the Eighth? Certainly not more and noisier commotion; and so he reverses the process and fills the half-hour with slow melody which pushes and strains, and in which each sound in fact is prolonged and distended to the utmost. This movement provides the required opening grandiloquence; after that Shostakovitch can take things easier for two movements with the lively, grimacing hubbub of his natural inclination; in the fourth-movement passacaglia there is again the slow pretentious straining of the first movement, but this time only briefly; and in the finale, a pastorale concerned with the more joyous times of peace ahead, he can again fall back on lively hubbub and end this time not with a brassy affirmation of triumph but with tranquil major chords of the high strings over last portentous mutterings down below -almost exactly as Strauss ended "Also sprach Zarathustra."

In addition to what works of art communicate directly there is what they convey indirectly; and in addition to what Shostakovitch's music has "said" it has always conveyed to me as low-grade a mind and taste as I can recall having come into contact with through an artistic medium. In this the Eighth Symphony was like the rest; but it also gave me the impression-even at moments when it proclaimed most loudly-of that mind's utter and desperate weariness in the face of what was demanded of it. When each grandiloquent sound was being prolonged and distended in the first movement, it was as though that mind were trying in this way to delay as long as possible the moment when it would have to produce the next grandiloguent sound.

For a long time I have intended to report on an excellent article in the English magazine Horizon, in which Gerald Abraham, writing with friendly interest, examines the succession of Shostakovitch's works, describes their features of idiom, style, and form, and relates these to factors in Shostakovitch and outside him. I still intend to do so: and I will also discuss some of the other contents of the book "Eight Soviet Composers" (Oxford, $1.50) in which the article has been published with other good articles on Prokofiev, Khatchaturian, Knipper, Shebalin, Kabalevsky, Dzerzhinsky, and Shaporin, and with a general introduction on the functioning of the composer in Soviet Russia.

The people who are victimized by a book like Abraham Veinus's "The Concerto" (Doubleday, $3.50) have asked for it, literally. They are not content to take the individual form in sound as an individual form in sound, for the effect it was intended to produce on their minds and emotions as a form in sound; they insist on taking it as a fact in history—the history of musical styles and forms, and general cultural and social history. Nor is it merely that after listening to Mozart's G minor Symphony and being affected by it as a piece of music they want the additional knowledge of its relation to other symphonies and to the culture and events of its period; it is rather that they think they must have this knowledge in order to "understand" the symphony properly-when in fact they don't need it at all; and at worst they think that they listen to the G minor only to hear its place in the history of musical forms and its relation to the culture and events of its period. One can say they think this because they have been taught to think it. For one thing they have been taught it in the courses in "history and appreciation of music," in which, sometimes for lack of the insight with which to illuminate the music itself, the "appreciation" of this or that form has been made "a study of the development of the form that correlates it with concomitant social and cultural developments." And they have been taught it by everything they have read and heard-including most recently the pronouncements of the musicologists with an interest in everything about music except the music as something to hear and be affected by, and on the other hand the talk about Shostakovitch in Russia and our own little Shostakovitches here. One listens to a symphony to hear about the suffering and heroism of the Russian people, or about the bleak Kansas plains; and so one listens to Mozart's G minor to hear about eighteenth-century superficiality and artificiality.

But whatever the reasons the fact is that the public asks for books on the development of this or that musical form. On the other hand the fact is also that while it is the public which asks for them, it is Mr. Veinus who, in response to this demand, uses in "The Concerto" the technique he used in his Victor leaflets-that is, whips about two per cent of historical fact and one per cent of musical perception into a lot of glib verbiage about supposed "developments" of style and form which for the most part occurred only in his own mind, and which misrepresent not only the character and meaning of the individual pieces of music they refer to but even their style and form.

The Shape of Things

THE GREATEST NEWS OF THE WEEK IS NEWS of an event that has not happened. From every neutral rumor factory and from the capitals of the warring countries come stories of the imminent assault on Fortress Europe. Observers piece together such items as the concentrated bombing of Nazi communication centers, the high spring tides, the removal of civilians from invasion areas, the unheard-of restrictions placed by Britain on the movements and messages of diplomats, indications of coordinated military actions on the eastern and western fronts. From these happenings many calculations have been made and announced. Their accuracy can be checked when the first Allied soldier wades ashore on the first Continental beachhead. But no one doubts that the attack will come soon or that the last phase of the war is about to begin. It is only the duration of the struggle that remains uncertain. Has the Allied command learned the lessons provided by the mighty Russian offensive and by our own experience in North Africa and Italy? The most obvious and urgent one is the necessity of operating on a scale great enough to prevent the enemy from regrouping his forces and moving them in to meet new thrusts. Ludwig Renn's article this week shows clearly how the Russians have accomplished this vital objective. Another lesson is the necessity of utilizing to the full the resistance forces inside each country. We failed to do this in Italy; indeed, the effect of our unhappy political strategy there was to neutralize the entire underground movement. Perhaps better plans have been made for cooperating with the resistance in France and the other Western nations. Unfortunately, such plans require political as well as military ability, and this is something our leaders notoriously lack. On the other hand, the anti-fascist forces in Western Europe are well organized, tempered, and bitterly determined—far more so than in southern Italy. They need arms-and the confidence of the Allied commanders. The length of the war and the number of Allied lives lost will largely depend on how much of both they get.

THE CONFERENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL Labor Organization at Philadelphia opened with a demonstration by the Workers' Section against the fascist dictatorship in Argentina. Under the leadership of Lombardo Toledano, Mexican labor delegate and president of the Latin American Federation of Labor, the section voted fourteen to three in favor of excluding the Argentine labor representative, Luis Girola, and his advisers. Speaking to the press, Toledano indicted the Argentine government for its wholesale suppression of freedom, including the freedom of labor organization. It was not, he argued, merely one of those personal dictatorships common in Latin American history but a government based on a theory totally opposed to democracy. Moreover, he continued, it was spreading its poison throughout Latin America, creating a Western political front for Hitler. A minority composed of the United States, British and Australian delegates accepted Girola's statement that, while the Argentine unions had suffered some interference, they remain substantially free. Robert Watt, A. F. of L. representative, suggested that it might be unwise to probe too deeply into the question of how freely unions could operate under a dictatorship. That, he indicated, would raise doubts about the good faith of other delegations. This attitude is not quite consistent with that of the A. F. of L. in regard to the Russian unions. What is more important, and dangerous, however, is its passive acceptance of the dilution of the workers' voting strength in the I. L. O. through the admission to their section of totalitarian stooges.

GENERAL MACARTHUR'S LAME ATTEMPT TO get out from under the political disaster of the Miller letters is as fatuous as his original replies were stupid. "Sinister" seems to be a favorite word with the General; he "entirely repudiates" the "sinister interpretation" that his letters "were intended as criticism of any political philosophy or of any personages in higher office." This will come as a surprise to the Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press, which welcomed the letters as such, and to any person who can read English. The General's letters to Representative Miller were certainly much more than the "amiable acknowledgments" he now terms them. MacArthur did not include, as a wiser man would have done, even a single phrase on which he could fall back to prove that he had not been utterly lacking in the respect due his commander-in-chief and the loyalty one expects in a soldier. The reaction of the Republican and conservative press indicates just how big a blunder Mac-Arthur has made. The New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, the Washington Post, and even the New York Sun condemned or deplored the General's attitude. the Sun saying that as a politician MacArthur "belongs somewhere near the foot of the class."

THE PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE IN London will have repercussions far beyond the bounds of the British Commonwealth. British pressure for a more closely knit empire has found expression in the speech of Lord Halifax in Toronto and the more recent speeches of such polar opposites as Mr. Shinwell and Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons, Mr. Shinwell urged that Britain seek its post-war markets within the empire and Mr. Churchill reminded the House that the Atlantic Charter had expressly provided for the continuation of a system of imperial preference. This emphasis comes as a distinct blow to those who thought that an inclusive system of multilateral trade agreements was a comparatively easy step in the direction of international collaboration. Britain's concern for its competitive post-war position is undoubtedly due partly to uncertainty about our foreign policy and our willingness to accept commitments after the war. Unfortunately, the solution it seeks appears neither realistic nor likely to lead to happy results. In the first place, it seems to run counter to prevailing trends within the Commonwealth. Our close relations with Canada have made us aware of its intense national consciousness and its competence to handle its own foreign policy as exemplified in trade agreements and joint defense and joint economic arrangements. Recent statements by the leaders of the three major Canadian political parties indicate little desire to follow the British lead and a solid determination to preserve the Commonwealth on its present basis. In the second place, moves toward a more centralized empire and a tight system of imperial preference will provide an excellent excuse for our own economic imperialists to swing into action. Prime Minister King of Canada was giving sound advice to us all when in reply to Lord Halifax he "rejected the idea of inevitable rivalry between the great powers" and stated that Canada would strive for "close cooperation among those great states themselves and all like-minded countries."

DRASTIC DEFENSE REGULATIONS AIMING AT instigators of strikes have been decreed by the British government in an attempt to check the wave of walkouts. There is no doubt that recent stoppages in the coal fields and shipyards have seriously affected production, but it is debatable whether the situation will be improved by police measures. If it were true that such strikes were mostly the work of professional agitators, jail sentences and fines might effect a cure. But while the Communists inveigh against subversive Trotskyites, no one familiar with British labor can believe that such elements are strong enough to play a role of real importance. It would be more realistic to seek a psychological explanation for most of the recent strikes. After five years of constant overwork on slim rations the British workers are now experiencing the strain of waiting for invasion and the climax of the struggle. When "D-Day" arrives we may be sure they will close the ranks, but meanwhile Labor Minister Ernest Bevin's order may serve to heighten irritation rather than decrease it. It is true that the order, while imposing penalties up to five years' imprisonment and a $2,000 fine for persons found guilty of fomenting strikes, does not prohibit the advocacy of strikes in properly constituted union meetings. But as Aneurin Bevan, M.P., has pointed out, this safeguard amounts to "liberty by license" and, in addition, contrives to put the rank-and-file trade unionists in the hands of their officials. Mr. Bevan's claim that the order should have been first submitted to Parliament will attract some support in the House of Commons. But the military situation will probably enable the government to avert any open rebellion among the members.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR HAS issued its program for the post-war period. It is in many ways an admirable document which manages to avoid the evils of abstract internationalism into which so much liberal and labor thought is easily betrayed. It pleads for "the transformation of the war-time alliances of the United Nations into an organization for peace" and insists that "unilateral action and regional understandings are valid only when in accord with measures taken by the General International Organization." There is, however, a curious emphasis upon the necessity of maintaining "free enterprise" which occasionally suggests that the document might have emanated from the National Association of Manufacturers rather than a federation of labor. One would expect to find labor more definitely committed to planning per se, though one may be gratified that labor also recognizes the peril to liberty in any overall collectivism. As a matter of fact on most of the specific issues the A. F. of L. program demands a great deal of planning and calls for all kinds of political controls of the industrial process and governmental guaranties of minimal standards. Why this pragmatic approach should be confused by an abstract and absolute identification of democracy with "free enterprise" is a mystery which a future student of our social history may find difficult to unravel. Or perhaps he will find in it the key to our major difficulties; for it reveals to what degree the dogmas of the owning groups have affected the political thought of all classes.

OUR HATS ARE OFF TO OUR CONTEMPORARY the New Yorker for its definitive profile of J. B. Matthews, "director of research" of the Dies committee. Matthew Josephson and Russell Maloney are the gifted biographers, and the piece appeared in the issue of April 22. A paragraph on the semantics of the Dies committee cites the following useful syllogism: "No conservative is a Communist; most New Dealers are not conservatives; therefore most New Dealers are Communists." We recommend the piece to all our readers and, more particularly, to members of Congress.

The Rules of Trade

THE Honorable Harold Knutsen, Republican minority leader of the all-important House Ways and Means Committee, is reported to have said in commenting on the new World Money Stabilization plan: "They deny, but not to my satisfaction, that if this super-world government is going to fix gold values, they will also have the power to tell us what our tariffs are going to be." It does not need a psychologist to detect here the normal fear reaction to the mysterious. The Representative, when he made his statement, had not had time to study the plan, let alone understand it. Had he managed to penetrate its unfortunately opaque phraseology and to translate into concrete terms its severely abstract ideas, he would surely have realized that its weakness is over-caution rather than over-ambition.

Certainly this proposal for an International Stabilization Fund, which has been agreed upon in principle by the experts of some thirty nations, suggests nothing approaching a super-government. At every point the plan defers humbly to national sovereignties. The strongest powers it proposes for the managers of the Fund are of a negative kind. If, for instance, a member state persistently buys more abroad than it sells, causing the Fund to accumulate an excessive amount of its national money. the managers may refuse to sell it other currencies until it takes steps to restore its balance of payments. At no foreseeable date is the United States likely to find itself in this position. What is much more probable is that if we continue, as for years past, to sell more goods and services abroad than we buy, the demand on the Fund for dollars will outrun the supply. In this event, the managers may apportion the supply and authorize member states to restrict exchange dealing in dollars with a view of rationing their own nationals. This step would, of course, tend to reduce the demand for American commodities. And while taking this provisional precaution, it would be the duty of the Fund to report on the causes of dollar scarcity and recommend a remedy.

Such recommendations might reasonably include proposals for a reduction of American tariffs since this would enable other countries to sell more goods here and thus replenish, indirectly, the Fund's supply of dollars. But it would still be the privilege of Congress to accept or reject the suggestion. The only power behind the management would be the force of public opinion, which might well express itself strongly if it were realized that the rejection of the recommendations could lead to a breakdown of the world monetary system.

There is a widespread belief in this country that we ought to expand our foreign trade after the war. Many business-men are looking to world markets as an outlet for surplus goods and a means of maintaining employment. Everyone recognizes that foreign trade cannot be safely conducted when money values fluctuate violently. Hence there is a demand, which this new plan seeks to satisfy, to anchor the chief currencies of the world firmly to gold. Representative Knutson would agree, we are sure, that the world should be made safe for American commerce. But we cannot expect to combine expanding trade and stable exchanges with a chronically favorable balance of payments. We must either buy from other countries the equivalent of what we sell or force them to fall back on exchange restrictions and barter.

Recent discussions in Britain of a sterling bloc, which have so alarmed some commentators here, do not mean that the British have turned their backs on the ideal of an expanding multilateral exchange of goods as envisaged in the Atlantic Charter. They indicate, rather, a search for an alternative method of maintaining that volume of trade without which Britain cannot survive, in case the United States insists on continuing to try and play the game of international commerce on the basis of purely national rules.

The proposals which have been agreed on in Washington as a basis for discussion at the forthcoming world monetary conference are an attempt to draw up new rules. They are not definite and they do not impose policies on any nation. But if they are adopted they imply a steady reduction of trade barriers everywhere. For we cannot begin to cure the disorders of the international exchanges unless we first understand, and act on the understanding, that trade is an exchange of benefits.

Labor and the A. T. & T.

THE American Telephone and Telegraph Company has always boasted of the wide distribution of its stock and implied that the company was virtually a publicly owned concern. But its management, using the proxies in its control, has just indignantly rejected a proposal at the annual meeting that its employees be represented on the board. The proposal was made by the United Telephone Organization, an independent union, which nominated its president and another union official for A. T. and T. directorships. On a democratic basis the employees of the company have a strong case for representation on the board, since they represent the largest single stockholding interest. Not even the largest insurance companies own more than 1 per cent of the 18,000,000-odd shares outstanding, but the company's employees, who owned about a million shares in 1930. still hold some 600,000 today, or about 3 per cent of the total. If the sale of stock to employees is to be a means of democratizing industry, as big-business apologists often contend, then we think A. T. and T.'s workers ought to have a voice on its board.

One reason why management is so strongly opposed to labor representation was indicated when counsel for the union charged that 185,000 employees were discharged in the years from 1929 to 1936, while the $9 dividend rate was being maintained. A labor representative would fight to maintain employment at the expense of dividends. The fullest employment practicable also means better service for the public, but aside from that the public interest would be served by labor representation. An example was provided by another union resolution introduced at the annual meeting, and promptly snowed under by management proxies. This was to discontinue negotiations to transfer A. T. and T.'s teletype, leased lines, telegraphic facilities, and (we understand also) certain communications patents to Western Union. Labor's primary interest in this, of course, is to maintain employment at A. T. and T. But this happens to coincide with a public interest in maintaining some vestiges of competition in telegraphic communications now that the merger of Western Union and Postal has been approved.

We don't know why A. T. and T. is willing to negotiate the surrender of this portion of its business to Western Union. We think that on investigation, and we hope the Federal Communications Committee will investigate the proposed transfer, it might be found that there were interlocking interests between the two companies and between them and certain communications equipment manufacturing concerns. It is also possible that there is a "gentlemen's agreement" not to invade each other's preserves. But we do know that Western Union, unlike A. T. and T., has been a very backward company technologically. The extent of this backwardness is fully and graphically set forth in the dissent which Clifford I. Durr of the FCC filed last year in opposition to the commission's order approving the merger with Postal. On the basis of the record, there is good reason to believe that Western Union might use its control of A. T. and T. facilities and processes merely to limit competition and to stifle new communications methods.

Commissioner Durr, citing the testimony of Western Union's vice-president in charge of engineering, pointed out that the company planned to take ten years after the war to instal reperforation equipment. This device is "now conceded to be obsolete." Not until after that time will the company "turn its attention to more efficient methods, which the witness stated are already available and proved to be practicable from an economic as well as engineering standpoint." The progress promised is at a snail's pace, and the snail's pace is at the expense of the public. Commissioner Durr compared the situation to that of a drayman "who promises to replace his old wagon . . . but refuses to buy a truck until his horse is too old for further use." Durr predicted that "he may well find that his competitor's truck has made his horse valueless long before ripened years have entitled it to retirement to pasture." To carry on Durr's metaphor, it would seem that the drayman is now anxious to buy the old competing truck and put it out of business so that he can continue to operate a horse and wagon profitably. The A. T. and T. union has demonstrated its public usefulness by calling attention to the proposed deal with Western Union. Fortunately, as Walter Gifford of A. T. and T. admitted, its consummation requires the approval of the FCC.

Peace Terms for Japan III—Political

IT IS generally agreed that the military and economic clauses of the ultimate peace treaty with Japan will have to be strict enough to prevent any possibility of Japan recouping its strength for a new adventure in world conquest within the foreseeable future. But if the basis of a lasting peace is to be laid in the Far East, means will have to be found to bring Japan within the orbit of democracy. This will be facilitated if the economic peace terms are drawn in such a way as to facilitate a higher standard of living in Japan.

The political conditions to be imposed upon Japan are equally important. The Japanese are an extraordinarily proud people; they have long chafed under the smug attitude of superiority demonstrated by many Westerners. This aspect of Japanese psychology undoubtedly made it easier for the Japanese militarists to obtain general support for what was at best a desperate war against great odds. Unless strenuous corrective measures are taken, the shock of defeat will accentuate the peculiar quirks in the Japanese character. This can only be avoided if the political conditions of peace are designed to encourage the mind-healing democratic forces that until now have been crushed by the militarists.

Many people despair of a constructive approach to the Japanese problem because of the weakness of the democratic elements within Japan. Admittedly, they are weak, compared with similar forces in Germany or Italy. But they are stronger than most Americans realize. In Japan's last "free election," at the end of April, 1937, the Japanese people expressed themselves clearly as opposed to the militarists' aggressive program. A series of strong antiwar strikes developed in the Japanese munitions industries in the fall of 1941. Articles have appeared in the Tokyo press complaining that some Japanese were being "infected by American and British ideas." This may not seem to be much to go on, but it must be remembered that an overwhelming majority of the Japanese people, peasants and workers alike, have been ruthlessly exploited by the militarist-industrialist coalition. If we can destroy the bonds by which they are held in subjection, the political climate of Japan may change.

One of the most effective means utilized by the militarists to strengthen their hold over the masses is the doctrine of Emperor worship. By taking upon themselves the right to speak in the Emperor's name, the militarists were able not only to dominate policy but to make sure of wide-spread popular support for their imperialist program. The unique position of the Emperor in Japanese psychology is a factor which must be reckoned with in the peace treaty. Indignities heaped upon his person without ideological preparation would almost certainly fan the fires of Japanese nationalism and thwart all efforts to bring the Japanese people into the democratic camp. Some observers with long experience in Japan even go so far as to urge that the Emperor be retained as a stabilizing force in the Japanese political structure and that the required transformation of the Japanese social structure be made, as past Japanese revolutions have been made, in the Emperor's name. The objection to this proposal is that the whole conception of the Emperor as Son of Heaven is inescapably linked with the mystic Kodo (imperial way) which the militarists have used to justify their campaign for world conquest. If Japan is to be transformed into a peaceloving nation, the imperial myths must be discredited.

Obviously, this cannot be done overnight. Nor can it be imposed by dicta in the peace treaty. Nothing short of a thoroughgoing revolution can accomplish this task quickly. Nevertheless, it is essential that conditions be established under which the Emperor can be detached from the militarists, and the development of modern, progressive ideas encouraged among the Japanese people. As a step in this direction, Shintoism might be banned as a state religion on the ground that it sanctions a policy of aggression inconsistent with the requirements of peace. Properly handled, the discrediting of the Emperor cult, much of the symbolism of which is of comparatively recent origin, may not prove as difficult as many Westerners have believed. Many Japanese have indirectly revealed their doubts regarding it. Defeat should deal a heavy blow to the Emperor's prestige. And positive measures to bring Japan back into the family of nations would help to free the Japanese mind from medieval

This last is particularly important. Steps must be taken to restore a sense of dignity to the Japanese people. Once a democratic leadership has manifested itself, it must be strengthened by all possible means. The Allies must make it clear from the outset that a place will be found in the council of nations for a genuinely democratic Japanese government. If possible, special encouragement should be given to the trade-union movement. A democratic Japan should be given full and free access to the world's raw materials and markets so that it may provide a standard of living for its people that was never possible under militarism. There can be no guaranty that these measures will be successful. But the one hope of permanent peace in the Far East lies in this direction.

The Shadow Over the Capital

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 20 EPRESENTATIVE COX of Georgia is no longer chairman of the Special House Committee Investigating the Federal Communications Commission, and Eugene L. Garey is out as counsel, but these changes do not seem to have made much difference in the committee's approach and tactics. The questions asked Mrs. Hilda D. Shea, former chief of the Special Studies Section of the FCC's War Policies Division, deserve attention. Harry S. Barger, the committee's new counsel, seems to be carrying on in the Garey tradition. Garey is a partner of Liberty Leaguer Raoul E. Desvernine, and was counsel for I. G. Farben interests and allies in several suits designed to keep General Aniline and Film from American control. Garey appeared to think it one of his duties to find out which employees of the FCC were Jewish. Barger's questions were designed to elicit the fact that Mrs. Shea's maiden name was Jewish and that her father was a Russian immigrant. This information would, of course, be highly relevant in a Nazi court. Barger ought to go back where he should have come from.

Mrs. Shea was called upon to deny that she was a Communist or Communist sympathizer, but she admitted -sit tight for a horrendous revelation!-that while enployed as an attorney by the National Labor Relations Board she received a letter from Mrs. Beatrice M. Stern, an NLRB division chief, asking her to support Labor's Non-Partisan League. Barger pointed out that the league was sponsored by the C. I. O., which he no doubt regards as a subversive organization, but with striking forbearance made no reference to the fact that the league was equally notorious as a labor-front group designed to reelect F- D- R- Mrs. Shea was also asked whether she belonged to the National Lawyers' Guild, but she said she didn't. Barger disclosed that the guild had been described as a Communist-front organization. I can't imagine what Barger will be discovering next.

Barger is not a very funny joke. He and his committee are only one of the agencies fouling the air of Washington and making the city unlivable for progressive government employees. We have just seen the Dies and Kerr committees drive from public life so fine and honorable a man as Robert Morss Lovett. I note that Lovett, who is incorrigible, has just been reelected a vice-president of the League for Industrial Democracy, along with such other subversives as John Haynes Holmes, Alexander Meiklejohn, and Bishop Francis J. McConnell. Their careers may be found-fully set forth in Mrs. Elizabeth Dilling's "The Red Network." While Mrs. Dilling is on trial for sedition, her faithful readers seem to be carrying on quite nicely at the Capitol.

It is not entirely irrelevant at this point to take note of the address delivered this week by J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the FBI, before the annual meeting of the Daughters of the American Revolution in New York. Hoover's principal animus, in the frankest speech this old hero of the Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press has permitted himself in several years, was aimed at "militant, self-seeking, loudly vocal groups of muddled emotionalists, parlor pinks, fellow-travelers, and avowed Communists." Hoover said the FBI keeps strictly out of politics. But at the beginning of a Presidential campaign one may wonder just what political movement was identified with Hoover's words by the good ladies of the D. A. R., who have long suspected the President and the New Deal of the worst.

I wonder what the ladies thought Hoover meant when he attacked "superficial sugar-coated panaceas that are neither democratic nor defensible"-these ladies who voted a resolution urging Congressmen to oppose passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for compulsory federal health insurance. I am revealing no secrets when I report that the press corps here thought of pro-Roosevelt PM when Hoover criticized as "irresponsible" those editors who "not only proclaim their personal views but urge their readers to wire or write their demands urging this or that action." Had the wicked editors been named they would have grounds for libel action in Hoover's next sentence, "The fascist-minded tyrant is no different from the native-born communistic-minded corruptionist." If all this isn't sly dabbling in politics, the dictionary must have been revised since I last looked at it.

This revived appearance of n way of thinking some people hoped J. Edgar Hoover had outgrown is a serious matter for the post-war period. The FBI will be in part responsible for the enforcement of New Deal legislation for the protection of labor's right to organize. It cannot function effectively if it is to be operated in political illueracy and obscurantism, and the way in which it does comport itself may play a crucial role in the readjustment of our society to peace-time conditions. "The guaranties which the Constitution throws around civil liberties," the La Follette committee said in the first of its great reports on employers' associations and collective bargaining in California, "are neither pious declarations nor archaic echoes of the historic past; they are the ground plan for the healthy functioning of an industrial society. Their infraction will shatter our democratic society upon its internal conflicts; their fulfilment will enable it to achieve a strength and unity which no domestic or foreign enemy can challenge."

Before the war the FBI had become the top agency and in many ways the national coordinator for local and state police activities, and these were often aimed at the suppression of labor's rights. How the local and state authorities operated in California is dramatically set forth in the La Follette committee's latest report, Part VIII of the California series. This deals with the Associated Farmers and warns that "there is good reason to believe that the pattern of California in the years 1935-39 is the pattern for the United States today or tomorrow." It points out that from the days of Greece and Rome to "the struggles in Eastern Europe after World War No. 1, the relationship of men to the land they worked and to the fruits of their labor has been the nub of endless tyranny and conflict." It recalls "the participation of the landed Junkers in Hitler's rise to power, the place of the large landholders of rich Italian valleys in the vanguard of Mussolini's early maneuvers, the support of fascist rule in Spain and Hungary by similar groups."

These lessons, the La Follette committee says, "cannot be ignored." Agriculture is a major form of livelihood for the American people. California is the state which exhibits most clearly what may happen as large landholdings increase, as agriculture becomes more scientific, and as it develops into a big business rather than a way of life: "It is inevitable that the pattern set for employeremployee relationships in agriculture in California, if retrogressive, reactionary, or semi-fascist in tone, will be a great blow to the cause of economic democracy." Before the war, as the report shows, state and local police in California were often so closely interlocked with employer associations and their labor spies and provocateurs as to seem part of one great machine for the oppression of labor, agricultural and industrial. The Associated Farmers itself owed its financing largely to the California Packing Corporation and the Industrial Association of San Francisco; local and state police, hired thugs and vigilantes did the dirty work. Some of the principal police characters, such as "Red" Hynes of Los Angeles, who was paid $6,727.40 by the Associated Farmers from February, 1935, to May, 1937, exchanged information with the FBI.

If there is any hope of carrying over into the post-war period the better employee-employer relations developed during the war, much will depend on the FBI and the Department of Justice and their influence over local and state police. Much will also depend on the spirit prevailing in Washington, and especially in Congress. Among many business men, in California, here, and elsewhere, there are signs of a new spirit that is most encouraging. But I cannot report the same of official Washington.

How the Red Army Wins

BY LUDWIG RENN

Mexico City, April 10

THE Russian offensive that began last winter has political as well as military objectives. The political aim is to free the satellite countries from German domination; the military, to get into position for an attack on Germany itself. The strategy of the Russian general staff enables Russia to hold its reserves in readiness near Moscow and at the same time forces the Germans to scatter their reserves so that they are not available in large numbers to repel an attack at any point. Stalin is trying, especially, to draw the Nazi reserves toward the northern and southern ends of the front.

The Red Army is able to follow this strategic plan because the country behind the Russian lines is a plain over which a network of railroads and highways is spread pretty evenly, whereas the country behind the Nazi lines presents three great obstacles to transportation and communication. In the center are the Pripet Marshes, a hundred miles wide and a hundred miles deep; in the north is the Gulf of Finland, separating Finland from Estonia; in the south is the great horseshoe of the Carpathians and the Transylvanian Alps. Under the limitations imposed by these facts of geography, the main Nazi communication and transport system runs northward from Warsaw in a corridor between the battle front and the Baltic Sea, and southward in another corridor between the battle front and the Carpathians. Thus it is possible for the Red Army, by parallel thrusts on both sides of the Pripet Marshes, to threaten both the communications leading from the extreme northern wing in Finland and Estonia through Poland into Germany, and those leading from the southern wing on the Black Sea through Bucharest, Budapest, and Vienna into Germany.

Correspondents never tire of repeating that if the railroads running northeast through the Carpathians were cut, the Nazi armies in the south would have no means of retreat. Actually, however, the most important effect would be to make the transportation of German reserves, most of which are in Poland, slower by days or even weeks. Faced with this possibility, Hitler may feel compelled to divide his reserves into two parts, one in Poland and one in Hungary and Rumania. In that case he would, indeed, have a better distribution of reserves near the front, but those in the south would be unable to help those in the north, and vice versa; whereas Stalin is able to move any part of his reserves quickly to any part of the front.

One of the favorite strategic devices of the Russian general staff is to force Hitler to move ever-increasing numbers of troops on ever-diminishing railway facilities; as a result it frequently happens that by the time the Nazi reinforcements arrive on the field the battle is already lost-the cannon and other heavy arms abandoned, the beaten troops in full flight. The Russians do this by attacking alternately north and south of the Pripet Marshes. Thus in the first months of last winter they exerted pressure exclusively in the south; then at the turn of the year they suddenly attacked with great force in the north, wiped out the powerful Nazi army besieging Leningrad, and rolled southwest to Grenz and Pskov. Hitler's troops were driven halfway to the Baltic before they were able to make a stand. The northern corridor was cut down to half its former width, and the next attack in this sector will probably close it altogether.

At present the Russians are attacking with ever-increasing force in the south.

This southern offensive marks a departure from the methods used up to now. In all previous campaigns two armies were united under one leader-under an attacking general such as Zhukov, Konev, or Vatutin. This time, however, there seem to be three double armies moving in close coordination under one command. Their purpose, now that they have squeezed the Nazis into a narrow corridor on the southern front, is apparently to make them transfer troops back and forth behind the lines as much as possible. Since the north-south trains and trucks carrying reinforcements from one part of the front to another cross the routes of the east-west trains and trucks bringing up reserves, the resulting confusion is almost unbelievable. In the face of this three-pronged Russian attack, the Nazi reserves and reinforcements have almost always arrived too late.

The most sensational part of the campaign thus far has been General Konev's drive in one week across the Bug and Dniester rivers, where the Nazis must have prepared strong defenses. Already the most important railroad east of the Carpathians, the Warsaw-Odessa line, has been cut, and by the time this article appears in print the Russians will almost certainly have captured the last highway in the southern corridor. The Red Army has also pushed on into Hungary and Rumania, and panic has resulted in both countries.

But just as the correspondents were wrong in predicting that the Nazi armies in the Ukraine would have to surrender, so they were wrong in predicting that Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria would sue for peace. No one seems to have asked how these countries could do such a thing. Could Hitler possibly allow Hungary to back out of the war now that the southern corridor is lost and the supply line for the southern armies must run through Budapest? Could he permit the Bulgarians to make peace and place their railroads at the disposal of the Russians? Then the Red Army could cross the Black Sea, roll through Bulgaria to join hands with Marshal Tito in Yugoslavia, and establish a Balkan front almost a thousand miles long, stretching northward through Rumania, Hungary, and Austria. To forestall such a development, Hitler has occupied Hungary, Slovakia, and Rumania-to whatever extent they were not already occupied.

The Russian victories in the south have had great political as well as military consequences. When Hitler occupied the Balkan countries, he had to send many divisions into them. This did not weaken his reserves as much as may have been thought, for the occupation troops were also used as fighting reserves. But of course these reserves are many miles away from the northern front and from France. The occupation, moreover, has weakened the position of Hitler's friends in the satellite countries. Hitler never had any sympathizers among the workers and peasants of the Balkans; now he is losing the nationalists and militarists too. It is quite possible that the nationalist officers of the Balkan armies will sabotage Hitler's war or even go over to the Russians with their troops.

What can be expected in the immediate future on the Russian front? The Soviet armies in the south will probably keep up their pressure, seeking to draw large contingents of Hitler's reserves down to the Black Sea. Meanwhile, the northern Russian armies are accumulating heavy siege material. Soon we shall see another drive in this sector, as they try to push on to the Baltic Sea, overrun the northern corridor, and isolate Finland. Heavy losses of men and material will be suffered, but there is no other way to win a war. The disappointing results of British and American operations in Italy have demonstrated that.

The landing at Nettuno, between Cassino and Rome, was intended to cut a railroad and encircle a large force of Nazis. But apparently the whole action was planned on a miniature scale, in order to risk as few losses as possible, and so it failed. It didn't even cause the Nazis to send a large number of troops into Italy. Such actions always fail if they are carried out too cautiously. In the east the war is being conducted on a large scale and with an energy that must be frightening to Hitler; in the west it is confined to local actions, on separate fronts, without coordination.

If the Western Allies attack France in the same cautious manner, Hitler will be able to stop them with occupation troops already there. But if they attack in great strength he will have to draw on his reserves elsewhere. At the same time he will have to use more occupation troops to guard against a French uprising, just as he has been forced to do in the Balkans. The Red Army is making it very difficult for Hitler to transport his reserves from one part of the eastern front to another. If a big second front should develop, he would be further hampered by the necessity of moving troops from Poland to France. Then the Red Army, in its accustomed manner, could force him to scatter the rest of his reserves, after which it would be in a position to liberate the Balkan countries.

The First World War was won only when the three fronts—in France, around Salonika, and in Palestine—were coordinated. And only by coordinating the eastern and western fronts can the Allies liberate the Bulgarians, the Austrians, and the wavering Turks from the Nazis. If, for example, the Allies gave Tito really substantial help, it would be possible to establish good coordination between east and west. But in order to bring this about we must get rid of the widespread delusion that Hitler's Wehrmacht can be defeated without serious losses on our side.

ANY PEOPLE UNDERESTIMATE the German Nazis. National Socialism represents much more than an anti-Jewish movement. Nazis are not mere "political gangsters and racketeers." They have principles. They even have a philosophy. . . . An official summary of [the Law for the Regulation of National Labor] states that "the basis of the new social constitution is the factory. The 'leader' (Führer) of the factory is the owner. He decides on all factory matters. . . . The following must show its leader the loyalty which is founded on the factory community." The manufacturer has become a Führer, and the workers are his faithful "following." This is the socialism of the National Socialists. It would not be very difficult to convert every capitalist in the world to such socialism.—LOUIS FISCHER, April 4, 1934.

FOR SOME ODD REASON, the activities of newspaper workers do not seem to constitute news of equal value with those, let us say, of newspaper publishers. Nevertheless, the American Newspaper Guild continues to grow with amazing speed.—PAUL Y. ANDERSON, April 4, 1934.

THANKS TO THE INDISCRETIONS of Senator W. T. Thayer of the New York Legislature, it looks as if some of Governor Lehman's bills for the better control of public utilities might be enacted into law. Any legislator who opposes them will be in the unenviable position of having to explain to his constituents how much he got and from whom. . . . For years the legislative committees at Albany have been graveyards for measures intended to curb the rapacity of utility companies, and the fact that Mr. Thaver is a member-was until recently chairman-of the Senate Public Service Committee may be explanatory. It is a commentary on contemporary civilization that although the insignificant Thayer has been bombarded with questions and is threatened with impeachment, nobody has said boo to the Associated Gas and Electric Company. That it should be engaged in bribery and bilking the public seems to be regarded as normal procedure.-April 11, 1934.

THE PRESENT FRENCH internal situation is so much to the advantage of certain foreign powers that it would not be surprising if they had done something to foment the agitation.—ROBERT DELL, April 18, 1934.

IT IS GENERALLY CONCEDED that the swellest party of the year—indeed, the most handsomely mounted social event since the war—was the reception given by the Soviet Ambassador and his wife to the elect of Washington... If there was a delegation from the American Communist Party, it must have come disguised in tails and white vests, because its presence was not remarked.... The Czar's monogram commanded one room, the bust of Lenin another, and in between, the representatives of the people—of two peoples, in fact—walked about in tails and had a good time. No bombs were thrown.—April 23, 1934.

Yankee Dollars Fight Hill

BY EDGAR M. STEED

Montgomery, Ala. HE Democratic primary to be held in Alabama on May 2 to nominate a candidate for the United States Senate might be expected to be simply a family contest between conservative Southerners, with little or nothing of importance at issue. Yet the campaign to unseat Senator Lister Hill, the Democratic whip, by defeating him in the primarynomination being tantamount to election—is a complex affair involving Northern domination of Southern industry, the Farm Bureau's failure to represent small farmers, and the hope of racial cooperation in Alabama.

The current view of the South as the home of reaction is based upon the fame of the Harry Byrds, Cotton Ed

Smiths, and Lee O'Daniels—men who, outside the South, would be more comfortable as Republicans. It is not generally realized that these Democratic voices from the last century are opposed by other Democrats, such as Senators Lister Hill of Alabama and Claude Pepper of Florida, and Representatives Brooks Hays of Arkansas and Lyndon Johnson of Texas, whose records, in comparison with those of the total representation in Congress, classify them as liberals.

The junior Senator from Alabama is one of a dwindling number of members of Congress who have never apologized for the social advances of this country since 1933. Invited to address the Alabama Legislature in 1943 soon after Senator O'Daniel had spoken in the same chamber, Hill made a fighting speech in support of the original New Deal objectives and of the President. He is a long-time friend of the TVA, having worked closely with Senator Norris in bringing that old warrior's dream into existence. His latest service to the TVA was his leadership of a fight against the crippling proposals offered by Senator McKellar of Tennessee, who has long had a feud with TVA Director David Lilienthal, Supporting the aggressive program of the Rural Electrification Administration in Alabama, Hill earned the active enmity of the Alabama Power Company, a subsidiary of Commonwealth and Southern, and he has never asked for quarter. While he has not opposed the Alabama Farm Bureau, an organization dominated by the Alabama Extension Service and chiefly representative of the larger landowners, he refused to help destroy the Farm Security Administration, the small farmer's hope, and thereby offended certain powerful figures in the Extension Service.

These farm-organization politicians have been courted assiduously in recent years by the Birmingham industrialists grouped in the Associated Industries of Alabama, for the definite purpose of breaking the succession of liberal state leaders—Hugo Black, the the late Governor David Bibb Graves, and Senator Hill. It has been the industrialists' idea that if the long-existing antipathy of Alabama farmers to the money dominance of Birming-ham could once be broken, the two groups together could hold down labor, reduce to subservience the educated group, a powerful political factor in the state, control the legislature, cut corporation taxes, and generally make Alabama an even more profitable field of investment for Northern capital.

Whether or not this desired union has actually been accomplished, the two groups got together to produce a candidate to run against Hill. Many Alabamans, knowing Hill's sound record, his Senate prominence, and his great popularity with education and labor groups and dirt farmers, doubted that he could be successfully opposed. But the heavy industries of Birmingham, dominated by the Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company, a subsidiary of United States Steel, joined with the Roosevelthating Farm Bureau clique to put into the race state Senator James A. Simpson of Birmingham, a prominent corporation lawyer.

Simpson's interest in the office was nothing new, but he had hoped to run against some lesser man than Hill. His friends, however, insisted that he had a good chance in 1944, when they could back him with their warswollen profits and appeal to popular resentment against war-time restrictions and petty privations.

Jim Simpson is a big, hard-working, likable fellow, just the sort of man that smart business executives hire as their legal representative. He is only a mediocre speaker, but there is a solid sincerity in his manner that wins friends. In the state Senate he made himself known as the advocate of a civil-service system and of other manifestations of "good government." He cannot compete with Senator Hill in personality, in record, or in state connections, and yet it must be admitted that he does have a chance. This chance is based on one ugly factor, as his backers well know.

In his opening speech on December 10 in Mobile Simpson gave a restrained forewarning of his campaign line by saying, "Alabama knows how to handle the racial problem and should be permitted to do so . . . just as New York and other states should have the right to take care of the problem in their own way." That was the start of an appeal to racial antagonisms that has developed more bitterness with each week of the campaign. By February 20 Simpson's big newspaper advertisements were shouting:

Delicate racial relationships peculiar to the South are being disrupted by radical agitators who are seeking to use the war as a lever to overthrow our social structure and ram social equality down our Southern throats... Mine will be a positive voice in the Senate that will stand guard, speak out, hold the line against troublemakers on the outside who seek to destroy our time-tested segregation principle and tear down established traditions.

Seeking by such implications to establish Hill as a supporter of the "radical agitators," the Simpson men with their plentiful expense money are riding the highways to get out the vote for their candidate. In March the Greensboro Watchman, a weekly published by a former Socialist who now bases most of his editorials on the experiences of Reconstruction, put out a big "special edition" containing pictures of Mrs. Roosevelt among Negroes and a preview of what an Alabama schoolroom would look like if Lister Hill, as the editor feared, was able to introduce mixed education into the state. Copies of this paper and others like it are being thrown into every crossroads store.

It is a nice paradox, this exploitation of racial bigotry by Yankee absentee ownership to defeat a genuine Southerner who thinks in terms of the present. Hill was born forty-nine years ago in Montgomery, the son of Dr. L. L. Hill, a physician known throughout the South. Though he advocates racial cooperation and fair dealing, the record reveals no variation on his part from Southern belief in the wisdom of segregation. His opponents can impugn his position on the race question only by attacking his loyalty to Franklin D. Roosevelt and his refusal to countenance any defamation of Eleanor Roosevelt.

Thus far Hill has declined to accept the Negro as a real issue in the campaign, but in the face of so well-organized and vicious an effort to misrepresent his views, he probably will answer, and he may give ground. If he is forced to descend from the high level to which he has held thus far, the part played by investment dollars from the "enlightened North," seeking still tighter control over Alabama's natural resources, should be understood and remembered.

Five Against Pepper

BY ROYAL WILBUR FRANCE

Winter Park, Florida

PERHAPS the most crucial of the Southern Democratic primary campaigns is now being fought in Florida, where party members will go to the polls on May 2 to decide whether Claude Pepper, one of the few Southern liberals, shall have a third term in the United States Senate. They will also choose six Representatives, a Governor, and a host of lesser state officials, but the hottest fight centers around Pepper. In this fight the line between the forward-looking and the backward-looking is sharply drawn.

On the reactionary side, the League for Constitutional Government has placed five candidates in the field for the Senatorial nomination, believing that this will keep Pepper from getting a majority of the votes in the first primary and necessitate a run-off; all those who had voted for the four defeated candidates would then presumably unite behind Pepper's strongest opponent. Such strategy is a tribute to Pepper's strength and a real danger to his position. Pepper has charged that large sums of money have been sent into the state to defeat him.

Pepper's services to the industries of Florida have been considerable and are appreciated; at the same time, he is identified in the minds of reactionary business men with government controls and high taxes, for which of course they can see no need. They are obsessed with the idea that "bureaucracy" in Washington is the road to socialism, and they are throwing at Pepper all the clichés by which this idea is commonly expressed. A prominent member of the Democratic state committee has called him a Socialist-a word with sinister racial overtones down here. The Supreme Court decision in the Texas primary case has strengthened the old fear of racial equality. The reactionaries are making poltical capital of the fact that Pepper once addressed a Negro meeting in Los Angeles and supported an antipoll-tax bill in the Senate. They are distributing a picture taken at the Los Angeles meeting. Pepper has parried this line of attack by denouncing the Supreme Court decision and avowing his unequivocal belief in white supremacy-a move which was not only an act of political self-preservation but doubtless an expression of his own convictions.

Senator Pepper

In Florida the international situation is relatively unimportant as a political issue. Even the most conservative groups here have generally supported the war effort from the beginning. A week before Pearl Harbor the board of directors of the Florida National Bank in Miami, one of the state's largest financial institutions, adopted a resolution urging Congress to declare war on Japan.

Pepper's record as an outstanding interventionist and internationalist, therefore, has been all in his favor. But undoubtedly the strongest factor on his side is the solid backing of organized labor. Despite his one slip in voting for the Smith-Connally Act, the South has no Senator more friendly to labor than he, and the working people of the state know it. The opposition to him is well-heeled and voluble, but Pepper has great strength and is a good campaigner; the progressive elements in the state are confident he will win.

The outlook for Florida's representation in the lower house is not so promising. Perhaps the most interesting of the six contests is that in the Fifth Congressional District, between Joe (self-styled "Little Joe") Hendricks, incumbent, and J. Reynolds Duncan. Hendricks is a young small-town lawyer who rode into office on the wave of Townsendism that swept this state in the early thirties. In that first campaign he showed himself willing to make promises which an intelligent man would have known could not be fulfilled and which a scrupulous man would have avoided. In the early days of the New Deal he followed the lead of the President because that was obviously the line of least resistance, but when the more backward Democrats of the South began to make common cause with the Republicans of the North he found it easier and more congenial to string along with them. More and more regularly he voted with the Republicans, or, when crucial measures were at stake, absented himself. He is a supporter of Martin Dies and exhibits all the attributes of the Texas mountebank except his showmanship.

Against Hendricks the Independent Democratic League, whose purpose is to improve the quality of the state's political representation, is backing J. Reynolds Duncan, a young man connected with the Florida Industrial Commission. Unfortunately he lacks political experience. The league had its origin last December in a meeting of a small group of college professors, labor leaders, social workers, ministers, and others, in Orange County, the heart of Florida. They were aware of the danger of political regression throughout the country, and they took steps to do something about it in their own territory. Their immediate objectives were to help Pepper and to get a progressive candidate to run against "Little Joe" Hendricks. In the six months since its organization the league's membership and its work have become state wide.

The progressive forces have encountered many difficulties. Florida is not an industrial state, and the C. I. O. unions here are largely confined to the citrus industry. Thus many of their members are Negroes, who cannot vote in the primaries. The A. F. of L. has a large membership in the building trades and other fields, but its leadership has shown little interest in politics. The Independent Democratic League planned to create a grassroots organization in every election district, but soon discovered that it had neither the funds nor the political experience that the task required. The C. I. O. and the A. F. of L., the only constituent groups with mass backing, were prevented from providing funds by the Smith-Connally Act.

This month the Independent Democratic League was reorganized and renamed the Florida Voters' League, pledged "to promote the general welfare by furnishing information on candidates and measures." Its political creed is stated in four points:

1. That our nation and state must bend their energies, without reservation, to the winning of the war;

2. That the peace must be won by definite planning for it now, internationally, and also by immediate attention to the home front by nation and state. There must be no stampeding back to "normalcy," as in 1920, with the suffering which that reaction brought upon demobilized men and discharged war workers;

3. That government should be used, whenever general welfare demands, to the extent that private enterprise is unable or unwilling to act or to act adequately;

 That every public officer should be competent to deal with the problems he must face; he should represent all the people, not any group, groups, or special interests.

The league will undoubtedly have some influence in the present primaries. Even if up to now it has failed to create a widespread popular movement, its efforts have not been wasted. It has learned that the fight is not for one campaign but for the long future.

Montgomery Ward's Private War

BY SHIRLEY KATZANDER

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has acted with decision to end the deadlock between Montgomery Ward and the War Labor Board, which involved the strike of more than 4,000 workers in Chicago. Local 20 of the Mail Order, Warehouse, and Retail Employees' Union (C. I. O.) struck when the company refused to comply with a WLB directive requiring it to extend its contact with the union. On April 24, in a telegram addressed to the company and the union, the President demanded the end of the strike and called on Ward's to comply immediately with the WLB directive.

Presiding over the vast mail-order empire is Sewell L. Avery, chairman of the board, who twice before has refused to comply with WLB rulings; recently he sought a permanent injunction against such rulings, on the ground that Ward's is a non-essential industry and therefore not within the jurisdiction of the WLB.

The fight between the company and the union is now four years old. Local 20 of the mail-order workers began organization proceedings in 1940. In February, 1942, the National Labor Relations Board certified the local as bargaining agent for Ward's employees, and the WLB directed the company to sign a contract. Ward's agreed to the pay increases ordered by the WLB but balked at inclusion of a maintenance-of-membership clause in the contract. Avery said he would sign only if the President expressly ordered it. The WLB then handed the issue to the President, and he ordered Ward's to sign. Avery stalled again. He took full-page advertisements in newspapers throughout the country-later reported at a stockholders' meeting to have cost $400,000-informing the public that he was "under duress" and that he wanted this paragraph inserted in the contract:

The following paragraphs are not voluntarily agreed to by the company. In the company's opinion they are illegal and unsound. These provisions are copied verbatim from the War Labor Board's order of November 5, 1942, and are incorporated herein, on the company's part, under duress and only because the President of the United States as commander-in-chief in time of war has expressly ordered that they be included.

The union refused to sign a contract including that paragraph, and the labor, industry, and public members of the WLB denounced Avery's action. Dean Wayne L. Morse of the Oregon University Law School, member for the public, called the advertising campaign a "subterfuge." "I simply wish to say that I don't like welching or welchers," he said, "and I consider the present position of Montgomery Ward a pure case of welching on an agreement which they entered into with the President of the United States." Roger Lapham, president of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Lines and member of the WLB for industry, said, "Ward's has freedom of speech and the industry members of the board also have freedom of speech, and they intend to use it to tell the truth—and not a damn bunch of half-truths."

The case was again referred to the President, and he again ordered Ward's to sign the contract—without the "duress" paragraph. Avery signed. That was eleven months after the union was certified as bargaining agent.

In the year that followed, the union asked dismissal of only one man, charging him with violation of the union's constitution. Denying the violation, Ward's refused to dismiss him until a few days before the case came to arbitration. Then it fired him for "incompetence." Monsignor Reynold Hillenbrand, who acted as arbiter, found in favor of the union, stating that Ward's, in refusing to dismiss the man, had violated the contract.

In November, 1943, about a month before the first contract expired, Montgomery Ward filed suit for libel against the local's militant shop paper Spotlight, and against officials of the local and the international, seeking damages of $1,000,000 and an injunction against publication of the paper. This last aroused the ire of newspapermen, who feared the precedent of such an injunction. The case is still under consideration.

Shortly after the libel suit was filed, the company informed the union that it did not intend to negotiate a contract for the two major departments in Chicago because it did not believe the union had a majority there. The union says that it organized the plant two and a half times over in 1943, that with 4,000 workers eligible for membership it collected 10,000 membership cards during the year. Organization was clearly keeping pace with turnover. Ward's ignored the union's figures, and in January, 1944, the company and the local again appeared before the WLB. This time the WLB ordered another NLRB election and directed Ward's to extend the contract pending the decision. Ward's refused to extend the contract. On April 12 the union struck.

The local charges that between the expiration of the contract and the start of the strike the company went on an anti-union spree, discharging and demoting active union members. On March 29 the WLB held a compliance hearing. The union charged that the company had refused to comply with the WLB directive, and the company charged that the union had not proved a majority. On April 17 Ward's charged that the WLB had "illegally ordered" the company to extend an expired contract, and said that it "stands ready to recognize the union when proof of its representation has been presented."

On April 24, in his telegram replying to the President, Samuel Wolchok, national head of the union, said that the workers would return to their jobs. He charged the company with provoking the strike "by its arrogant refusal to comply with the directive of the WLB and its consistent acts in brazen disregard of the most elementary rights of American workers."

Ward's handling of its labor relations seems to have set a pattern for other firms in the Chicago area. In March the Pullman-Standard Car Manufacturing Company defied a WLB order to include a maintenance-ofmembership clause in its contract with Local 2928 of the United Steel Workers of America (C. I. O.), and it has since filed a libel suit for $1,000,000 against the local union paper, Keel. In February the Chicago Transformer Company appeared before the WLB to demand another NLRB election, charging that the United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers' Union had no majority in its plant. In March the Mills Novelty Company, Chicago, demanded the same thing in regard to the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers (C. I. O.). The United States Gypsum Company, of which Avery is a director, defied the WLB's ruling that a maintenance-of-membership clause be in the company's contract with the union.

Sewell Avery is known among business men as the Tom Girdler of the Midwest. He is tough, and he is determined to spare no expense to establish his position. In addition to the $1,000,000 libel suit against Spotlight he has brought a damage suit for almost $5,000,000 against the Santa Fe, the Southern Pacific, and the Western Pacific railroads, the Railway Express Company, and I long list of motor-truck operators, for their refusal to handle merchandise during a strike by the A. F. of L. Retail Clerks, Teamsters, and Warehousemen. He has also filed suit against the printing-trades union for failure to print Ward's catalogue during a work stoppage. He even filed suit for $1,000,000 against the magazine Business Week for its description of Bishop Haas's efforts to settle the dispute between Ward's and Local 20. This suit was dismissed by the judge as "absurd, simply absurd."

As an executive of Ward's, Avery has a good dollarsand-cents record. When the company appeared to be going under in the early 1930's Avery took over as manager at a salary of $100,000 a year and with an option to buy 100,000 shares of common stock at $11 a share. That stock today is worth more than $4,000,000, and last December Avery exercised his option to the extent of 50,000 shares. In addition to being chairman of Montgomery Ward's and a director of United States Gypsum, he sits on the boards of Armour, United States Steel, Pullman-Standard, the People's Light, Gas, and Coke Company, the Northern Trust Company, and the Pure Oil Company.

Sewell Avery apparently feels it incumbent upon him to maintain "free enterprise" and keep the "pioneer spirit" alive by his own efforts. He is reported once to have said of his caddy, "I fired him. He bothered me forever wanting to carry the clubs."

Restaurant in Algiers

BY MICHAEL CLARK

Algiers, April 2

LGIERS is a poor symbol of the France that did not give up. London, blitzed and beleaguered, was far more akin to the spirit of the Fighting French when it served as their headquarters. Yet Algiers, though soft and complacent, is still a French city, the greatest outside continental France, and thus the only possible seat of the Committee of National Liberation. But if Algiers is the capital of France at war, it is not France, and good note should be taken of the difference. Its strangely mixed population has an ungenuine, an unheroic quality that repels the visitor. Over the years, thanks to a generous hinterland, the city has grown fat and rich. And the people, unlike the population of metropolitan France, have not been hardened in the crucible of Nazi occupation. They easily accepted the regime of dishonor and now are on the whole reluctant to follow General de Gaulle in the path of sacrifice. Algiers would like to remain as it was-safe for the vested interests of its "fifty families."

The slightly equivocal attitude of the city became particularly evident during the trial of Pucheu. Opinion in French circles was divided; it was not really very bon ton to be in favor of the death sentence. Dinner-table conversation turned on the excellence of Pucheu's defense, the exceptional qualities of the man himself-intelligence is a quality which never leaves the French indifferent—the international aspects of the case, which made the trial impolitic at the present time; after all Pucheu was a minister in a legal government recognized by our ally, the United States. I recall that on the last day of the trial I lunched with five Frenchmen of whom three were against and two for the death penalty. This division was perhaps a fair sample. The De Gaullists, of course, particularly the Fighting French troops—as opposed to the North Africans-looked upon Pucheu simply as a traitor who, without a particle of doubt, should suffer a traitor's death.

The trial revealed a man of rare ability who had calculated his own interests too cleverly. He had taken all precautions. He had had his anchor to windward. He had, "in the interests of France," played a double game with the Germans, and when the direction of the wind changed, he had set his course accordingly: he had come to North Africa early, under the high patronage of General Giraud himself. The career of Pucheu appeared as a masterpiece of calculation; the verdict proved that it was too perfect.

In this French city the volunteers of General de Gaulle's heroic little army almost seem to be foreigners. What, indeed, has a young major in the First Fighting French Division who has already commanded his men in three campaigns got in common with Giraud's elderly officers who have comfortably sat out the war in North Africa? The young men who went through the Ethiopian, Eritrean, Syrian, and Libyan campaigns, or who crossed the burning sands of the Sahara in the Colonne Leclerc, fought not because the manual of regulations obliged them to but simply because they wanted to rid their country of the Boches. The members of one Fighting French brigade have refused to wear any decorations until they are permitted to place the "Syria pin" on their Colonial Medal. This gesture reveals their attitude: the Syrian campaign was fought against the troops of Vichy.

In Algiers, in short, one has to look for the spirit of French resistance in order to find it, but it is there. Many individuals in the civilian population, as in the Committee of National Liberation, the Consultative Assembly, and the army, feel intensely their identity with the resistance movement within France. Perhaps it is the Consultative Assembly, with its thirty-four representatives of the underground, some of them newly arrived from France, which most faithfully reflects the temper of the French people. In the Assembly Hall, covered with the symbols of the Republic, in the lobbies, and in the committee rooms the national will, in so far as circumstances permit, is given expression and a legal existence.

To get an intimate view of the Consultative Assembly, one must dine at the Brasserie Suisse. This modest establishment—on Liberty Street!—is the official restaurant of the delegates, the counterpart if you will of the old Buvette de la Chambre in Paris. The little sign on the door is non-committal; it reads: "Requisitioned. French Club. Private." Inside, the potted palms, the harassed waitresses, the crowded tables are ordinary enough. But the guests—the elderly White Friar, the bewhiskered jurist, the majestic turbaned Negro, the unimposing man with the green ribbon of the Compagnons de la Libération in his buttonhole, the prosperous-looking general—these are not the clients of just any restaurant. The White Friar, indeed, is R. P. Carrière, delegate of the French colony in Egypt; the jurist is René Cassin, former Commissioner of Justice and professor at the Sorbonne; the magnificent black is Ely Manel Fall, delegate from Senegal; the man with the ribbon is M. ——, hero of the underground; the well-fed general is General Chadebec de Lavalade, connoisseur of Portuguese literature, author of a book entitled "Pétain?" and one of the judges of Pucheu. At every table are men sent to Algiers from resistance groups all over the empire.

As a guest of one of the delegates, I dined several times at the Brasserie Suisse. My host willingly pointed out a few of his more interesting colleagues and told me something of their stories, omitting names and details that might be dangerous to persons still in France.

"That man," he said of a middle-aged man at a nearby table, "was an employee in a little city in the center of France. He is neither athletic nor bellicose. Yet for months he moved about the country under false names, seeking out his old friends, bringing them together, grouping them locally, then by departments, reconstituting the party to which he had belonged within the framework of the resistance movement, distributing pamphlets and clandestine newspapers. This political activity, however, was not all. He began to collect military information that might be useful to the Allies. Soon he became n specialist in collecting information, acquired confederates to help him, got in touch with other similar organizations-in short, created a smoothly functioning intelligence network. He is a little ashamed of never having been arrested.

"That younger man was a lawyer. He began the war as a captain and after the armistice determined to continue the struggle in the underground. He joined a resistance group and participated in a few sensational coups de main. One day he was caught, under a false name, by the Vichy police. At the same moment both Vichy and the Gestapo were searching for him under two other false names for serious affairs. He was done for if the Vichy judge discovered all his identities; so his friends decided to rescue him.

This was not easy. Every day he was taken to the courthouse in a police wagon. The hearing dragged out. Soon the gasoline shortage made it impossible to transport the prisoners in the police wagon, and the judge ordered them brought to court on foot, handcuffed, each between two gen darmes. This provided the long-awaited opportunity. It was no difficult job for the organization to get hold of several gendarme uniforms and to find men with sufficient pluck to play the part. One morning our friend was summoned a little earlier than usual to the registry and led off by three phlegmatic gendarmes who had firmly clamped handcuffs on him. The rest can be imagined—a waiting car, a rapid change of clothes, then another car, prearranged hiding places, finally arrival in England.

"The bearded schoolmaster over there with the archaic collar had never stirred from his library and his class-room. One day, however, he realized that his respectable white beard might be put to use. He bought a goat and after school hours led his goat out to graze—usually on the good grass bordering the airfield. No one paid any attention to the eccentric old gentleman with his browsing goat. But he saw many things, took note of them, and finished by being sent, a little bewildered by it all, to Algiers as a delegate of the underground.

"Beyond him is a man who represents one of our distant colonies. In August, 1940, he attempted to rally the colony to De Gaulle but failed. Arrested by Vichy, he was flown three thousand miles to France, where a military court condemned him to hard labor for life. He escaped—I cannot tell you how—but remained in the country, where, although hunted by the police, he carried out important missions for De Gaulle. The Vichy net closed in; he was forced to flee France.

"At the next table you see an old political militant. When the armistice was concluded he at once undertook three tasks—the rebuilding of his scattered party, the organization of an underground railroad to bring men to England, the gathering of information. His efforts saved hundreds of Englishmen, but he was finally smoked out of the Channel region and forced to transfer his activities to the Swiss border.

"That very young man in the corner has just arrived from France, sent by the underground to replace one of their delegates who became a minister. Three weeks > ago he was still living the heroic life of the maquis. He brought with him a movingpicture film taken in the maquis. With what emotion we looked upon these recent pictures of our native land! Our hearts beat fast to see men standing at attention in a forest clearing before the colors and the Lorraine cross, to see others training in the use of mechanized arms, and still others maneuvering in mountain snow. The film bore this dedication, 'A l'invaincu, les vaincus qui vaincront. . . . ""

Here, in this little restaurant, were the men who speak for France, that France which, though vanquished, is invincible.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

VITHOUT any doubt the food situation in Germany is becoming decidedly unpleasant. Among the contributing causes one of the most important is of course the loss of the Russian agricultural regions. But other factors are also operating. In spite of all the foreign workers, there is a great shortage of farm labor. The fertilizer supplied to farmers has been reduced to a fraction of the normal amount. All means of transportation are so overburdened that foodstuffs cannot be properly distributed. The importation of vegetables and fruit from Italy has almost stopped. Then in 1943, added to these constant and progressive causes, came the appalling failure of the potato and vegetable crops.

The severity of the crisis is well illustrated by two small changes in the rationing system. Although all kinds of food, without exception, are rationed, and even in restaurants guests must give points for every dish, the Nazi authorities have tried to leave a few small loopholes for the individual consumer. Anyone who raised rabbits, for example, was allowed to buy some food for them, and to eat them, without giving up any points. In consequence, even in the big cities people kept rabbits in every court and on every balcony. Now, however, the supply of fodder has been cut off, and a decree issued April 3 forbids private rabbit raising and orders the slaughter of all the rabbits in the country.

A second loophole was provided by the Stammgericht served in restaurants, which can be translated roughly as "basic dish." Up to now every restaurant has received the material for and been allowed to sell one dish each day for which no points were required. As a rule this was a watery mixture of potatoes and vegetables, containing no fat or meat, and it was usually all sold in half an hour. But meager as it was, it was one way of getting more to eat than rationing permitted. If you were clever you ate the Stammgericht in one restaurant and then went to another for a regular meal on points. Now the stringent food situation is putting an end to this practice. The new regulations vary in different places, but everywhere the Stammgericht is being curtailed or discontinued. In many cities it has been absolutely forbidden. In others it may be served only to a worker doing "heavy" labor and possessing a special certificate to that effect, which must be punched after he has eaten. The city of Cologne charges restaurant keepers with the duty of judging whether a guest "may reasonably be expected to have his own household and to eat at home," and directs them to refuse the Stammgericht to customers who seem to have other resources.

Every time the German people have vielded to a particularly gloomy mood, Nazi propaganda has tried to raise their spirits by a strong dose of anti-Semitism. At the moment the newspapers are again printing a large percentage of articles unmasking the crimes of the Jews from Adam on. And various lecturers, preferably socalled scholars or scientists with the title of professor, are traveling around the country discoursing on the theme that "the wars of all times have been caused exclusively by the Jews." The Jew has even been mobilized in the hopeless struggle to keep people from listening to the enemy radio. "Flüster Cohn" (Whispering Cohn) is now the official name for the British radio. Newspaper cartoons and gigantic posters on the advertising pillars depict him as a horrifying apparition and warn people to keep clear of him.

But if for no other reason, the anti-Semitic theme has become stale and uninteresting because there are no Jews left in Germany. The last one was shipped off to Poland long ago; and how can passions be inflamed against an abstraction, a foe no longer present? To make up, apparently, for this lack, Mischlinge (persons of mixed Jewish and Christian blood) are now made the object of attack. Previously they had been left relatively undisturbed, and as there are many hundreds of thousands of them, their situation, in a time of intense manpower scarcity, seemed fairly safe. Recently, however, a vigorous propaganda campaign against the pestilential Judenbastarde (Jewish bastards) who befoul German soil was started by the press and radio. Official measures have also been taken against them, according to a detailed report in the Svenska Dagbladet for March 30.

"In principle," says an order of the Nazi Office of Racial Policy as quoted by this paper, "Mischlinge must now be treated as Jews." For example, those of military age will be taken out of the army and put in labor battalions, where they will not wear the army uniform. According to the official in charge of deportations, "these formations will be sent to Poland." Mischlinge whose dwellings have been destroyed by the bombardments may not move back into them after repairs have been made. The form sheets on which bombed-out persons apply for permission to buy clothing, linen, and household articles now include the question: Are you a Mischling? Questionnaires have been sent to all employers asking how many Mischlinge they employ and how soon they can replace them with "Aryans." "Strong opposition" to this new policy, the Swedish paper says, "is being shown in Germany."

Holmes—a Family Portrait

YANKEE FROM OLYMPUS: JUSTICE HOLMES AND HIS FAMILY. By Catherine Drinker Bowen. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

O MANY books have been written about Mr. Justice Holmes that the first question about a new one is what is new about it. Mrs. Bowen answers by saying: "This book is a picture and a translation, an attempt to bring Justice Holmes out of legal terms into human terms." This she has achieved, and superbly, while also giving enough of the legal to make clear its essential core. What Holmes left in judicial opinions and in his other writing was so much the fruit of his distinctly personal thinking that the legal was but an expression of the human. The legal does not need detailed elaboration to round out the picture. Mrs. Bowen gives enough to make its central ranges stand out in clear relief.

The other novelty is that this is not a study of Holmes alone. The first quarter is concerned with Grandfather Abiel, the Calvinist minister who lost his charge when Unitarianism rocked Cambridge, and with Dr. Holmes, the far from Calvinist physician and teacher and the ready writer. In these and later pages there is much about family and cousinly relationships, about Harvard and Cambridge and Boston, with enough of the currents of thought and emotion and action in the American hinterland to make the region around the Charles seem part of a larger whole. At least the United States becomes a part of Boston. Mrs. Bowen is not always kind to the pressures and resistances of either. She is adept at subtle or pointed shafts at Mammon, One sample must suffice, though there are many and the range is wide. When writing of Jefferson's embargo she remarks: "Touch a Massachusetts man in his pocket and the thrust went through to the heart and was immediately defended in terms of great principles."

The delving into genealogical roots is welcome for its own sake, both as biography and as social history. Yet one fails to see the influence of ancestors from the patrilineal side unless the effect was one of aversion and rejection. Not enough is given of the distaff lines to know whether we should there find persisting strains passed on. Mrs. Bowen essays little or no explicit tracing. Uncle John, the Doctor's brother, was an individualist who of all the family seemed to have some traits most congenial to his nephew, different as they were in practicing the gospel of effort. He was a blunt engaging figure, gifted at being himself. One of his ministrations was to bring forcibly to nephew Wendell's consciousness the realization that he had long been in love with Fanny Dixwell and the intimation that he had long been equally unmindful of her feeling for him. As a whole the book can hardly be regarded as an exercise in psychological genetics unless to bring out that the biologists have to recognize "sports" as all classifiers need the category of miscellaneous

One way in which Mrs. Bowen makes Holmes and her other figures human is by assuming the role of the novelist. At first this brings something of a shock, How does she know that Abiel's quill had "gone dry above his paper with thinking," that he took "three steps in a highly unministerial bound" and "felt his heart pound pleasantly in his breast"? How does she know that "Oliver heard from far off the rumble of waves on beaches ten miles to the eastward," or that at a later time he "felt the hackles rise on the back of his neck"? There is a good bit of venturing beyond the record all the way through. Yet from such resort to the device of fiction comes much of the compelling power of the book. Amazingly the privacies of solitary feeling and of confidential exchange that could never be footnoted seem all in character, and of course for many there was enough of oral tradition to let us say in the phrase of Renan that the thoughts were in their hearts if not on their lips. Much that might offend the canons set by what calls itself scientific scholarship is a triumph of art in telling essential inner truth.

Less than a sixth of the book is given to the crowning years in Washington, though without these Holmes would have left but a tithe of his legacy to posterity, generous as is such lesser moiety with its wealth of insight into the long course of the common law. There is no evidence that Holmes was a greatly interested follower of judicial and other doings in Washington while he was sitting on the Supreme Judicial Court in Massachusetts, though he had lectured on constitutional law at Harvard. To much if not most of what went on outside his own pursuits he was oblivious. Newspapers and politics were of slight if any concern. He was a man of books and ideas. Brandeis told Mrs. Bowen that Holmes's remoteness from political life, far from making his horizon narrower, had somehow given him a broader vision. The genial Taft who wrote peevish letters to his children when colleagues disagreed with him complained that Holmes had no conception of statesmanship. Yet the Holmes who slighted the newspapers, who was not concerned with politics, who was a book man and an internal thinking man has proved himself in the long run to be a far greater judicial statesman than the critic who had the chance to profit from long experience in public affairs.

Holmes is such a fascinating and dominating figure that reviewers are inevitably tempted to write about him instead of about a book about him. The allotted space is all too short to write half enough about either here. When one says that the book is worthy of the subject, this should start a trek to the bookstalls. There are words echoed from Civil War bivouacs that may not yet be heard in Boston drawing-rooms, but it is not anticipated that the book will be banned even in Boston. If the Autocrat survived as a giant, there might be regrets that the Captain for whom he searched in Maryland and in the pages of the Atlantic did not find him such. There is a poignant contrast between the literary Doctor's light volubility and the quiet inner vividness of the unique discerning lady who, as Holmes wrote Pollock after her death, for over fifty years had made life poetry for him. It is good to have her remembered here. Of her wisdom and her raciness still more deserves to be told.

Mrs. Bowen translates all her characters into human terms. She touches on intimacies with a delicacy that makes it fitting for the world to share them. She tells of occasions of tenderness that move to tears. Holmes had deeps of sentiment, though he wore them far from his sleeve. Above all he was stalwart. He often spoke of life as a struggle, and so it was for him, though far from the market-place. He was a soldier from a sense of duty, not from an instinct for fighting. In the drab days at the bar only his self-chosen study and writing captured absorbing devotion. Independence of household living was long postponed. Recognition came late. He knew loneliness of spirit. With all his powers and talents and with all his firm convictions, he was humbly eager in pursuing the paths of thinking that others had traced. His nature was not a simple one, and Mrs. Bowen has not sought to make it such. She has translated him into human terms as she set out to do, if translation is the word for her achievement. At any rate she has the gift of the good translator in fidelity to the original when gloss would only mar.

Pierre Cot Answers the Vichy Thesis

TRIUMPH OF TREASON. By Pierre Cot. Ziff-Davis Publishing Company. $3.50.

THE abortive Riom trial was one of the decisive episodes in the great drama of our times. It disposed of two great issues by the simple fact that it shrank from them. The first was Hitler's thesis: the war had been forced upon innocent Germany by the Judeo-Bolshevist coalition in control of the French government. The second was that the crushing defeat of 1940 was due to the criminal incompetence of leftist politicians.

Hitler's preposterous contention was immediately ignored. Scapegoats had to be found, not for the folly of starting the war, but for the crime of losing it. We must not forget, however, that Hitler's thesis is the foundation of the Flandin-Laval policy of repentant cooperation. Dismissing it meant rejecting the French Quisling, that Pierre Laval of whom Marshal Pétain said, "He and I are one."

The second issue was debated at length: who was responsible for the military débâcle? In the course of the trial the answer, incomplete, complex, and confused in details, became irresistibly clear; so the case—far too late for the Vichy men—was suspended sine die.

The Vichy thesis was: The glorious and patriotic French army was starved, disorganized, and demoralized by the partisanship and corruption of the Front Populaire. With no regard for the country's pressing needs, the reds indulged in a carnival of demagogic reforms—forty-hour week, paid vacations, organized leisure, socialization of war industries. The men who performed the miracles of Verdun and Warsaw could not repair at the last moment the harm done for several years by the rabble rousers. The collapse of 1940 was the incluctable consequence of the leftist victory in 1936. Among these criminals Blum stands out in smister eminence; but Pierre Cot, Minister of Aviation in the Popular Front Cabinet, was even more virulently denounced. If there were no French planes to beat off the German swarms, the all-sufficient explanation is found in two short words—Pierre Cot.

Cot properly declined to submit himself to the Riom judges, an exceptional tribunal offering no guaranty of freedom or fairness. He presents his case in this very substantial volume. The case is irrefutable; but it is not the defense of one man that matters, and Cot knows it. There is no egotism in those four hundred compact pages. Cot is defending French democracy—world democracy—against an audacious perversion of the truth.

The issue is of commanding importance to us in America. Innumerable well-meaning citizens, violently opposed to Nazism, still accept the Vichy thesis. Refugee literature has rather deepened the confusion: by insisting on personal scandals, it has confirmed the impression that the Third Republic was rotten to the core, "and the more republican the more rotten." We cannot quite cure ourselves of the delusion that Vichy represents a belated rebellion of the "sound" elements in old France. Hence the persistent anti-Gaullism of our foreign policy. When it comes to French affairs, official Washington professes the purest Hooverian orthodoxy: a New Deal, a Popular Front, inevitably means waste, muddle, corruption, and chaos.

Cot's plea is restrained, and irrefutably supported with facts. He writes well, but the book is too heavily documented to be easy reading. Journalists will barely glance at it, but historians cannot afford to ignore it; and I believe that Cot could confidently adopt the title of Blum's book, "L'Histoire jugera."

His own title, "Triumph of Treason," goes a little beyond what he has set himself to prove. In his counter-offensive he establishes the fossil character of the army which, for two decades, had been prepared by Pétain and Weygand. He also shows the political bias of the Pétain clique, its hatred of democracy, its admiration for Mussolini and Franco. But he does not charge downright treason in the legal sense of the term. Cot made me realize that Guedalla was pretty close to the truth when he bracketed together Bazaine and Pétain. The surrender of Metz was a trifling affair compared with the wholesale, almost eager capitulation of 1940. But neither marshal was sold to the enemy in terms of pelf. In both cases incompetence, sluggishness, timidity, defeatism were to blame. Pétain will be remembered as the man who said, "They shall not pass!" and rushed to open the gate.

Cot has fully rehabilitated himself and his associates in the Front Populaire in the eyes of careful students not blinded by anti-democratic prejudices. The brief conclusion is extremely interesting but far more controversial. I cannot agree with Cot's Jacobin doctrine, "the dictatorship of the majority," for it leads to the single-party system. The misgivings he expresses about Algiers are already dated. It is appropriate that Cot, the great advocate of a close military alliance of France, Czechoslovakia, and the Soviets, should have been sent on a mission to Moscow by the Committee of National Liberation.

The Prospects for Food

FOOD "CRISIS." By Roy F. Hendrickson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

FOOD. By Frank A. Pearson and Don Paarlberg, Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THE early panic over the possibility of a "famine" in the United States has largely subsided, and most Americans once more take it for granted that they will be able to eat as usual for the duration. Mr. Hendrickson, director of the United States Food Distribution Administration, suggests, however, that our present complacency is perhaps as unjustified and dangerous as the extreme statements of a year ago when the "food crisis" was first discovered.

Our present favorable food situation is due to two factors: (1) a continuation of favorable crop weather in 1943 after several previous years of unusually good growing conditions; (2) an unusual supply of meat due to light slaughtering last year and exceptionally heavy slaughtering this year following the depletion of feed reserves. This situation is likely to be short-lived. The demand for food is bound to grow as further areas are liberated from Axis rule, while the chances are against the continuation of above-average crop weather. As a consequence, the American people must make some changes in their food habits if they are to be as well nourished as they were in peace time.

On this general diagnosis Mr. Hendrickson, speaking for the administration, agrees with Messrs. Pearson and Paarlberg, who are highly critical. Mr. Hendrickson emphasizes the need for making greater use of potatoes, cereals, peas, and beans, and relying less on meat—which is a relatively uneconomic food. Fruit and vegetable consumption should remain at about the pre-war level. While the total amount of food, measured in pounds, will probably not decrease, there will doubtless continue to be, as a result of rationing, a leveling-off in food consumption. Pearson and Paarlberg also advocate less reliance on meat, and point out that it is far more efficient to eat cereals as such than to use them as feed. It is possible, through the enrichment of bread and flour and possibly other products, for the average person to obtain as nutritious a diet as in the days of food surpluses.

But all of this rests on the assumption that the American people will make an intelligent adjustment in their diet. The American housewife must learn such simple things as how to conserve vitamins through proper cooking methods, how to cut down waste of all kinds, and how to make use of such foods as skimmed milk, soy beans, lentils, and wholegrain breakfast cereals. And farmers must be encouraged to adjust their production to these more nutritious and economical foods.

Mr. Hendrickson shows us how Great Britain and Germany have dealt with their far more acute problems without undermining the health of the British and German peoples. He also takes up in some detail the difficulties we face in the readjustment of agriculture in the post-war period. Chief among these is the question of government price support for farm products. While approving in principle the suggestion that "parity" prices be scrapped in favor of a program of "necessity" prices—the amount of guaranteed return to the farmer to be determined by the amount needed to induce adequate production rather than by some past price relationship—Mr. Hendrickson is frankly pessimistic about the possibility of developing such a program free from political or bureaucratic obstacles.

Pearson and Paarlberg, on the other hand, are extremely critical of managed prices of any kind. They insist that we do not yet possess the wisdom to administer a controlled economy on the scale that we have undertaken and that we should abandon the effort, letting prices serve as the regulator of food production and distribution in war time as well as in normal times. It is easy, of course, to point out the weaknesses and difficulties inherent in war-time controls. It is easy, also, to say that the problems are too big for any administrative agency to handle. But the blunt fact is that, despite errors, the controls have worked more successfully than anyone would have thought possible a year or two ago -and they have worked despite the failure of Congress to provide adequate funds for enforcement or subsidies and despite its flagrant neglect in the sphere of taxation. Doubtless Pearson and Paarlberg were sincerely troubled when they wrote their impassioned indictment of the Administration's food policies six months ago, but many sections of the book make odd reading today in view of the unquestioned success of the 1943 program. The prospects may not be so good for 1944, but a comparison between the farm situation today under strict government control and that of 1918, when prices represented the chief controlling factor, should enhance our faith in man-made controls.

Poetry in Review

UNSTAN THOMPSON'S "Poems" (Simon and Schuster, $2) contain some very bad poetry, but what is important is that even at his worst Mr. Thompson writes poetry: "Not you nor I are drawn by dawn, who sight/The bright before the morning moon of sorrow." That is more than can be said of the best efforts of most of the other poets I have read recently. Moreover, this is Thompson's first book. It shows him to be so immersed in English poetry of all periods that on several occasions he must have barely escaped drowning, or at any rate dissolving himself poetically. The plunge was all to the good, however, for he has learned how to use the poetry of the past to express his own feelings. He has learned how to make poetic technique serve as the "confining form"—to use Coleridge's term—within which he can convey the turbulence of his active experience.

Although his judgment is at times deficient, he is technically skilful. He uses clusters of sound with a lavish exploitation of his medium that reminds one of abstract painting. Yet he is correspondingly true to his medium; rhyme is as necessary to his poem as cement is to the mason. Thompson explores various styles, from simple to close harmony, and it is a pleasure to see him endeavoring to correct a tendency toward over-facility even at the risk of strangling his verse. The physical luxuriance of the images, especially in the longer poems, recalls such Elizabethan erotica as "Venus and Adonis" and "Hero and Leander." (Ganymede is present as bellboy, page, groom, sailor, and acolyte.) He also makes great raids on the war for material to enrich his poetic mythology-a special augury of his successful development. The influence of modern poets, particularly Hopkins, is not as felicitous-it never is-and nowhere less so than in the somewhat pat generalizations of last lines and stanzas. Thompson belongs with the Spender-Barker-Dylan Thomas school of English poets, and is perhaps their first American ally. Like them, he revolts against all knowledge that does not come from personal experience, and he cannot make convincing poetry out of what he has not himself felt.

More often than not Thompson's poems are self-indulgent, verbose, and full of private symbols. Yet above all the confusion there rings out the sound of his furious battle to find his own true voice. The violence of his vision of the inner world, compounded of war, death, incertitude, isolation, reflects the cataclysm which traditional modes of thought and feeling are undergoing in the world today. Poetry, which bridges the inner and outer worlds, has had to abandon the concepts of religion, nature, social progress, and the dignity of man, and is now confronted with the breakup of one of its last great metaphors, idealistic love. Certain modern poets are therefore employing a world metaphor of sex, not because they are more exclusively concerned with the physical fact of sex, but because, being a physical fact, it seems one of the few constants left which are both objective and subjective enough to relate the individual to the world outside. The awareness of some such situation accounts for the symbols with which Thompson's myths are constructed; and that is also why his chief subject—the refusal of the lovesick to surrender to passion-is enough to provide him with a general means of communication

Thompson's best work is found in two of his longer poems, Largo and Images of Disaster, but they are not as easily quotable as this stanza of a shorter poem, Tarquin, about the rape of the limbo lad:

What daring could not do, the drinks have done: The limbo lad communicated one Last sacrament, and, fast as falling, heaven No longer held a stranger to emotion, Who, like a star, unsexed, unashamed, unshriven, Was hurled, a lost world, whirling past damnation: Circled by chaos but by eros spun, The devil burned much brighter than the sun.

Robert Fitzgerald's new book "A Wreath for the Sea" (New Directions, $2.50) brings up the central heartbreaking problem of American writing-the lack of a homogeneous cultural tradition which the writer can take for granted and in terms of which what he has to say will have more than an isolated meaning. Fitzgerald's struggle between the "brutal present and the soft past" is implicit in the general predicament, which is stated in the opening line of the poems: "Whom should I consult?"

Poetry has been propounding that question ever since Eliot's "Waste Land." It has never been answered, and it has by now lost all content. It is merely a convenience on which to string a diminishing series of negatives. The cry always meant more than any possible answer, for it was uttered in the context of the helplessness of personal emotion to accomplish anything save to reject the world. Fitzgerald is a descendant of the Eliot line. Eliot is the only survivor; his influence no longer nourishes modern poetry. That is hardly surprising when one considers that rejection of the world requires such an expenditure of energy that it is liable to impoverish the poet to the point of depriving him of his powers of communication, Fitzgerald, rejecting the present emotionally, is unable to express his feelings about it. He is consequently forced to repeat those of other poets. The poems dealing with the chaos of the present are not only derivative but lifeless and inarticulate. Personal experience is not fully communicated within the frame of the poem. In Quo Dolore Contenebratum Est Cor Meum the grief is not expressed in the refrain of "No. No./And the alleys offered their sorrow,/The gutters their cold tears." When in his search for order he turns back to his childhood, or to the past of history, in the typical American attitude of retrospection, he presents a chain of disconnected images, sensations, and suggestions—the raw material of poetry, unorganized and unassimilated, as in Cobb Would Have Caught It. Sometimes, as if he were wringing the last ounce of disorder from his memory, he will indulge in euphuisms such as "That dun, worn, airy to-be-bounced/Treasurable and humble dweller in closets" for a lost tennis ball.

Georgic, a translation of the first book of Vergil's Georgics, is, significantly enough, Fitzgerald's best poem. It is magnificent, one of the best modern translations I have ever read. Indeed, it sounds almost as if it were an original poem, fulfilling as it does Fitzgerald's need for a cultural setting, a world at rest, from which the "brutal present" is heard only as a far-off echo. The verse becomes incantation and lament, as in the pure beauty of "Let first the Pleiades and Hyades be hid/And Ariadne's diadem go down." Fitzgerald possesses the rare gift of being able to translate poetry into poetry. That is where his great receptivity is fully realized. In translating Vergil he creates the emotional equivalents, especially in sound, necessary to carry over the feelings of Vergil's age into those of his own.

The need always determines the form. Not only in his translations but in his own poems as well he recreates a farewell world, a haven of refuge, using as framework the earth and the sky, the seasons, the four directions, pastoral occupations, and growth and decay. He tames the elements, domesticates chaos, and produces a twilight universe, a shadowy middle state reminiscent of Tennyson's, as in Soul's Lake. Here are a few lines of one of Fitzgerald's best poems, Figures in an Advertisement. He is speaking of consulting the philosophers, "happy in their homes and seminars:"

> Hear the chalk splutter, hear the groping voice: Conceive the demiurge in his perpetual Strife with the chaos of the universe. That humming equilibrium of creation Pure and enormous, crossed by the constant Light of unimaginable combustion: Teems, how it teems. An elm tree sighs Beyond the dusty windowledge of June. As in the mind the notes of a melody Vibrate when vibration's gone, a series Generated by a decimal has no end; Observe it closely, though; it stops when it stops. The frail spectacles are bedimmed with spring.

A note about a book bargain. The Penguin Book of Sonnets, edited by Carl Withers (Penguin Books, 25 cents), contains all Shakespeare's sonnets and some 250 more by Spenser, Sidney, Donne, Milton, Wordsworth, Keats, and others, including a few modern examples.

DRAMA

HREE plays have burgeoned on Broadway in the past two weeks which made me feel as if I were witnessing the season of the Elocution and Dramatic Society of Deep Woods, where a number of very good actors happened to be spending their vacations. The plays I have in mind are "-But Not Goodbye" (Forty-eighth Street Theater), "Pretty Little Parlor" (National Theater), and "Sheppey" (The Playhouse). All that is missing in each case is a little announcement by the leading citizen that the proceeds of the performance will go to meet the deficit of the Garden Club.

"-But Not Goodbye" is the best of the lot because it is so very unassuming. It will probably have a good run. It doesn't invite criticism and I shan't intrude. After all, critics should know their place, and there is no place for critics at "-But Not Goodbye." It is well acted by a cast which includes Harry Carey, Elizabeth Patterson, and J. Pat O'Malley, and I shall remember the line, "You've only been dead two hours, and you already think you know everything."

In the case of "Pretty Little Parlor" the society went a little berserk. Again the stage is overrun with good actors-Stella Adler, Sidney Blackmer, Joan Tetzel, Marilyn Erskine -but what goes on here is not so much a play as a series of impersonations. The principal one, that of the dominating woman, is written and acted with such single-minded zeal that it could pass for satire. The trouble is that it isn't intended that way. The other roles are only less hard ridden.

Playwrights take vacations too, and one can't help feeling that W. Somerset Maugham wrote "Sheppey" especially for the Deep Woods group. It seems unlikely that he would dare offer so blatant a collage of warmed-over clichés-of situation, characterization, and dénouement-except to an audience that was 'way off the railroad. There is a leading character who wins a sweepstake and who decides to use it up acting as Jesus would have done. Need I say that he introduces a tart and a petty thief into his home to the consternation of his family? The tart, you will no doubt remember, goes back to her trade because she's bored with the virtuous life. The petty thief tries to steal his benefactor's favorite knick-knack but is thwarted by the tart. And so on-and on.

The first act of "Sheppey" is good and might have led to something interesting, Mr. Maugham's talents being what they are. But it leads only to an interminable second act in which all the old material is gone over with a fine-tooth comb of dialogue that leaves no triteness unturned. Finally we are served the cliché to end all clichés. Death appears in the guise of a woman in a nifty trench coat-she has come to take Sheppey away just as he is about to be confined to . lunatic asylum because, of course, everyone thinks he's crazy -and she is actually permitted to tell the one about an appointment in Samarra.

The cast, which is headed by Edmund Gwenn, deserved something better. MARGARET MARSHALL

MUSIC

OTH the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo and the Ballet Theater have completed their first week in New York as I begin this article; and I can say something about the Monte Carlo performances I have attended. I saw first a "Swan Lake" which was made unforgettable by Danilova's fluent grace and sovereign presence. With her was Youskevitch, who seems to me now to be the most brilliant dancer of his type; and Danielian, who has great agility but whose appearance and gestures and pantomime are destructive to a performance. After this came a new ballet, Nijinska's "Ancient Russia" to Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1-a feeble piece with a couple of good solos for Youskevitch. And then Massine's "Beau Danube," still charming even in its present shabby state: Danilova was in her old part of the street dancer; but for the hussar there was Franklin, who is engaging in his own way but lacks the Massine style for the Massine part; Danielian was the dandy; and one of the principals had a new costume in an intense blue that stood out among the original delicate pastels.

The second time there was Balanchine's "Serenade," its first part a fascinating progression of intricate pattern of bodily movement in stage space, its second part an equally fascinating progression of slow movement creating a sort of abstract emotional rhetoric. In the first part the patterns that needed to be so precise and sharply defined were blurred and smudged by the ragged performance; and the second part suffered from Danielian as the leading male dancer. Then came De Mille's "Rodeo," one of the outstanding works in the Monte Carlo repertory, and-with Franklin and Kokitch in their original parts-one of the best performed, even with Etheridge hamming the cowgirl where De Mille had made her points with finesse. Then "Pas de deux classique," with more of the exquisite classical dancing of Danilova and the brilliant dancing of Youskevitch. And finally Massine's "Gaité parisienne," with the Massine role poorly done by Starbuck, but with Danilova and Franklin delightful in their original parts. Watching "Swan Lake" I suddenly realized that part of my intense pleasure was coming from the fact that I was being allowed to keep my eye and mind on the performance without interruption. And I salute publicly whoever at the City Center had the good sense to decide not to allow latecomers to spoil the performances for the people who had arrived on time. My emotion is the stronger because of my experience at the Metropolitan. Even seated in the center section, in the past, I have had the opening ballet repeatedly blotted out by people getting up for latecomers; but last week, seated in the side section, I had between the opening ballet and myself a wall created by the unending procession of people down the aisle; and the later ballets were obstructed by these people straggling in from the buffet and lobbies. I was therefore unable to get any reportable impressions of the Ballet Theater's performances.

There is, I am sorry to say, very little on Victor's April list that I find interesting. The feature set (963; $3.50) offers several of Stokowski's transcriptions which he recorded with the Philadelphia Orchestra before he left it. The pieces are Bach's Chorale Prelude "Ich ruf' zu dir, Herr Jesu" and the aria "Es ist vollbracht" from his St. John Passion, both of which Stokowski recorded once before; No. 3 of Bach's Eight Little Preludes and Fugues for organ; the first movement of No. 1 of his Six Sonatas for pedal clavier; and Palestrina's "Adoramus Te"; and while some of this music is wonderful I can't take what Stokowski makes of it. The performances are recorded with impressive fidelity, clarity, spaciousness, and brilliance, and almost overpowering sonority at moments. The surfaces of my copy are noticeably noisy; more so with wide-range Brush pickup than with a limited-range Astatic; and that, I might add, is true of the surfaces of most of the records I have received from Victor this month.

Another set (962; $2.50) offers Foote's Suite in E major for strings. Koussevitsky likes to exhibit his strings at the beginning of a concert; and this is one of the pieces he has long used for the purpose. It is an academic product which sounds now like Brahms, now like Tchaikovsky, now like Wagner; but the playing of the Boston Symphony strings is superbly recorded.

Then there is a set (965; $3.50) of Welsh traditional songs sung by Thomas L. Thomas, baritone, with harp accompaniments by Edward Vito. I haven't the feeling for this type of music that many other people have; and I am therefore unable to say how good these songs are of their kind, or how-good Mr. Thomas's sonorous performances of them are.

On a single disc (11-8575; $1) is "Nigun," No. 13 of Ernest Bloch's "Baal Shem"-an impressive piece of declamation, well played by Elman (I haven't been able to compare his performance with Szigeti's in the Columbia set of the entire work). On another (10-1071; $.75) is Griffes's "Auf geheimem Waldespfade," one of his earliest published songs, a competent and agreeable product without any marked individuality, well sung by Eleanor Steber; on the reverse side is the even less consequental "Rapunzel" of John Sacco. Still another single disc (11-8570; $1) offers Schubert's "Ave Maria" sung by Richard Crooks with a monstrous orchestral accompaniment; on the reverse side is a terrible piece, "How Lovely Are Thy Dwellings," by Samuel Liddle. And another (11-8569; $1) offers from the past a not especially distinguished "Sempre libera" from "La Traviata" sung by Bori, and Caruso's acoustically recorded "Racondita armonia" from "Tosca" dubbed onto . present-day orchestral accompanimentjust why, I fail to understand.

A special release to honor Rachmaninov was a single disc (11-8593; $1) with his incisive performances of the Schumann-Taussig "Contrabandist" and Chopin-Liszt "Maiden's Wish" and "Return Home." I suggest honoring
Rachmaninov by reissuing his performances with Kreisler of the Beethoven
Sonata Opus 30 No. 3 and the Schubert Sonata Opus 162, which were among the finest things ever issued on records.

Mr. Van Doren Wonders Why

Dear Sirs: I cannot understand why you printed Irwin Edman's poem about Mortimer Adler's book, "How to Think About War and Peace," in your issue of April 8. The poem cleverly misrepresents the book, but I didn't know that you were for cleverness at all costs. The cost in this case is that some of Mr. Edman's readers will never know that Mr. Adler, far from being indifferent to the present agony of the world, takes his start from the most serious concern about it of which he is capable. He wants world peace as soon as possible, and he asks us all to reflect upon the necessary conditions of its being. To do so, he says, requires both the long view and the short view: the long view, so that our end will be clear, and the short view so that proposed means-expedients and truces-can be intelligently compared. Mr. Edman can scarcely mean that the plans he mentions (Mr. Adler mentions many more, and studies them) are of equal value because equally sincere. Yet that is what he implies; whereas Mr. Adler has done his best to provide a standard by which any such plan might be measured in terms of its probable success.

Mr. Adler's book is said to be hard to read. I have not found it so, but there must be something in the legend. Clifton Fadiman contributed a preface in which he warned the reader that he would be expected to think; and Walter Millis, reviewing Mr. Adler in the New York Herald Tribune, complained of his formidable manner. Both Mr. Fadiman and Mr. Millis, however, went on to discover a responsible content of unique value. I find no evidence in Mr. Edman's poem that he went on; none, even, that he read the first page. Mr. Adler is not charming as Mr. Edman can be charming, but I should expect one philosopher to be capable of reading another, at least if he contemplated a public report of the other's thought. I am not forgetting that the report in this case is a poem, and a light one. I am merely wondering whether you think poetic license is a license to be false. Mr. Edman would be ashamed, I suspect, to say in prose what he has said here in verse-namely, that he could not read certain very serious book about war and peace. I am not saying he should have agreed with it. His privilege was to prove it anything he liked—for instance, wrong or superficial—in whatever way verse can best prove such things. What he did was to set a new record for cynicism and superficiality. And in The Nation of all places.

MARK VAN DOREN

New York, April 8

Mr. Edman Elucidates

Dear Sirs: Only the editors of The Nation can answer Mr. Van Doren's question as to why they printed my poem.

But I can and must answer Mr. Van Doren's insistence that I should not have written the poem, that the poem misrepresented the book, and that I had not read the book I was satirizing. I gather I should not have written the poem at all because Mr. Van Doren thinks "How to Think About War and Peace" a good book and therefore exempt from satire. My alleged misrepresentation of the book is based on the fact that the points I stressed are not those that impressed Mr. Van Doren. The conclusion that I had not read the book comes from the fact that I found in it things that Mr. Van Doren did

I did indeed read the book, six weeks before publication, in proof, thanks to an intended kindness on the part of the publishers. I did not find in it any meaningful standards by which to measure the relevance or usefulness now of those plans which Mr. Adler examines and haughtily disposes of. I did not find any contribution to a "long view." Nor did I find any sense in taking as a criterion for plans for the immediate present or even the long present absolute peace defined in terms that make that peace five hundred years away in a formula. I did not find and nowhere suggested that I found the book hard. I found it easy to see and to see through. I found it pretentiously verbal, and as a technique for understanding, useless. I found no responsible content of unique value. I found the use of a dubious method of empty dialectic ... a substitute for responsible empirical inquiry. I found Mr. Adler's "long view" so long that it seemed irrelevant to any conceivable span of human foresight and contrivance. I found "wrong" and "superficial" the assumption that unless you posited an absolute end, absolute peace, you could have no significant ends whatever or relevant means.

I am not the first in history to use satire to puncture what seems to him pretentious, verbalistic, and dogmatic, Mr. Van Doren, as the author of an admirable book on Dryden, should know this even better than I. It is not superficial or-in a democracy-lèse majesté to satirize a book for what seems its emptiness and arrogance, especially when it is on the most serious of themes. Nor is it cynical to expose the cynicism implied in putting any criterion of human betterment dialectically beyond human ken, to judge issues whose character is shaped here and now by a remote definition of a remotely possible peace.

Mr. Van Doren's letter finally suggests, quite apart from Mr. Adler's book, some sinister notions about freedom of expression. Is no satire to be permitted of any book that anyone thinks good, no matter how poor the satirist thinks it to be? As for "proving" my points in verse, must a poet hereafter submit a brief along with his poem? As for poetic license to be "false," who is to issue the licenses? Who is to decide whether the poet is true or false? Mr. Goebbels? Mr. Van Doren?

Mr. Van Doren can also be very charming. But his letter is a new high in totalitarianism and intolerance. And this from a former literary editor of The Nation, too! RWIN EDMAN Cambridge, Mass., April 14

Dignity and Filibusters

Dear Sirs: It is fairly safe to say that human dignity is not attained by sulking. Neither is it to be won by calling attention to the important work that is the responsibility of any group. In fact, dignity is not a necessary prerogative of position, however exalted. It is the offspring of behavior, and no protestations or wails of indignation are substitutes.

Of course my remarks are aimed at the late exhibitionism of the Senate of the United States. There is always something funny in a solemn assertion of one's dignity—because it is so simple to earn a recognition of one's dignity, by acting in a dignified manner.

Now I ask how is it possible to think of the United States Senate as a dignified body of legislators when it permits -at times encourages-its members to hold up important legislation by reading aloud the Declaration of Independence, excerpts from "Alice in Wonderland," or the telephone directory of some large city? I have heard it stated that it is not commensurate with the dignity of the Senate to cut off any Senator from expressing his convictions concerning a bill. Granted. But does that really mean that he must be free to stand up and discuss any subject however irrelevant, and at any length he desires? I understand that other free nations have succeeded in heading off filibusters. It seems to me that now, when we are hearing so much of the dignity of the Senate, is a fine time for that body to set about reforming itself, compelling the nation to respect rather than laugh at it.

The Shape of Things

IN THE OCCUPIED COUNTRIES OF WESTERN Europe, the Nazis are intensifying their drive against the resistance front in their rear. They know how dangerous the ill-fed, ill-armed patriots of the underground are likely to prove at the moment of invasion. And to the best of their vicious ability they are striving to hamstring the resistance movement by arrests, deportations, and executions. We hope the Anglo-American High Command is equally aware of the potential value of these waiting allies and is doing everything possible to aid them. We are, it is true, supplying them with constant encouragement and advice, but we should remember that an ounce of dynamite is worth a ton of exhortations. We should remember, too, that we are calling on the peoples of the occupied countries for great sacrifices. Their hour of liberation will be a bloody one. They will not shrink from the ordeal, but they will expect, and expect rightly, to be treated as full partners. They have suffered greatly during the occupation; they face the prospect of devastating material losses in the course of the invasion. But they retain their dignity as human beings. Have we the imagination not to affront it?

ONE OF IZVESTIA'S "ILL-BRED TAUNTS" GOT under the skin of the International Labor Conference last week. For some months the Governing Body of the I. L. O. has been making every effort to persuade Russia to rejoin the organization, from which it withdrew in 1939 following its expulsion from the League of Nations. When the Philadelphia conference opened, Moscow was still maintaining a stony silence, but hope lingered for the designation, at least, of a Soviet observer. This hope was dashed by the cabled report of an article in Izvestia in which the I. L. O. was described as a "bankrupt organization" which had "invited one or more fascist countries to participate" in its deliberations. Russia, it was indicated, would remain uninterested in membership unless ties with the League were severed and the I. L. O. recreated as an organ of the United Nations. These criticisms evoked rather peppery retorts from some delegates, including Miss Perkins and Robert J. Watt, A. F. of L. representative. However, after a cooling-off period, Walter Nash, deputy Premier of New Zealand, who presides over the conference, renewed the invitation to Russia to come back. The full text of the Izvestia article, he said, showed that it was less hostile than the cabled summary made it appear. Nevertheless, he admitted the improbability of Russia's return so long as the I. L. O. was tied to the League. That the I. L. O. cannot function effectively without Soviet participation is hardly a matter for debate. Indeed, Russia's continued absence may be the real reason for proposals by the British and Canadian governments which would serve to postpone decisions on the future status of the organization until its next conference. These governments, it is surmised, may be hesitant to commit themselves to new obligations to which Moscow is not a partner. But whatever the reason, their proposals are bitterly resented by the workers' group at the conference.

WE MAY ASSUME THAT MONTGOMERY WARD and Company, when it was filing 36,000 applications to the War Production Board for preference ratings on supplies, would have been both mad and hurt if any New Deal bureaucrat had dared to suggest that its activities were not essential to the war effort. But when, as a result of the company's refusal to comply with an order of the War Labor Board, the President directed the Army to take over the Ward plant in Chicago, Sewell Avery, chairman, declared that his company was a "non-war business" and insisted on being ejected from his office by force, to the tune of a great deal of publicity and loud cheers from the stalwarts of free enterprise. We don't see how Ward's can have it both ways -but that of course is the nub of the "philosophy" known as free enterprise, of which Mr. Avery is so eloquent an exponent. He wants priorities from the WPB but he is outside the jurisdiction of the WLB. We are sure he approves of labor's no-strike promise but he doesn't believe in umpires and he objects strenuously to such concessions as the maintenance-of-membership clause which labor has claimed as a substitute for the strike. He is said to feel it incumbent upon him to keep the "pioneer spirit" alive. But, alas, he is breaking a trail back to a promised land that died of drought and erosion in 1929.

IT IS NOT ENOUGH THAT BIG BUSINESS HAS moved in and captured the chief federal agencies dealing with production, contracts, and the financing of war plants, or that it has then blamed the weaknesses of those agencies on the "New Deal" and the President instead of on its own inefficiency and greed. No, the effrontery of big business goes well beyond these tactics of grabbing power and dodging responsibility. Its further aims are well defined in a recent attack on the Department of Justice in the NAM News, organ of the National Association of Manufacturers. This journal charged that the department had at first tried to prevent the oil industry from setting up its own advisory committee to take part in the discussion of a world oil agreement. Only under pressure, said the NAM News, was the ruling modified to permit three oil men to attend the talks if they took no part in them. Mr. Biddle, flatly denying the charges, took occasion to repeat the government's policy as laid down in previous similar cases. Abbreviated, that policy provides that consultation with private "technical experts" is permissible under the antitrust laws so long as such persons have no hand in the making or carrying out of public policy. "That authority should be vested exclusively in public officers who are responsible to the President and Congress." And the department adds the warning that while "advisory committees representing private interests are one valuable source of information and advice . . . provision should be made so that any group [our italics] which feels that its interests are being neglected may present its grievances or suggestions to the government." It is hard to see just what objections the oil industry or the NAM can offer to such a ruling, except that it fails to turn over to private interests the power to control directly through their own agencies the economic policy of the government.

MR. DEWEY'S VIEWS ON FOREIGN POLICY have been a long time coming. Unkind critics are bound to ask: Where were you when the battle was thickest, when the lines were being drawn? And consulting the actual record it is not a little amusing to listen to Mr. Dewey's perhaps autobiographical account of the great American awakening: "First came the Republican Mackinac Charter, then the Moscow Charter, then the Fulbright and Connally resolutions." But Mr. Dewey is a bold historian. With a disinterested warning note for our own times-1944 in case we've forgotten-he suggests that the last post-war settlement failed because "those who drafted the treaty were tired war leaders. They could not find within themselves the physical and mental strength to make the peace a living reality." Well, the bright, fresh, unwarwearied Republicans of 1919-1920 did their best to redress Mr. Wilson's doddering efforts to set up a decent world order. But these, perhaps, are minor points. Of greater significance is the fact that through his brief political career Mr. Dewey has shown himself to be a cautious and fairly accurate opinionsampler rather than a decisive leader. And if he says to the publishers, in his clear, ringing voice, that American objectives "are to organize in cooperation with other nations a structure of peace backed by adequate force to prevent future wars" then it probably means that the American people are fairly solidly behind the policy that Mr. Hull and Mr. Roosevelt have been proclaiming for many years. It means that not many of them like the tune Col. McCormick plays and that the isolationists who are backing Dewey will have to pipe down for the time being. Whether it means that the internationalists, leaving the President and the ghost of Mr. Willkie, will climb on the shiny, new Dewey bandwagon that now plays the Hull-Roosevelt marching song is another question.

THE REPUBLICAN PRESS IS SO BUSY THESE days describing Mr. Dewey's immense popularity and stressing the "ground swell against the New Deal" that it seems to have missed one item in the returns from the recent primary election in Pennsylvania. This is that a "write-in" candidate named Franklin Delano Roosevelt ran third in the Republican primary, well ahead of Pennsylvania's favorite son, Governor Martin, as well as other leading G. O. P. contestants such as Governor Bricker and Lieutenant-Commander Stassen. Mr. Roosevelt ran close to General MacArthur, who was second to Dewey. In addition to his surprising showing on the Republican ticket, President Roosevelt rolled up nearly twice as many votes in the uncontested Democratic primary as all the Republican candidates combined. Lest the Republicans may have forgotten, it might be added that Pennsylvania has thirty-six votes in the Electoral College, second only to New York.

WE GREATLY REGRET THAT MAYOR LaGuardia has chosen to associate himself with Governor Bricker of Ohio and Governor Edge of New Jersey in opposing the relocation in the East of loyal Americans of Japanese descent. The New York Mayor does not even have the excuse of economic self-interest which moved a group of New Jersey farmers to protest against the placement of Japanese Americans in their area. He is reported to have based his objections to relocation in New York on the ground that it held "potential dangers" to an area covered with military installations, war plants, and shipping facilities. In so doing the Mayor completely ignored the fact that only men and women who have proved their loyalty beyond question are being relocated. More than 20,000 have been placed in the two and a half years since Pearl Harbor, and not a single case of disloyalty has arisen. There has not been in fact one proved case of sabotage on the part of a Japanese American, either in this country or Hawaii, since the beginning of the war, even taking into account the so-called disloyal elements held by the FBI or at Tule Lake. This being the situation, Mr. LaGuardia should not encourage the fanatics and racial bigots in New York by taking fright so easily.

G. I. Enemy No. 1

JOHN E. RANKIN of Mississippi has become the Enemy No. 1 in Congress of the service man. After succeeding in depriving many soldiers of their right to vote, he is now blocking their right to unemployment insurance and other veterans' benefits. The so-called "G. I. Bill of Rights" was unanimously passed by the Senate on March 24 but is still bottled up in the House War Veterans Committee, of which Rankin is chairman.

The "G. I. Bill of Rights" is indorsed by both the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars and by labor organizations. It is an omnibus measure providing veterans of this war with hospitalization, education and vocational training, loans for homes, farms and businesses, employment service, and unemployment insurance benefits. It would give the Veterans' Administration an appropriation of $500,000,000 to provide additional hospital facilities for veterans. It would make them eligible for a year or more of additional education, allowing them $500 a year for tuition and $50 a month subsistence. It would authorize 3 per cent loans up to $1,000, which a veteran could use to build a home or buy a farm or set himself up in business. Most important of all, perhaps, is its provision allowing veterans a maximum of $15 a week in unemployment insurance for a maximum of fifty-two weeks in a period of twenty-four months after demobilization.

Unemployment compensation of this kind is essential, since soldiers earn no credit toward their unemployment insurance. Without such special provision, as Warren H. Atherton, national commander of the American Legion, said at a press conference in New York City, "should there be scarce employment [after the war], we will have two persons standing side by side, the war worker and the soldier, and the soldier will get nothing." But according to Atherton, Rankin is blocking the "G. I. Bill of Rights" because of this very provision. The head of the Legion told the press that Rankin informed him that he was opposed to all unemployment insurance. "If Mr. Rankin means that he wants to deny unemployment insurance to the men now carrying the bayonet for Uncle Sam," Atherton told the press, "the veterans of the American Legion intend to fight him right down the line and take the issue to every voter in the country."

Rankin attacks the Service Men's Aid Act of 1944, as the "G. I. Bill of Rights" is formally known, on the ground that it is "half-baked." But the measure has been in his committee for four months. It was unanimously reported out after full discussion by the Senate Finance Committee, one of the most conservative and careful committees in the Senate. "If it can't be baked in four months," Atherton said, "we need a new baker." A more likely objection on Rankin's part is that the bill embodies the recommendations on veterans' aid made by the President in special messages to Congress last October and November. In this case, as in that of the soldiers' vote bill, Rankin and his Southern Democratic bitterenders hope, in alliance with the Republicans, to inflict another defeat on Mr. Roosevelt. They will not find it easy this time.

Behind Rankin's fight against the G. I. Bill of Rights is the desire of the sweatshoppers whom he represents to have an ample supply of cheap labor after the war. If veterans are guaranteed $15 a week unemployment insurance for fifty-two weeks, a floor is automatically put under wages. The task of driving down wages will be especially difficult for Rankin and his kind if Negro as well as white soldiers have this protection, and it thus becomes impossible to use cheap Negro labor to beat down the wages of white.

There is good authority to back this theory. On the floor of the Senate last week Bennett Champ Clark, Democrat, of Missouri, attacked Rankin for blocking aid to veterans on racial grounds. Clark said that Rankin and his supporters "are so unwilling to let the Negro troops have the unemployment insurance to which they are entitled that they would be willing to withhold deserved benefits from all our troops." But the results of Rankin's policy would be even more vicious and complex than Senator Clark implies. For his animosity toward the Negro is calculated to deprive all soldiers of unemployment protection and thus ensure a large supply of labor at distress wages in the event of a post-war depression. White soldier as well as black, like white worker and black, have a common interest in fighting this rancorous expression of all that is most vicious in our national life.

New Hope in China?

CEVERAL of the recent dispatches from Chungking Dappearing in the New York Times probably came as a considerable shock to the average newspaper reader because they ran directly counter to the prevailing highly censored view of China. Persons accustomed to read of China's great progress in recent years were hardly prepared, for example, for the flat admission by Sun Fo. president of the Legislative Yuan and son of the founder of the Chinese Republic, that "we [the Kuomintang] ... assumed the attitude and habits of a ruling caste ... suppressing outside criticism . . . and withholding from publication criticism within the party." Even more striking is the assertion of another prominent Kuomintang official that "village government has been for a long time the private preserve of the corrupt gentry and rapacious landlords [and] . . . since the war . . . these local despots have increased their power for evil-doing at the expense of our helpless peasantry." The same official added that "if a truly democratic government is to be built up in this country, these corrupt oppressors . . . must be deprived of their power."

It would be a mistake, however, to interpret these dispatches as an indication of a sudden deterioration in the Chinese political situation. Regular readers of The Nation have for many months known all the facts revealed in these reports. The one new development in the situation, and that an astounding one, is that prominent leaders in the Kuomintang should now be voicing criticisms which were vehemently denied by all Chungking officials only a few weeks ago and that the censor should permit such criticisms to reach this country. This suggests that some change of considerable importance may be brewing. Just what it may be, we are not told. But there are at least two possibilities. One is that the progressive elements in and out of the Kuomintang have at last got together and are on the verge of achieving a long-needed reorganization of the Chinese government. The fact that criticism of the reactionary tendencies within the Kuomintang was first voiced by Sun Fo, a leader of the liberal wing of the Kuomintang, would seem to support this hypothesis. Against it, however, is the fact that T. V. Soong, long regarded as the one man capable of leading China on the path to democracy, has only recently been stripped of his post as director of the Bank of China and is believed to have lost a large part of his influence in Kuomintang and government circles.

The second possibility is that the government itself, under its present leadership, is contemplating drastic "reforms" as an answer to the criticisms of the Kuomintang's totalitarian tendencies that have been aired in recent months in both Britain and America. This would relegate Sun Fo's statement to the category of a trial balloon. Although there are no official indications that such reforms have actually been decided upon, some of the dispatches hint at a lifting of the present drastic restrictions on the domestic press. This would be in line with the modification in censorship policies that apparently have already taken place. Such changes obviously are desirable. But it is doubtful whether in themselves they would go very far toward alleviating the anxiety of Western critics regarding the Chinese situation. For in their view the root evil is the feudal landlord system, which prevents China from developing an all-out war effort either in the economic or in the political sphere. This situation, as the Chungking critics now admit, has become worse as the government has retreated into the interior. Freedom of the press would ultimately aid in dealing with the problem. But there obviously can be neither true freedom of the press nor fundamental economic reforms without some shift in the orientation of political power.

Realism at the I.L.O.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Philadelphia, April 26

I HAVE been listening to a three-day debate on post-war social and economic problems in which none of the speakers that I heard so much as mentioned "private enterprise." This, I am sure, will shock a great many people in this country and may suggest to them that there is something Bolshevist about the International Labor Conference, now holding its twenty-sixth session here. Let me hasten to add therefore that I haven't heard anyone mention the word "socialism" either. The busy delegates—a distinguished cross-section of the statesmen, government officials, labor leaders and business men of forty-one nations—have no time to indulge in academic debate. They are facing problems too vast and pressing to be fitted neatly into ideological frames of reference.

The pragmatic approach to economic questions which is being forced upon European statesmen was reflected in a brilliantly lucid speech by André Tixier, representing the French National Committee of Liberation. The occupied countries of Europe, he pointed out, would be concerned after liberation not merely with the task of reconversion but with the necessity for total reconstruction. While no one could tell just what conditions would exist after the Germans had withdrawn, it was certain that the immediate prospects for economic activity would be extremely limited. Factories and communications would be badly damaged if not totally destroyed; machinery worn-out or transported to Germany; raw-material stocks exhausted. And with economic life at a standstill the French government would immediately have to tackle the huge problem of repatriating and resettling millions of war prisoners and deported workers.

Under these circumstances, M. Tixier said, any suggestion that liberation would bring automatic recovery was a dangerous illusion. So long as total supplies were inadequate, the state would have to control and plan distribution and production, operating a strict system of priorities for labor, materials, and investment. It would be a severe regime, embodying the principles which the United States and Britain had been compelled to adopt in their war economies. "It has not been chosen," M. Tixier added, "in the light of doctrinal, social, and economic preferences, but under the pressure of immediate and practical needs, in so far as we can foresee them."

Probably not even the most rugged of individualists would deny the inevitability of government intervention in the case of France and other occupied countries, which means most of Europe. But the International Labor Organization is looking beyond the immediate period of reconstruction, and the program it is considering at this time implies a large and permanent degree of planning, national and international. The main object of the present conference is to adapt the structure and policies of the I. L. O. so as to enable it to play its part in implementing the social provisions of the Atlantic Charter.

This is leading the organization into fields where it never ventured in the first twenty-five years of its existence. But most of the delegates here seem to feel that the I. L. O. can no longer confine its work to questions of hours, accident prevention, protection of women and children in industry, and the like. The Atlantic Charter pledges "improved labor standards, economic advancement, and social security" for all—ideals which can hardly be reached unless there is international cooperation in promoting full employment and a rising standard of living.

If, however, full employment is to come within the purview of the I. L. O., it cannot ignore such questions as monetary stabilization, international investment policies, raw-material controls, and the regulation of cartels. Policies on these matters will no doubt be constructed by meetings of governments or by specially created international organizations. But it should be the function of the I. L. O., as guardian of the social conscience of the world, to "scrutinize" international economic policies and point out their social implications.

This, very briefly, is the purport of the first two resolutions on the conference agenda, and it must be admitted that they cover a large amount of ground. Robert J. Watt, A. F. of L. representative, suggested that it was too large. The I. L. O., he said, should restrict its efforts to the promotion of economic democracy; social justice would follow in due course. More violent criticism came from Colonel Chapa, Mexican employer delegate, who attacked the resolutions as inadmissible interference with national sovereignties.

His point of view, however, seemed to attract singularly little support. The majority of the delegates appear quite prepared for large measures of international planning, while they take government intervention on the national level for granted. Nor is this hard to understand. The European nations face a condition, not a theory-a condition of economic chaos which will not yield to the profit motive. As for the extra-European nations represented at the conference, they are mostly semi-colonial countries seeking, in the words of Lombardo Toledano, "to emerge from the historically backward period in which we live and to become a part of modern society enjoying the benefits of civilization." The spirit in which the I. L. O. is approaching these problems seemed to me far more realistic than that animating current economic discussions in the United States. Here we are assiduously cultivating the mystique of private enterprise; abroad, pragmatism is the order of the day. Can there, one wonders, be tolerance and cooperation between these two philosophies?

Sedition and Circuses

BY JAMES WECHSLER

Washington, April 26 S THE nation's biggest war-time sedition trial gets under way in the crowded District courtroom here, an atmosphere of sickness and unreality envelops the whole proceeding. Seldom have so many wild-eyed, jumpy, lunatic-fringe characters been assembled in one spot, within speaking, winking, and whispering distance of one another. People who have read some of their more frenzied works and who remember their wackier public performances find it a trifle difficult to spend the day in their company without feeling jittery by nightfall. They cease to be comic figures. They jabber to each other about the Jews on the prospective jury; they cast suspicious glances at both innocent bystanders and their fellow-prisoners; they are firmly convinced that no man who ever voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt could possibly give them a fair trial.

In effect the thirty defendants—twenty-eight men and two women-are accused of conspiring to incite mutiny in the nation's armed forces and of acting as full-fledged partners in a worldwide Nazi campaign to divide and conquer democracy. O. John Rogge, directing the government's prosecution, has emphasized that he does not propose to use the trial as a forum against conventional isolationists. He has promised that he will show the defendants did more than oppose American preparedness, more than question our war aims, more than echo the arguments of the Berlin radio. What he proposes to demonstrate is that their shrill cries for peace, their Jewbaiting, their passionate Anglophobia were deliberately linked to the propaganda program fashioned by the Nazis, and that the connection between their views and those voiced by the Axis was not accidental. On the basis of this pledge the Civil Liberties Union and similar agencies have refrained from any intervention in the trial. But while awaiting the presentation of the government's case, they reserve the right to object later if the essential evidence is not brought out.

With the trial in progress for less than a fortnight, it has already become clear that neither the defendants, their counsel, nor the Patterson-McCormick press will permit any temperate weighing of the issues. A succession of incidents has quickly proved that for many of the defendants this is the propaganda chance of a lifetime, and several of the attorneys have been less than judicious in helping their clients to use the courtroom as a sounding-board. Most conspicuous in this role have been James J. Laughlin, representing Edward James Smythe; Ira Chase Koehne, speaking for Lois de Lafayette Washburn, the over-eager lady who gave the Nazi salute to photographers on the opening day of the trial; and a few other lawyers whose pronouncements, in and out of court, have borne a striking resemblance to the pamphlets the defendants used to issue before they were indicted. The first court sessions have been largely taken up with orations designed to prove that the only issue is whether these good men and women should be penalized for exercising the basic American right of disliking Jews. Defense attorneys ask about the ancestry of all talesmen. They ask whether government employees on the panel are subordinate to Jewish officials. They want Justice Frankfurter, Bernard Baruch, Samuel I. Rosenman summoned to testify. They snicker when a juror confesses that he was born in Minsk. It is often difficult to tell the defendants from their lawyers without a scorecard. With tenacious persistence a group of defense counsel has endeavored to bury the essential charge made by the government—that the defendants are wilful associates of the Nazi network-and to picture the trial as a brawl between Jews and other citizens.

In this effort the Chicago Tribune and the Washington Times-Herald have valiantly assisted. These two Patterson-McCormick papers have soberly, and significantly, featured irresponsible motions by defense counsel accusing "Jewish-Communist" organizations of instigating the prosecution, linking the FBI and the Anti-Defamation League, suggesting that the trial is the product of the warped brains of (Jewish) New Dealers. Ignoring Rogge's repeated assertions that he will not use the case to discredit Congressional anti-interventionists who may have inadvertently provided lunch and dinner for some of the defendants, various persons at the Capitol have raised their voices in a sort of sympathetic chorus with the murmurings of the accused seditionists.

It is natural, in a proceeding of this sort, to wonder whether the defendants, tried in time of war, can receive a full and free hearing, but developments so far have indicated that it is the government which will have the toughest task in winning a favorable reception for its testimony from the public. The defendants and their counsel act as if they were confident of support in many high places, and as if the trial afforded them a supreme opportunity to recite their pieces to a nation-wide audience. Meanwhile both the judge and the prosecution are hampered by the fear of later reversal growing out of any "prejudicial" word or deed.

Of course, pronounced contrasts among the defendants can be noted. They range from learned, scholarly-looking, self-composed Lawrence Dennis to rabble-rousing, pretty-boy Joe McWilliams; from aged, dozing Eugene Sanctuary to buxom, bellicose Elizabeth Dilling. In the line-up, too, are white-haired James True, self-proclaimed inventor of the "kike-killer"; noisy James Edward Smythe, who recently proposed a "nation-wide day of prayer"; George Sylvester Viereck, shrewd, slippery German agent, showing prison pallor as a result of a previous conviction for failing to register as a foreign agent. Two-bit Führers, hangers-on, frustrated and ailing souls who turned to fascism to get some fun out of life are all represented in this depressing company. Some of them became notorious through their wordy periodicals, some through their violent anti-Semitism, some for their early and fervid espousal of Adolf Hitler-like William Dudley Pelley, who once boasted that he spotted Hitler before any of his pro-fascist contemporaries saw that he was going places.

One wonders what the biographical data in each case would reveal as the original source of the aberration. The Bundsmen, several of whom are already in jail and regard the current trial as an outing from the monotony of prison, are probably easiest to explain. Most of them are Germans, serving the Fatherland. It is more difficult to figure out the motivation of the widely differing Americans. For whether they are convicted of conspiracy or not, their pro-fascist sentiments have been exhibited beyond dispute. Many of them can be conveniently described as crackpots. But are crackpots born or made?

Whatever the conclusion about the individuals on trial here, the seriousness of the case is unmistakable. Its civil-liberties aspect is of crucial concern since the conspiracy charge is one of the most tenuous in all our legal procedure. Certainly it is vital for the government to show that these characters were not merely spiritual sympathizers with the Hitler cause but active agents of the enemy, aware of the nature of the service they were performing. At the same time, disastrous consequences would follow a government defeat in the prosecution. Such an outcome would be the signal for an unprecedented pro-fascist crusade to begin. Innocent or guilty of the charge on which they are being tried, all the accused have announced their contempt for democracy, for minority rights, for racial equality, for the elementary rules of our society. None of them seem impressed by the fact that they are receiving a fair, dispassionate hearing under the guidance of Judge Edward C. Eicher, who seems to embody all the gentle, restrained, and thoughtful qualities of the ideal democratic jurist. They heckle him in the courtroom, sneer at him in the corridor, denounce him in published statements, demand that he dismiss himself from the case. And Colonel Robert R. McCormick seconds all the motions.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE GREAT AND CRYING FAULTS of Grant's Administration thus far have been the appointment of several worthless men to important offices, and his adherence to the old principle of rotation. These cannot be too severely denounced; but as regards the Cabinet and the general policy of the government, for heaven's sake let us for once give the President at least six months' trial.—

May 6, 1869.

DOCTOR HORACE BUSHNELL is engaged in the preparation of a work which will surely attract attention just now, and procure for its author a great deal of sympathy—for he is certain to be well abused. "Woman Suffrage, or the Reform Against Nature" is the title he gives it; and no one who knows the character of his writings will expect the body of the book to be less forcible in manner than this defiant title-page.—May 6, 1869.

TWO OR THREE OF THE PAPERS in this number of the North American are of a character to suggest the thought that, much as the usefulness and influence of quarterly magazines have declined of late years, they still fill a place that needs to be filled. . . . Mr. Henry Brooks Adams contributes an essay, which deserves to be styled statesman-like, reviewing the work of the last session of Congress. . . What it says of the Alabama treaty, the treaty for the purchase of St. Thomas, the economic measures of the present Administration, the "rings" that control the Senate and the House, the Tenure-of-Office bill—is all talk upon subjects upon which everybody has talked; but these subjects have seldom been treated with anything like the independence of thought and plainness of sensible speech that Mr. Adams brings to the discussion of them.—May 6, 1869.

TO SAY THAT the Pacific Railroad is finished is quite as much as to say, in the words of the only poet whom we have as yet observed grappling with the subject:

Hail to the pathway of nations here, It runs today through a hemisphere.

Half-past twelve (local time) of the tenth instant was the moment of driving the last nail, and before sunset the event was celebrated, not very noisily but very heartily, throughout the country. Chicago made a procession seven miles long; New York hung out bunting, fired a hundred guns, and held thanksgiving services in Trinity; Philadelphia rang the old Liberty Bell; and many towns burnt powder in honor of the consummation of a work which, and good Americans believe, gives us a road to the Indies, a means of making the United States a halfway house between the East and West, and, last but not least, a new guaranty of the perpetuity of the Union as it is.—May 13, 1869.

AFTER A LONG DELAY, which was spent in pretty vigorous discussion and canvassing, Professor Charles W. Eliot, the nominee of the Harvard College Corporation, has been confirmed as president of the Board of Overseers. The majority in his favor was two to one or sixteen to eight.—May 27, 1869.

532 The NATION

Imperial Cross-Currents

BY FRANK H. UNDERHILL

AN OLD and experienced Canadian newspaperman once remarked that with every new government Canada is made into a nation over again. So also it might be said that with every new Imperial Conference the British nations are made into a united Commonwealth over again. And another Imperial Conference is about to meet in London.

Premier King of Canada

The fifth Colonial Conference was held in London in April, 1907. One of the chief questions which it had to consider was a proposal from the British government for the creation of an Imperial Council. This body was not defined very precisely as to constitution or functions, but it was to take the place of the Conference, it was to have a permanent secretariat, and the clear intention was that it should grow into an important policy-making body in British imperial affairs. The proposal was welcomed by Australia, Natal, and the Cape, but was emphatically rejected by the Canadian government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This opposition from Canada was decisive. The new Liberal government which had just come into office was not much interested in a proposition emanating from its Conservative predecessors; and it was strongly opposed to the other main question before the Conference, Australia's proposal of mutual tariff preferences. After considerable debate the door on imperial preference was "banged, barred, and bolted"-the phrase was that of young Mr. Winston Churchill, who was a Liberal at the time and held a junior position in the British government. Instead of setting up an Imperial Council, the Conference changed its name from Colonial to Imperial Conference; that is, the British nations decided not to create a new central authority for carrying out a common policy but to conduct their relations through the cooperation of independent authorities in the mother-country and the dominions.

Today, in 1944, the prime ministers of His Majesty's several independent governments are to meet once again in conference in London. The air is once again full of vague schemes of imperial consolidation. Lord Halifax set tongues wagging by his Toronto speech of January 24, in which he declared that the British nations could play their proper part in the world only if they acted as one united Commonwealth speaking with one voice. Prime Minister Curtin of Australia has come forward with a rather indefinite proposal for an Imperial Council with a permanent secretariat, as in 1907. Ever since Canada's somewhat unhappy experiences with the Ottawa agreements of 1932, schemes for imperial preferences as the basis of a British economic empire have not been in such favor here as they used to be. And our Canadian Premier, Mr. King, the disciple of Laurier, has emphatically rejected Lord Halifax's conception of a British Commonwealth speaking with one voice in world affairs. So it wouldn't be surprising if after long discussion the 1944 Conference decided, like the 1907 one, to change its name—this time from Imperial to Commonwealth Conference.

Laurier's steady opposition through four conferences to all projects for the setting up of a central authority in the Empire fixed the course of evolution for the self-governing British nations. His purely negative work was consolidated by the positive achievements of Sir Robert Borden and General Smuts in the war-making and peace-making of the years 1914-19.

Smuts and Borden denied that the Commonwealth must either create some central authority dealing with defense and foreign policy or disintegrate into separate isolationist units. The British Commonwealth which, under their leadership, emerged from the First World War was a free association of independent nation-states, each in complete charge of its own affairs but agreeing to consult with the others. This form of association has been the despair of logicians, theorists, and absolutists. In periods of tranquillity it doesn't look like an association at all; in periods of danger it works like a well-trained team. Americans find it difficult to understand because they can't understand a team without a coach.

Borden and Smuts not merely set the pattern for future relations among the British nations but achieved for the dominions a new international status which made still more impossible the idea of a single foreign policy for the British Commonwealth, expressed through some central organ of government. By insisting on the individual representation of the dominions at the peace conference, on their individual signing of the peace treaties, on their individual membership in the League of Nations and the International Labor Organization, they launched the dominions into world politics as distinct independent nations, each speaking with a voice of its own. In the 1920's Canada and the Irish Free State took the lead in completing this process by establishing their own diplomatic representation in foreign capitals, beginning with Washington. They were followed by South Africa. After persisting for two decades in conducting their foreign relations through the instrumentality of the British Foreign Office, Australia and New Zealand have finally accepted the Canadian method and during this war have established their own legations at Washington. Canada in the meantime has sent ministers to Russia and China, and also to most of the European governments who are on our side in this war, as well as to the chief Latin American republics. It has been making its own lend-lease agreements not merely with Britain but with Russia, China, the Free French, and the other European governments in exile.

The British nations have also established diplomatic representation at one another's capitals, through ambassadors who are called high commissioners. Long-distance telephone and air transport make personal contact among Cabinet ministers and government officials of the five nations increasingly easy, and it is hard to see what can be achieved by the setting up of any new agency such as Premier Curtin has suggested.

The main point to understand is that the nations of the Commonwealth are no longer likely to move either toward disintegration or toward consolidation into a closely knit organization expressing itself with one voice. The dominions are proud that in 1940, when Hitler overran Europe, the British nations stood together by themselves to oppose him with arms. After such an experience their relationship with one another is bound to be one of special intimacy. But this does not mean that any one of them would break off the direct contacts which it has also established with non-British countries or acquiesce in having its foreign policy declared for it by majority decision in some British Commonwealth Conference or Council. In the long run a British bloc in world politics would not be likely to work out for the benefit of the British countries or of the world at large. Premier King has made it very clear that this is his opinion. And the other day he was supported by Premier Fraser of New Zealand (as reported in the New York Times of April 18): "It would not help any world system if the Commonwealth members or any other combination went into a world conference bound by prior decisions that would nullify the purposes of a world organization."

Great Britain is a European state acutely aware that its relative power in the world and in Europe has been declining. If the Smuts suggestions for its closer union with the states of Western Europe come to anything, it will be more involved in European affairs than ever. The dominions, like the United States, have always shown a strong reluctance to intervene in Europe except in a crisis. The continuous emphasis on Commonwealth unity which marks all British speeches is designed to persuade the dominions to overcome this reluctance and to assure Britain of their continued support in its exposed European position. British statesmen have been so long accustomed to a dominant role in international affairs that they will not willingly accept the position of a third power inferior to the United States and the U. S. S. R. They are already busy marking out a British sphere of influence which will give them greater weight as against their two giant allies. This is what Lord Halifax is thinking of when he tells us that the unity of the Commonwealth is "a condition necessary to that working partnership with the United States, Russia, and China to which we look," and when he adds that "if we are to play our rightful part in the preservation of peace, we can only play it as a Commonwealth, united. vital, and coherent."

There seems to be an impression abroad, however, that the whole Commonwealth is yearning for some more closely integrated form of unity and that the chief obstacle is the King government in Canada. This is due to the widely reported speeches of Marshal Smuts and Lord Halifax and to Premier Curtin's proposal for some kind of continuous Council. As a matter of fact, the members of the Commonwealth-always excepting Eirecannot be distinguished from one another in the degree of whole-heartedness with which they are cooperating in the war. Each member, however, owing to its geographical position, has a distinct national point of view and wishes to advance certain special national interests; and it happens just now that the other members find it more convenient than does Canada to express these national policies in the language of Commonwealth enthusiasm.

South Africa has long nourished ambitions to play a leading role in its own African continent. South African statesmen have certain ideas about the proper relation of blacks and whites in Africa, ideas which they hold in common with the white leaders of the Rhodesias, Kenya, and the other British East African communities, and which differ widely from the ideas held by the British Colonial Office. When Field Marshal Smuts talks about a regional reorganization of the British Empire, with dominions taking over the responsibility for certain dependent colonies, or colonies uniting to form new dominions, he is really inviting the Colonial Office to retire from its inconvenient trusteeship on behalf of the blacks in southern and eastern Africa and to leave these matters to the whites on the spot. But at the same time South Africa is well aware that with so many European powers eager for expansion in Africa, its security needs the continued backing of Great Britain. And so South Africa remains a strong supporter of a united British Commonwealth policy, but hopes eventually to steer this policy in the direction it wishes.

Australia and New Zealand occupy exposed positions in the South Pacific. They have ambitions for leadership in that area, and are conscious of their function as the one secure strategic base for the white peoples in the South Pacific. Premier Curtin wants to be sure of the continued support of the Commonwealth; his proposals for an Imperial Council are meant to insure that British policy does not become too centered in Europe; Australia does not want another Singapore fiasco. But the South Pacific dominions understand quite clearly that the main guaranty of their security must come from the United States. And the language of the Australia-New Zealand pact shows that they will not sink their identity in any exclusive British bloc. In Clause 7 they announce their determination "that their interests should be protected by representation at the highest level on all armistice-planning and executive bodies." And in Clause 14 they declare that "the two governments regard it as a matter of cardinal importance that they should both be associated not only in the membership but also in the planning and establishment of the general international organization referred to in the Moscow Declaration of October, 1943, which organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states and open to membership by all states large or small." The regional South Pacific security organization to which they look forward is one that will include all the powers with interests in that area.

Canada differs from the other members of the Commonwealth in that it has no special national interests in its part of the world for which it requires British Commonwealth support. Its general interest in world peace and prosperity it shares with all nations of good-will. Back in the middle of the last century, when Canadians were fearful of the expansionist ambitions of the United States, Sir John Macdonald was as insistent in demanding British support of Canada's security as the statesmen of South Africa or Australia are today. But we are no longer afraid of a sinister American ambition to absorb us, and so we do not ask for British support against it.

Moreover, Canada faces two new issues in regard to which it is driven to act as an autonomous nation rather than as a member of the British Commonwealth. It is getting closer to joining the Pan-American Union, and obviously its application for membership will not be welcomed by the twenty-one American republics unless it approaches them definitely as an independent nation; they would not tolerate Canadian membership in their association if that were to mean that Great Britain was getting in by the back door. Canada also is beginning to realize that modern transportation developments are making it a buffer state between the United States and the U. S. S. R. The maintenance of permanent good relations between its great southern and northern neighbors has become a vital interest for Canada. And it is not likely to make any very effective contribution to this end by operating as part of a British bloc engaged in intricate maneuvers for maintaining a British balance against both Russians and Americans. Which is what Lord Halifax and Marshal Smuts really invite us to do when they propose some closer Commonwealth unity "in foreign policy, in defense, in economic affairs, in colonial questions, and in communications." Canada and the United States, as a matter of fact, have worked out a regional system of cooperation since the Ogdensburg and Hyde Park agreements which probably goes farther in practice than the Anzac pact recently sketched out on paper.

The more Canadians think about it, the more dangerous does the Smuts-Halifax type of balance-of-power politics appear. The nations of the British Commonwealth are not powerful enough, no matter what their form of association may be, to provide for their own security by themselves. They may seek a wider basis for that security in some form of Anglo-American cooperation. But this threatens in turn to divide the world into two rival camps, the Anglo-American versus the Russian, which would be a development with sinister implications for a country in Canada's geographical position. No basis of security narrower than a worldwide United Nations organization can achieve what they desire.

At any rate the Canadian reception of the Halifax speech was distinctly cold. Mr. King on behalf of the Liberal government rejected its main thesis. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Social Credit Party also rejected it, Mr. Bracken, the leader of the Conservatives, at first expressed the delightfully non-committal opinion that Lord Halifax's speech was a magnificent presentation of his point of view, and later, under pressure from the imperialist section of his party, gave out another statement full of pious generalities about the British Commonwealth but carefully avoiding the real issue, which is whether the nations of the Commonwealth are to face the world in a British bloc with a single unified foreign policy.

Preview of the Second Front

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

An EXCELLENT preview of the "second front" was provided three days before Pearl Harbor when the Chicago Tribune published a highly confidential plan for American participation in total war prepared by the Joint Board. Probably no document of equal importance has ever been so widely disregarded in America, but we can be sure that it has been well studied by the German general staff. Naturally, some of its forecasts were inaccurate, and events have forced a number of major changes in the strategy it outlined. Nevertheless, when we check the history of the war during the past two and a half years against this blueprint, we realize that, broadly speaking, it did foreshadow the strategy that has been followed. We can therefore appreciate the hints it offers as to action in the immediate future.

The plans of the Joint Board looked to a major land operation for the defeat of Germany, prior to any final effort against Japan, but it made no attempt to set an exact date. Shortages of weapons and transport were expected to hold up the attack at least until the middle of 1943; the Army Air Corps estimated that it would be three years before the major offensive could be staged. Regardless of timing, our top military and naval strategists listed five conditions as prerequisites to an invasion of Europe. These were:

1. The surface and subsurface vessels of the Axis must be swept from the seas. . . ,

2. Overwhelming air superiority must be accomplished.

3. The economic and industrial life of Germany must be rendered ineffective. . . .

4. The combat effectiveness of the German air and ground units must be weakened by dispersion and shortage of materials. . . .

5. Popular support of the war effort by the people of the Axis powers must be weakened, and their confidence shattered by subversive activities, propaganda, deprivation, and the destruction wrought.

The first change in this program was one of emphasis. The "second front" established by German U-boats off the Atlantic coast was for months so successful that the problem of launching a new major military operation appeared insoluble. In May of 1942, for example, the United States had less than half the tonage needed to fulfil existing commitments. It was necessary to produce far more cargo vessels and escort warships than our war plan had foreseen. Only after months of "taking it" did an enormous output of merchant shipping and better convoy protection enable us to restore the balance at sea.

The second change was occasioned by an exceedingly fortunate development for the United Nations. The amazingly strong fight put up by the Russians reduced the military requirements for an invasion of Europe. The Anglo-American invasion became a "second front"; the primary front which could be expected to engage most of Germany's energies lay in Russia. Had not this development occurred, it is certain that the war could not have been won. The 215 divisions considered necessary in 1941 would have proved entirely inadequate to meet larger German armies on their own soil.

The decision to launch the preliminary "try-out" attack in North Africa rather than in Norway involved a third though minor change. The blunders that have been committed in the Italian campaign do not alter the fact that launching the attack in the Mediterranean was one of the wisest decisions of the entire war. At comparatively low cost, the Allies cleared the Mediterranean, inflicted heavy casualties on the enemy, ended the German threat to the Near East, knocked Hitler's main European partner out of the war, opened the back door to the Balkans, and gained air bases for hitting the southern half of occupied Europe. Their main strategic blunder was the decision to press on beyond Naples and the Foggia airfields when the gains from additional conquests in Italy no longer justified the costs.

Whether the British and Americans could have opened a first-class front elsewhere in Europe during the summer or fall of 1943 is open to serious question. The increases in available merchant tonnage all through that year were phenomenal, but very large forces had to be shipped abroad and the landing craft needed were simply not present in any large numbers—the result of a much-publicized blunder on the part of the Bureau of Ships. As late as the end of January, 1944, the War Department put the number of troops overseas at only two and a half to three million, and did not expect to bring it up to four million before the end of 1944.

Since the second front did not develop in 1943 as promised, the United Nations gave their airmen the green light. For well over a year, operating in great force and under uniquely favorable conditions, the R. A. F. and the United States Army Air Force have tested the air-power theories of Douhet and Seversky. In many cases heavy damage has unquestionably been done, but in others early claims have later been scaled down or entirely discredited. It has been so difficult to learn precise results that on the same day that the Eighth Air Force recently claimed a reduction of German fighter strength by 350 planes since November an R. A. F. commentator admitted an increase of 250 planes during the same period. These estimates were made after period of prolonged bombardment of plane factories that should have reduced the number of German fighters by far more than 350—if the announced results of the bombings were at all accurate.

Strategic bombing has not knocked and probably cannot knock Germany out of the war, despite the vast destruction it has caused. Aerial bombing like blockade is a weapon of attrition. It has gradually reduced German strength, and some of the gains in Russia are indirectly due to this factor. But events have not yet indicated that either the land defenses or the well-dispersed economy of a skilful and determined foe can be made ineffective by bombing alone.

On the other hand, we clearly have the overwhelming air superiority demanded by the 1941 blueprint. While the Germans are doubtless saving fighter aviation for the invasion attempt, we should be able to give very strong tactical support to our invading ground forces and keep casualties from bombing relatively low.

Anglo-American naval superiority is about as complete as can be expected in a conflict between major powers. The margin includes an abundance of merchant shipping, steadily improving defenses against submarine and air attack, and "expendable" ships to use for in-shore support of troops.

It is fat harder to estimate the military effectiveness of the Anglo-American invasion forces. Most of the troops have been thoroughly trained and are as ready to see battle as inexperienced units ever can be. One question concerns leadership, and if some of the weaknesses revealed in Italy have not been corrected we may expect to suffer not only heavy but clearly avoidable casualties.

Within bounds we can probably fix the scene of the invasion attempt. While diversions and feints may be made in Norway, Greece, or southern France, the time has passed when a policy of cautious nibbling at Germany's outposts is necessary. The invasion coast should be in an area vital to Germany and within reach of land-based fighter planes. These considerations suggest that the main effort will be made along the Channel coast of France or the western North Sea coast of Belgium or Holland. In view of the clear situation existing, it is doubtful whether the feints and dress rehearsals mentioned by Mr. Churchill will make it possible to surprise the enemy.

"WHEN I SAID SOFTENING UP', I DIDN'T MEAN HERE "

How much strength Germany has been able to hold back from the Russian mauling in preparation for attack in the west is the greatest single unknown factor. Between forty and fifty divisions have been reported in France, about half of which are troops recuperating from the Russian fighting. The others form an army of maneuver under Rommel, one of the few great tacticians produced by the present war. At one time it was reported that Germany's defeats in the east were partly due to its concentration of power in the west in the hope of repelling a landing attempt and then shifting men east once more before the Russians had advanced into vital areas. While this explanation seems highly doubtful, it cannot be ruled out. Everything indicates a great shortage of German reserves. But the only safe assumption is that the invasion will meet a stubborn resistance from brilliantly led veteran troops.

The practical difficulties before us should not obscure the fact that Germany's strategic position is almost hopeless. From the air above, from the east, from the south, and from the west it is beset by numerically superior foes grimly determined on its military annihilation. With the waning of the U-boat's ability to hold American military aid at arm's length, this steel circle has been steadily contracting. At sea and in the air the Nazis have already lost the war.

Our own position has its dangers; among them are the overconfidence and tendency to let down typical of Americans and also the innate difficulty of conducting landing operations against a strongly fortified coastline. Our victory is only potential; we could suffer a bloody repulse. Yet the conditions held prerequisite to invasion in 1941 have been achieved about as well as they can be. A sufficiently powerful offensive on land can now end the war.

Tomorrow's Tires

BY MCALISTER COLEMAN AND PETER ELIAS

ISCUSSION of the future prospects of natural and synthetic rubber continues to bounce in and out of the press, with bewildering effects. One day we are told that the synthetic-rubber industry is so firmly on its wheels that natural rubber is on the way out of the picture, and the next day that mass production of synthetic automobile tires will not be practicable until long after the war. It is possible, however, to state with a fair degree of accuracy—in terms other than those of advertising hoopla—what the situation with respect to rubber is at present and what the prospects are for a large-scale synthetic industry.

Our average consumption of rubber for 1939, 1940, and 1941 was about 670,000 tons, and unless there is a severe depression after the war, consumption will probably remain at that level or go higher. We, the people, have invested $615,000,000 in our government-owned synthetic-rubber plants—plants which the benevolent Jesse Jones will probably try to sell to the private rubber companies at around 20 cents on the dollar as soon as the guns cease firing. It is slightly ironic that Bernard Baruch, who through the summer of 1942 sat in a park in Washington figuring out a workable plan for rubber, should now be advocating the return, as quickly as possible, of government-owned plants to the privateers.

The Baruch rubber report, released September 10, 1942, advised the appointment of a Rubber Director and suggested the production of 1,100,000 tons of synthetic a year. Since then the amount has been somewhat scaled down, and the present program calls for 813,000 tons. President Roosevelt appointed William M. Jeffers Rubber Director and empowered him to decide what plants should be built and who should build and operate them, and to pass upon the designs offered. Companies whose plans are approved get the necessary funds from the Defense Plant Corporation, Mr. Jones's agency for subsidizing "free enterprise" at the expense of the people. The DPC then leases the plants to the companies. The rubber produced in them is sold by the companies to the Rubber Reserve Corporation, another Jones outfit, which takes care of the finances and distributes the rubber as the War Production Board allocates it. All this, of course, is just dandy for the companies, and they are spending a great deal of money that would otherwise go into income taxes telling us how well they are Jeffers got the program under way in a remarkably short time. He retired several months ago, and at his suggestion Roosevelt appointed his deputy, Colonel Bradley Dewey, to take his place. The program has been going along smoothly, although a bit behind schedule, and capacity operation is expected soon. Operation of the plants and production of the vital rubber is temporarily out of the hands of Jesse Jones, which is probably just as well for the future of the United Nations' supply. Jones's attitude toward the rubber problem may be gathered from a classic statement he made to a group of anxious newspapermen, shortly after Pearl Harbor, about the burning of a warehouse containing perhaps one-tenth of the nation's rubber stockpile. "It's all right, boys," he said, "the warehouse was insured." It is in the hands of this man, and some others with the same point of view, that the Baruch recommendations would leave the disposal of the key plants after the war.

At the present time synthetic tires are made chiefly from butadiene. Other rubber demands are being met largely from butyl and neoprene. Butyl is made from petroleum, under the aegis of Standard Oil; neoprene, whose chief ingredient is coal, is the baby of E. I. du Pont de Nemours. Butadiene is made from both petroleum and agricultural alcohol.

In Washington representatives of the British government and our own have been talking over synthetic rubber in relation to the international petroleum situation. Later the Dutch will be taken into the conference. Since both the British and Dutch found in the United States the biggest customer for their crude rubber before the Japanese overran their plantations, they naturally look with no favoring eve upon the setting up of a large-scale synthetic industry in this country. Placing the discussion on the lofty plane of conservation of the world's natural resources, they argue that since our synthetics are made mainly from petroleum and since petroleum is a rapidly failing and an irreplaceable commodity, while natural rubber is a crop that can be grown every year, manufacture of the synthetic product should not be encouraged. This argument, while not entirely ingenuous, will be used against all moves toward a protective tariff for our "infant" synthetics industry. Though much depends upon the damage which the Japanese will have inflicted upon the British and Dutch plantations in the Far East before the war is over, it is in the cards that synthetic rubber will provide stiff post-war competition to the natural product.

Fluctuations in the price of natural rubber since the beginning of the automotive age make a crazy-quilt pattern. It takes six or seven years for a rubber plantation to be brought to production, and the concentration of natural rubber in a few regions owned by a few nations made an economy of scarcity that at one time, in 1910, pushed the price of a pound of rubber up to a peak of $3.05. However, the development of new plantations and improvements in technology eventually brought the price down until in 1921 it was only 11 cents. Alarmed by such a rapid drop, the British in 1922 instituted the Stevenson plan for enforcing quotas and limiting production. For a short while the price rose to $1.20, but when new plantations, notably in the Dutch East Indies, came into production, the plan proved unworkable, and in 1928 it was dropped. By 1932 the price in New York had reached a new low of below 3 cents a pound.

The next British attempt at cartelization took in the Dutch, in 1934, and was called the International Rubber Regulation Agreement; its aim was to fix the price at from 10 to 12 cents a pound. Rearmament programs, however, soon made any such agreements academic; rubber rose to over 20 cents a pound in 1939 and remained between 20 and 30 cents until Pearl Harbor. After the Japanese conquest of most of the important plantations of the world, our government took control of the rubber stocks of the country and paid whatever price was asked.

Synthetics introduce a new factor into the calculation of future prices, since they set a ceiling of about 20 cents a pound on the natural product. Some natural rubber may be sold above this figure, but important consumers would turn to synthetics if the price of natural rubber went much above 20 cents. Most students of the price structure now agree that buna rubber will sell at from 14 to 16 cents a pound, butyl at from 7 to 9 cents, neoprene and the various vinyls at from 30 to 35 cents, and thickols at from 20 to 40 cents.

It is possible to make small automobile tires wholly of synthetic rubber, but so far they have not been able to equal the performance of natural-rubber tires. At moderate speed they give only about 90 per cent of the mileage and are even less efficient at high speed. This is largely because synthetic rubber has less resistance to heat. Larger tires have not yet been satisfactorily produced from synthetic rubber alone. Truck and bus tires require from 10 to 30 per cent of natural rubber, depending on the size. The natural rubber is not mixed with the synthetic but is used in side walls, where its properties are most needed. It should be remembered, however, that in the past twenty years the mileage of natural-rubber tires has increased from an average of 4,000 or 5,000 to the present 25,000 and that this development is not due to an improvement in the rubber itself but to improved techniques in the manufacture of tires. We have had a relatively short time in which to experiment with the buna rubbers, and further progress may well be made. There is a probability that not only truck but other tires will be made partly of natural, partly of synthetic rubber. The abrasion resistance of synthetic rubber is at least equal to that of natural rubber and can perhaps be made superior. In that case, tires with a carcass of natural rubber and a tread of synthetic might outperform tires made wholly of natural rubber. No mileage tests for this sort of tire have been made public.

Synthetic rubber will of course be used for other things than tires—for mechanical rubber goods, for example, and for belts and belting, hose, rubber tubing, floor coverings. For many of these the synthetic rubbers, taken as a group, have certain advantageous properties. Butyl rubber, for instance, has more satisfactory electrical qualities than natural. Neoprene, several kinds of thickol, and many vinyl compounds are less permeable and more resistant to age and oxidation. Not many of the synthetics have the physical strength of natural rubber, but they do not need it in these specialized fields. About three-fourths of this market, therefore, research indicates, will be taken over by the makers of synthetics. Again, in the production of rubberized fabrics and clothing, synthetics may be counted on to occupy a dominant position in the future. Rubber cement and rubber gloves will also face synthetic competition.

If consumption after the war is still about 700,000 tons a year, the synthetic manufacturers are reasonably sure of selling 100,000 tons or more. About half of this will probably be butyl, because of its use in inner tubes and its low cost. The rest will be made up of neoprene and all the other materials which have one or more of the properties of rubber. If the composite tire is developed, the synthetic manufacturers will have an additional market for up to 200,000 tons.

Ever since our synthetic program was started, the vultures of monopoly have hovered over it, with their threat of scarcity and high prices. Baruch's plan for "taking the government out of business" as quickly as possible after the war is meat for these birds of prey. It is your money and mine which is invested in the great plants now turning out synthetics, though Goodyear, Firestone, and Goodrich, by their advertising, would make us think that they are the boys who are financing the show. If the people can keep control of some of the important plants, we may all of us profit from this new industry. For the time being, however, synthetic rubber is on the knees of Jesse Jones of Texas, and from there it is not likely to bounce into our lap.

Fortunately, a man-sized opposition to the Jones-Baruch scuttle program is now developing within the Administration itself. In a fighting speech delivered in San Francisco on April 14 Secretary of the Interior Ickes urged that instead of giving the government-owned plants back to the privateers at a price set by them these plants be run by federal corporations in which returning service men would be given both shares and jobs. The plants would then operate on the terms of genuine "free enterprise," not be closed down or run on a scarcity basis by the cartelists and monopolists. This imaginative proposal naturally arouses the ire of Standard Oil, Alcoa, and the others who are waiting for the plums to fall, but it will be studied with interest by all who seriously want full employment after this war. The synthetic-rubber plants will be at the center of the fight for genuine industrial democracy. Much of their value will be written off if they are returned to the private profit seekers. Under some sort of public operation they can produce sorely needed civilian goods at low cost and provide socially useful jobs for hundreds of thousands of our people.

The Paradox of German Morale

BY PAUL SERING

TIS not wise to leave any people, even if it be our enemy, without hope." That view, expressed in H. N. Brailsford's new book, "Our Settlement with Germany," does not seem to have the approval of Mr. Churchill's government. Though the demand for "unconditional surrender" has been practically abandoned for Germany's satellites—as indeed it must be if they are "to work their passage home"—Mr. Churchill has made it clear that in the case of Germany this formula will be adhered to. From the point of view of political warfare it may be useful, therefore, to analyze the repercussions which the Allied refusal of hope has had on German morale.

Ever since the autumn of 1942, when the German offensive came to a standstill at Stalingrad and the Allies landed in North Africa, the German leaders have known that they had lost their chance of victory. When the destruction of a German army at Stalingrad was followed by the collapse in Tunisia, the specter of defeat stared the German people in the face. Since then all the wiles of Goebbels and all the threats of Himmler have been unable to exorcise their fears. The diatribes in the German press against "fanatics of objectivity," the prophecies of secret weapons and Allied dissensions, the hardly veiled admissions that listening to the B. B. C. has become a mass habit in Germany—all tell the same story: hope of victory has gone. And this is confirmed by reliable direct reports.

The depression that has seized the people as a result of this loss of hope has been intensified by deep-cutting changes in the daily life of every German family. After Stalingrad came the new total-mobilization drive, the final comb-out of small shops, the conscription of women. Defeat in the east has meant terrible casualties; defeat in the air has brought horror upon horror to German civilians. Shortage of dwelling-space, noticeable already before the war, has become a real scourge; shortage of clothing seems also to have reached alarming proportions in some of the badly hit raid areas. Spreading all over the countryside, évacués from the gutted towns have told the tale to millions as yet immune and, crowding in upon them, have infected them with their misery. It is hard to imagine anything more demoralizing than this uprooting of millions, going on steadily against a background of lost battles and dwindling hope.

Yet there is no panic in German cities; neutral observers speak rather admiringly of the discipline of the stricken population. The German soldiers fight on and fight well. That is the paradox of German morale: if you define morale in terms of faith in victory and in the regime, it is rotten to the core. But if you define it practically, in terms of action, it seems as firm as ever in the fifth year of war.

Striking confirmation of this picture is found in the reports of German underground groups. We know from the German press itself that the prestige of the active Nazis among the bulk of the population has fallen very low under the impact of defeat; we know, too, that the raids and the consequent mass migration of workers, added to the influx of hordes of foreigners, have disorganized German administration to the point of loosening the grip of the police. It would be natural in the circumstances to hope for increased activity by the conscious anti-fascist minority, for expansion of their influence on the great non-political majority. Yet this is not the picture we get from available reports. The work of the underground goes on in spite of the increasing number of executions; it may even have increased somewhat in scale, but there has been no change in its character. The resistance groups have not experienced any marked expansion of influence, any breaking down of their isolation. The formation of an anti-Nazi group among the Munich students may have been symptomatic of a new critical spirit, but it has not so far proved to be the beginning of a new movement.

What is the explanation of this lack of progress? Why does Nazi discipline persist, anti-Nazi action remain paralyzed, although confidence in Nazi policy and strategy has gone? The answer is that the Nazis have succeeded in turning the very fear of defeat into an asset to fighting morale. With the great mass of the German people fear of defeat has ceased to be a political attitude; it has become an intensely personal fear—the fear of losing every chance to lead a decent, quiet life again. That is the burden of the Nazi press today, and you find it echoed on the fighting fronts: "If we lose, there is no hope for any of us."

No propaganda in the world is all-powerful. Some of Goebbels's tricks have failed completely. Why does he succeed with this one? Because experience seems to support his argument. One of the obsessions of Germans today is fear of Russia, but that arises less from Goebbels's ravings about Bolshevism than from knowledge of German atrocities in Russia.

So far as the people's fears are due to a consciousness of guilt or to their experience of the horrors of war, little can be done about them. But an effort might be made, one would think, to remove those fears which are due to uncertainty about Allied intentions. For this uncertainty gives free scope to the Nazi propaganda of despair, rallies every instinct of self-preservation behind the Nazi regime on the eve of its defeat, debars the active anti-Nazis inside Germany from winning masses of their despairing countrymen to their cause. This uncertainty is today a vital factor in lengthening the war. It cannot be overcome by general assurances that the Allies are not barbarians or by political appeals backed by only one of the major Allies. It can be overcome only by a joint announcement of Allied intentions toward a defeated Germany.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

SUMMER vacations have been prescribed by law in Germany for some decades; even the lowest categories of employees and workers usually spend a few weeks at a summer resort. War-time pressures have increased the need for vacations, and the lack of things to buy has put more money in people's pockets, but the vacation season opened on April 1 with gloomier prospects than in any former year.

In the first place, the hotels and boarding-houses, before they could take guests, had to clean up after the évacués from the bombed cities who had been quartered in them. Hundreds of thousands of these évacués were thrown out on April 1. Next came a decrèe limiting the stay of any person in a resort hotel to two weeks; an exception may be made only when a physician's certificate or special permit is presented. Finally, there were the instructions issued by the "Führer of the Hotel Trade Economic Group" to the members of the "Subdivision for Bathing Resorts." To quote briefly from these:

Instead of potatoes, which may be lacking, guests should be served bread against coupons but without extra payment. Guests must bring their own bed linen and cutlery and stay for the shortest time possible. It is the duty of the landlord to find out whether a guest has the right to stay, and he must insist on doctor's certificates being shown in advance. Wherever possible, guests must be required to sign a pledge not to use electricity for cooking or for ray treatments.

It looks, therefore, as if vacations this year would be rather dreary. However, the Stockholm paper Trots Allt for April 14 imparts the comforting information that one place is excepted from all these restrictions and difficulties. This is the pretty little resort of Hirschberg in the Riesengebirge, about two hours from Berlin. "Several thousand Nazi officials with their families," the dispatch says, "live there at the present time, some of them very prominent people. Nominally they live in Berlin and other large cities, courageously sharing with their subjects the vicissitudes and dangers of the air raids. Actually they stay far from any danger zone, amusing themselves in Hirschberg, which is exclusively reserved for them." They have even, according to this report, had the Berlin Opera come to Hirschberg and give performances.

It cannot have been pleasant for those who set the stage in Germany to be obliged to celebrate Hitler's recent birthday in accordance with the ritual followed for the past twelve years. No other course was open to them, for to ignore the day or tone down the celebrations would have been equivalent to a demonstration of defeatism. But they must have realized that under the circumstances the display would make a ghastly impression. The pathetic irony of the scene was indicated by the Berlin correspondent of the Basler Nachrichten:

For the first time in Ing while Berlin is beflagged again. The occasion is Hitler's birthday. In the midst of ruins, where whole streets and even quarters have been greatly damaged, the flags make a curious impression. If any parts of the destroyed houses still stand, little flags are hung out on them, but one can scarcely see them for the piles of debris, as high as a man's head. And the flags are not so close together as they used to be. They no longer form a forest of red, white, and black.

Moreover, the stage directors must have known that their public's receptivity to these ritualized panegyrics has been, to put it mildly, considerably diminished. A small but interesting symptom of the change is reported from Bremen, one of the towns that from the beginning has been bombed oftenest and hardest. In the local paper, the Bremer Nachrichten, for March 11 a statistician discussed with exhaustive thoroughness the subject of the names given to Bremen babies in 1943. The point which emerged-and which the article was obviously written to bring out-was that "one good German name which was formerly very frequently used was seldom given to Bremen boys last year." And what name was it? One can easily guess-Adolf. The author, of course, offers no explanation of the waning popularity of the name. He does, however, explain another contrasting phenomenon -the increasing use of the name Wolfgang. "The current predilection for Wolfgang," he says, "has undoubtedly been caused by a heightened appreciation of Goethe and Mozart."

BOOKS and the ARTS

Posada: Artist of Revolution

BY DOROTHY C. MILLER

THE Mexican Revolution, as it is mirrored in Mexican art, has a richness of texture and color which is an expression not only of the political and emotional forces that made it but also of a great creative upsurge in the arts of the painter and the printmaker. In the perspective of art history this is unusual. Periods of war and revolution are often accompanied by important developments in social thinking. The arts develop more richly in times of peace.

In less than a hundred years Mexico has gone through series of revolutions that have worked profound changes in its social and political institutions and given it a renaissance in the creative arts. As a matter of fact, the art developments can scarcely be thought of aside from the revolution; they are its voice and image, the truthful mirror of its action, violence, and suffering, and of its emotion, ideals, and aspirations. Most American art lovers have some acquaintance with the great figures of the later stage of this development-Orozco, Rivera, Sigueiros. But of José Guadalupe Posada, the forerunner who lived through the Mexican revolutions and caught the spirit of the popular forces that made them, the fertile source of Mexico's revolutionary art as definitely as the aspiration of the peasants for land and liberty was the source of its revolutionary power, we know all too little. Since 1937 some examples of Posada's prints have been shown in Mexico, Spain, New York, and Paris, but it has seemed as if the popular character of Posada's work and the simplicity and humility of the man himself had served to obscure his true stature outside his own country. In 1943 the Dirección General de Educación Estética of the Secretaría de Educación Pública organized a comprehensive exhibition of his work in Mexico City. The Art Institute of Chicago has now brought this important exhibition to the United States, the first major showing of Posada's art outside Mexico.

Brilliantly installed, the exhibition at the Art Institute contains some 800 catalogued items, a large number of which are new impressions pulled from Posada's original plates. The old impressions, issued inexpensively in large editions for the widest distribution, are often uneven in the printing and ill-suited to exhibition purposes. However, the show includes a number of these old impressions, most of them printed on brightly colored papers. Great interest is added by the inclusion of more than one hundred of the original plates as part of the exhibition. These plates are relief engravings on type metal and etchings on zinc. Dramatic use has been made of photographic enlargements of some of the prints to emphasize Posada's vehement composition and draftsmanship. Similar enlargements of the original plates give them the appearance of massive sculpture in relief. They underscore Posada's power as a designer and his relation to the ancient Mexican carvers of the Chac-Mool and Coatlicue, goddess of earth and death, the most terrifyingly powerful expression of the sculptural genius of Mexico.

Posada's art has certain affinities with the art of our own country. One is led to think of Thomas Nast, Currier and Ives, and "Pop" Hart, while realizing that Posada is more powerful than any of these, more fertile in imaginative design, and richer in folk quality. He was a popular artist in the best sense of the word, truly democratic, living as a simple artisan indifferent to the professional reputations of his day, caring nothing for material success, an inexhaustibly prolific worker who produced more than 20,000 engravings in a lifetime of passionate labor. His art was directed at the great masses of the Mexican people, and it springs directly out of their lives, their labors, and their hopes. Loyal always to his convictions as a liberal. Posada continually attacked in his work the Díaz dictatorship and its injustices. Imprisonment did not impair his enthusiasm. His work contributed vitally to the revolutionary cause. It became the foundation stone of Mexican printmaking and profoundly influenced the direction and development of Mexican art in our time.

Posada, who was born in 1852, lived through the times of Juarez's fight for Mexican freedom, the reaction of Díaz, and the brief rise of the martyred Madero. He did not live to see the end of the revolution to which he gave so much. As an artist Posada was self-taught. Before he was twenty he was famous for his illustrations in El Jicote, a small political newspaper published in his native Aguascalientes. In 1887 he went to live in Mexico City, working for many newspapers and periodicals, a number of which he helped to organize, and soon joining the staff of the publishing house of Antonio Vanegas Arroyo. This fortunate association lasted until Posada's death in 1913. The Vanegas Arroyo publishing house became the largest of its kind in Mexico, the analogue of Currier and Ives in the United States, and the brightly colored sheets which it printed were distributed to the remotest parts of the country. These sheets contained satirical, humorous, or dramatic comments on current news and politics and the incidents of the revolution, in the form of corridos or ballads, chiefly written by the poet Constancio S. Suárez; as well as prayers, lives of the saints, songs, comments on fashions and foibles, and famous trials and lives of criminals. The vigorous illustrations of Posada were the most important part of these publications.

Aside from the power and aesthetic appeal of his work Possada has much to say to us on the vexed questions of propaganda, popular art, and their relation to the art of the museums. It is to be hoped that this important exhibition of his prints, surely one of the best fruits of the cultural collaboration between the United States and Latin America, will be circulated throughout the country, where it can be seen not only by the general public but especially by artists. For as José Clemente Orozco has said: "Posada is the equal of the greatest artists, an admirable lesson in simplicity, humility, equilibrium, and dignity."

An excellent illustrated book by Fernando Gamboa of the Dirección General de Educación Estética, principal organizer of the exhibition in Mexico, and Carl O. Schniewind, curator of prints at the Art Institute of Chicago, provides the first extensive publication of Posada's work in this country. A supplementary one-room exhibition called "Who Is Posada?" has been designed by Ludwig Miës van der Rohe to give the cultural background for Posada's work.

"Outside in a Garden"

A HAUNTED HOUSE AND OTHER STORIES. By Vicginia Woolf, Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

TT IS surprising that Virginia Woolf did not produce more short stories: life for her was so much an affair of vivid moments. This thin book holds all of her shorter fiction which Leonard Woolf, her husband and editor, believes worth preserving. Of its eighteen stories, all quite brief, six are reprinted from her early collection, "Monday or Tuesday," seven appeared later in magazines, and five are hitherto unpublished. Small as the book is, it is well worth having. Mrs. Woolf's deficiencies are obvious enough; yet her almost visionary flights of language and fancy are still a marvel.

Among the pieces printed here the best are probably those out of "Monday or Tuesday." They are not "stories" at all but prose poems or monologues. String Quartette, for example, is the exquisite reverie of a woman sitting in a London concert hall and listening to Mozart amid echoes of a war, banal small talk, and the trite promptings of memory.

. . . if I bethink me of having forgotten to write about the leak in the larder, and left my glove in the train; if the ties of blood require me, leaning forward, to accept cordially the hand that is perhaps offered hesitatingly-

"Seven years since we met!" "The last time in Venice."

"And where are you living now?"

Such writing recalls Eliot's early monologue poems and other works of the same period by Joyce and Pound. There is the same weaving together of images from the inner and outer life of the character; the same pathos of contrast between great art and petty reality, the heroic past and the deplorable present. That was the Age of the Soliloquy, and Mrs. Woolf brought to it her own brilliant sensibility and wonderful gifts of verbalization. But by contrast with Eliot or Joyce, one notes that her thought rarely crystallizes into general beliefs and that, as a result, her writing seldom gathers itself up into luminous symbols and far-reaching statements. When she delivers a generalized comment, it is apt to sound only a little less bouncing than a Macy ad:

Why, if one wants to compare life to anything, one must liken it to being blown through the Tube at fifty miles an hour-landing at the other end without a single hairpin in one's hair. Shot out at the feet of God entirely naked. Tumbling head over heels in the asphodel meadows like brown-paper parcels pitched down a shoot in the postoffice.

That life is, after all, a delicious romp is not what Mrs. Woolf appears to have wanted to say in The Mark on the Wall, the generally grave and beautiful early piece from which this passage is quoted. Yet the passage represents to perfection what a younger generation of English writers came to execrate as the Bloomsbury touch—the careful and almost deliberate reduction of experience to a pretty triviality. Yes, Mrs. Woolf certainly had her moments of lush inconsequence, together with much seriousness of feeling and intention. She was perhaps too warmly persuaded of art's merely "decorative" mission, a faith she shared with the imagist poets and with painters like Gauguin, Whistler, and Laurencin. So she proceeded to treat people as features

One of the appalling psychological and political hypocrisies of this period is laid bare with brutal frankness in "A Letter to American Liberals" by Eugene Lyons in the May Mercury . . . Though they hailed the Atlantic Charter, self-styled "liberals" now think nothing of scrapping it . . . ## About a Great Frenchman:

Commenting on the reported death of Herriot, France's great liberal statesman, Time said "death came to Edouard Herriot, but not to his words, not to his memory." . . . One of our proudest memories here at The American Mercury is that we published his last written words. In 1941, through underground channels, out of fallen France, we received an article by Herriot. It was the first—and as far as we know the only—democratic statement that came from a leader still inside defeated France. Shortly after the article was published, Herriot was arrested, as he must have known he would be . . . The privilege of carrying such a message under such circumstances is one that we shall always cherish.

In a cosmic design of which the prime elements were derived from the landscape and the weather. Such an idea is legitimate enough in itself, though to carry it out successfully the artist would surely need to be free of any pressing sense of emotional complications either in herself or in other people. But the later stories in this volume—not to mention her novels—make it clear that Mrs. Woolf had no such equanimity.

Her later parratives are more dramatic than her earlier ones; they are the kind of story that undertakes to suggest an entire life through a single brief illumination, and they are full of an urgent emotion. All rather special cases, her characters suffer acutely from isolation; they feel themselves to be "walled in," to be "behind glass"; or as she writes of the heroine of A Summing Up, ". . . she was condemned to be herself and could only in this silent and enthusiastic way, sitting outside in a garden, applaud the society of humanity from which she was excluded." But there is not much applauding of humanity or of anything else in these rather sad tales. When common humanity does appear, it is represented as conventionally grim and stuffy -a caricature. Nor are Mrs. Woolf's "special cases" at all happy in their singularity: they repeatedly avow their sense of inadequacy; they confess to a bitter self-contempt. And they are so unsociable that they do not even confess, like Chekhov's characters, to other people but only to themselves. In fact, neither in Chekhov nor in Lawrence nor in Anderson nor in Katherine Mansfield is there anything equal to the unrelieved melancholy and frustration of the world of Mrs. Woolf's characters.

Even within their rather narrow limits her later stories are not by any means equally successful, though several of them are certainly masterpieces. When she attacks her subject directly and without the assistance of fantasy, she is apt to leave us merely impatient and dispirited. She brings to bear on her special cases so little historical insight and so little of either the tragic or the comic imagination that her art seems to exist at the same level of baffled sensibility as the life of her characters. But there are at least two really unforgettable tales among Mrs. Woolf's later performances, Solid Objects and Lapin and Lappinova, each involving fantastic and beautiful conceit and each a true fable. The plight of all Mrs. Woolf's characters is perfectly summed up in little Lappinova, who can endure marriage only by pretending that she and her husband are not man and woman but a pair of rabbits in the fields. ### History as Accident

U. S. S. R.: THE STORY OF SOVIET RUSSIA. By Walter Duranty. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

spective Walter Duranty has set down the sequence of events which make the story of Soviet Russia from the Czar's abdication to the Moscow conference. The narrative is brilliant and subdued. There are no new facts or explanations. For one reason or another, a great deal that is widely known and understood is wholly omitted or presented casually. Russia is serving the whole of mankind in this war; this is bound to overshadow everything. What is left of the story is fascinating enough. Those for whom Russia's recent past is still a mystery will find the book an attractive introduction to a theme that will grow in importance with the years. People already familiar with the main outlines of Soviet history will perhaps be more interested in the author's approach to his material. The value of a history derives from the historian's values.

Mr. Duranty explains at the outset that the determining factor in Russian history has been the flatness of the Russian land. It is an open land, exposed and undefended, therefore forced to submit to one strong ruler. From the beginning, we are told, Russia was doomed to autocracy and to an unending fight for a strong, central, protective power against outer enemies. Ivan the Terrible and Peter the Great built the czarist autocracy. Despite its oppression, it might have survived popular opposition except for the fact that Nicholas II was weak and vacillating. History is thus determined by the unalterable accident of geography and the alterable accident of the ruler's character.

This makes the 1917 revolution also something of an accident. At any rate, the author believes firmly that its Marxist appearance was accidental. Lenin, a man of strong and resolute character, gave the revolution a Marxist tinge. Actually it was a national revolution from the beginning, like that of 1789. The rest was an illusion which time corrected.

On these basic presuppositions the story moves swiftly along expected lines through war, revolution, intervention, counter-revolution, terror, famine, and the immense creative labor of founding a Soviet state and society. But Lenin's death was followed by gigantic conflicts, political and personal. The Five-Year Plan marked a turning-point as sharp and far-reaching am October. This compels the author to redefine his historical principles.

Here they are given as personality and luck. He accepts with some reservations Carlyle's view of the hero in history. He believes without reservation in luck as a major historical force. Again and again he sees the hand of accident in changes of the utmost importance. In the end personality and luck triumph. Just as for twenty years the history of Russia became the history of Napoleon, so the history of Russia became the history of Stalin. Apart from these theories the chapter called Portrait of a Strong Man is one of the most interesting in the book.

The principles of geography, accident, personality, and luck are not applied consistently or effectively. They fail to give this vivid memoir genuine historical coherence. It is not always clear just what fundamental changes took place at any time or what the mainsprings of Russia's development have been. The author concludes, however, that Stalin "found it necessary to abandon 'communism' so called, which offered no incentive to the average man, and to revert to a system almost equivalent in method to capitalism."

The system is defined as state capitalism. It was this, we are told, which transformed Russia from an agricultural to an industrial country and enabled it to prepare its defenses against the German assault which Stalin foresaw.

Toward the end the key to the entire narrative emerges.

During the whole of modern Russian history, events have moved consistently to the present war, from which everything that went before derives its meaning and everything to come can take its start. Like the histories of a hundred other periods, ranging from Solon's Greece to the French Revolution, this is one in which the future determines the past. Within these assumptions, it is one of the best accounts of Soviet Russia available.

Fiction in Review

F THE three novelettes in Stefan Zweig's "The Royal Game" (Viking Press, $2.50) only the title story is making its first appearance in book form; it is Zweig's last work of fiction; the other two stories are already familiar to an American audience. Amok, you will recall, is the story of a doctor in the Dutch Indies who refuses an abortion to the woman he desires and thus precipitates her death; both in conception and writing it is mechanical almost to the point of slickness. Letters from an Unknown Woman, the record of the love of a beautiful woman for a faithless writer, you will remember as pure Mayerling Vienna, a sad-sweet confection on the level of adolescent romancing. Compared to these companion pieces, The Royal Game is a serious and adult literary effort—a story that has at least the beginnings of a first-rate idea, for a good part of its way hints at profound meanings, and for all its way has a terrific dramatic tension. Set on board a ship bound for South America, it is a study of the conflict, over a chessboard, between brute mental power and the divided mind of civilized man; one suspects it was intended as a political parable along the lines of Thomas Mann's "Mario and the Magician." But despite its dramatic suspense and its classic narrative skill, the story doesn't come off. Neither the psychological nor the symbolic point is ever made, and the story ends without resolution. "The Royal Game" turns out at last to be no more than an anecdote, and one is frustrated in proportion as one has been promised a large imaginative experience.

W. Somerset Maugham's "The Razor's Edge" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.75) is subtitled "The story of a man who found a faith," but it is not a religious novel. It is not even a mystical novel, really, despite the fact that one of its chief characters is the man who finds faith, in India, in the mystical worship of the Absolute. For Maugham's concern with the realm of the unworldly-and it is not a new concernis scarcely more serious than his purely mundane concerns. He has an amateur's interest in the spirit which is perhaps only the natural counterpart of his ever-waning interest in the fruitful human possibility. "A chill went down my spine as it strangely does when I am confronted with deep and genuine emotion. I find it terrible and rather awe-inspiring," he says of himself in "The Razor's Edge," and he reveals the flirtatious nature of his occasional excursions into mysticism just as he suggests the reason for the failure of his whole literary career. Mysticism, that is, is bound to be inviting to the person who is afraid of the deep emotions; yet it can never fully win him, any more than humanity can fully win him. All the characters in Maugham's latest novel inevitably inhabit the non-dimensional universe which is all that is left when the deep emotions have been disavowed.

Death Takes a Powder

EATH, lately, and bereavement have been getting a good deal of friendly attention from Hollywood. God has been let in out of the rain, too (though I must save discussion of that for another time). Adversity makes strange bedfellows; and there are always people on hand to go through their pants' pockets while they sleep, just on the chance. The real wonder is not that Hollywood is so eager to exploit the grief, anguish, fear, premonition, and troubled spiritual apprehension of everyone on earth it can reach, but that it has been so slow in recognizing the magnificence of its opportunity to do so. It is more than possible, too, that a good deal of this extremely lucrative exploitation is "sincere." Certainly it would seem a natural, even inevitable function of a popular art which was half worthy of its reach, its responsibilities, and its potentialities-which was, in other words, even half healthy, even a fraction alive-to undertake these immense experiences and preoccupations and to bring to them some measure, however meek, of understanding, order, and illumination.

But nothing of that sort occurs in the films I am thinking of; indeed, every effort is made to keep anything of that sort from occurring.

"Happy Land" set up a pretty, prettily photographed American town without an ounce of meanness or ugliness or even complicatedness in it, set up an American boy to match, took him off to war, killed him, and assured his grieving father that that special boyhood, in that special town, was unarguably worth dying for. This questionable thesis was demonstrated by Harry Carey, a ghostly grandfather who made it clear that just as there is nothing much to worry about above ground in our native land, the American Hereafter is a pleasant Old Soldiers' Home.

"A Guy Named Joe" told of an ace who was killed and who promptly got steady employment from his heavenly boss, Lionel Barrymore, teaching a neophyte how to become an ace too. This ghost has also to watch his young pupil court his former sweetheart, and to cure her of her grief over himself. In bare outline and idea this story offers a good workable metaphor for tradition in an art of skill, and wonderful possibilities for drama. The jealousy of a living lover for a dead man made one of Toyce's finest stories; the emotions ghost might feel who watched a living man woo and cajole his former mistress seem just as promising to me; the paralysis and slow healing of a bereaved woman is not a bad subject, of itself. But to make such a film-above all at such a time as this-would require extraordinary taste, honesty, and courage. The makers of "A Guy Named Joe" had courage, if moral idiot has it: I doubt whether taste and honesty enter into it at all. I can hardly conceive of a picture more stonily impious. Joe's affability in the afterlife is enough to discredit the very idea that death in combat amounts to anything more than getting a freshly pressed uniform; and he is so unconcerned as he watches Van Johnson palpitate after Irene Dunne that he hardly bothers to take his gum out of his mouth. The people who have the best right to picket God on this matter, or at least Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, are the dead whom the film is supposed to honor; failing that, widows, and the surviving pupils and lovers, can hardly make adequate protest.

The astonishing "Tender Comrade" is one in the eye for widows, with plenty for mere war wives too, and nothing I can imagine for anyone else except the hardiest misogynists, for whom it should prove the biggest treat and the most satisfying textbook in years. "Tender Comrade" gets along without dry ice and well-fed ghosts: its comfortable realism suggests an infinitely degraded and slickened "Little Women." The highest-salaried tender comrade is Ginger Rogers, hilt-deep in her specialty as a sort of female Henry Fonda. She is a girl named Jo. In flashbacks you are given her courtship, marriage tiffs, etc., with ber tender comrade, who is now away at war. They have the curious accuracy of those advertising dialogues in which Mr. and Mrs. Patchogue eliminate their erotic blockages by wrangling their way through to a good laxative. Jo is waiting out the war in a rented house with four other female comrades, of whom three are working in an aircraft plant. The fourth shows how any decent refugee can meet the servant shortage by refusing any pay for housekeeping; the others prove their Americanism by splitting their wages with her-whether she pays for their food out of her cut is not indicated. The only one who shows any signs of disliking all the cooperative, sorority-house democracy, which all but suffocated me, and of having enough sex in her to suggest that many women may be inconvenienced or even tempted, at present, is branded also as a sucker for Axis propaganda and as especially undiscriminating about men. Miss Rogers consistently addresses these companions as "kids," her baby as "little guy" or "Chris Boy." At the climax. getting news of her husband's death. she subjects this defenseless baby to a speech which lasts twenty-four hours and five minutes by my watch and which, in its justifications of the death. the obligations it clamps on the child. and its fantastic promises of better world to come, is one of the most nauseating things I have ever sat through. It is terribly pitiful-to choose the mildest word-to think how much of America this scene and the picture as a whole are likely to move, console, corroborate. and give eloquence to. For in every word, inflection, gesture, motive, and act, the thing seems as fiercely, ultimately exact as Gertie MacDowell. A mass of women, frightening to conceive of, and the women's magazines, and the movies must have created each other mutually to belong so wholly to each other; and when you see such a film as this you have seen the end. What God hath joined together, let no man put

Compared with such sugartit treatments of death and its consequences "Between Two Worlds" seems very decent indeed. But really it isn't, very; it is just "Outward Bound" brought up to date, sad to think of as the best we can do. Most of the newly dead on this ocean liner bound for eternity are killed by a very up-to-date bomb, but the bomb also helps destroy the highly theatrical but quite chilly suspense which was the best thing in the play; you know they are all dead from the start, instead of discovering the fact as gradually as they do. Also there are no soldiers aboardto say nothing of an enemy; and for ferry service from a world so saturated with death, the ship seems strangely empty-a fact that was not obtrusive in a day when death was not obtrusive. The characters, though they are sincerely played, are convincing neither as individuals nor as generalizations. They are drawn with the coarseness peculiar to genteelism, and their dramatic gyrations, even at best, are operatic-Piccadilly, as of twenty years ago. Their inventor does have the nerve-which we seem to have lost-to conceive that such characters face judgment and that it is a judgment worth fearing; and the judgment seems, within its liberalagnostic limits, compassionate and gently-too gently-intelligent. That people ever took this for a distinguished play is a measure of something stultified and sadly hungry, in that time, about the general sense of life and death; today, the play speaks through moral and theatrical traditions which are receding so rapidly that the whole business is like politely murmured withdrawal from a drawing-room which turned out to be a slaughterhouse. Whether we like it or not we are beyond things like "Between Two Worlds," however decent and sober their intention. And whether we know it or not-and I believe most soldiers and many civilians know it-we are beyond and above the cruel, fetid, criminal little myths about death which are the best, so far, that Hollywood has furnished out of its own immediate day. They are as evil as cosmetics on a cadaver. JAMES AGER

DANCE

N A recent Sunday article Edwin Denby wrote that people had been asking him to tell them off the record whether the popular-priced ballet at New York's City Center was really any good. His answer was that the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe was a company of first-rate dancers who were handicapped by the deficiencies of the theater and by the monstrous overworking of their leading dancers, Danilova, Franklin, and Youskevitch. But he wrote his article before the end of the first week of the engagement, when the most monstrous abuse of these dancers occurred: since it was appearing under city auspices the company gave a special performance on Friday afternoon for high school students, then went on to give the regular Friday evening performance, two performances on Saturday, two on Sunday, and "by public demand"-meaning managerial greedan extra performance on Monday, which originally had been scheduled as a day of rest. As a result, I was reliably informed, the dancers went through Monday's ballets in evident exhaustion.

But I think Mr. Denby was too generous in calling the Monte Carlo a first-rate company. It has lost all but three of its great dancers—which is why these three are overworked; and the supporting company around these three is quite poor. And its repertory no longer includes some of the outstanding works in which the great dancers it has lost —Toumanova, Massine, Eglevsky—used to appear. If, nevertheless, one goes to its performances and puts up with the poor supporting company and with things like "Red Poppy" and "Ancient Russia" and "Snow Maiden," it is because, as Mr. Denby wrote, "no dance lover will want to miss seeing Danilova, Youskevitch, or Franklin," or, he might have added, "Rodeo," "Serenade," "Beau Danube," and "Gaité parisienne."

It is the Ballet Theater which, by virtue of its leading dancers and the company that supports them, may be called first-rate; and which now treats its great dancers with admirable consideration. Markova now dances in only one of the evening's balletswhich may be as long as "Romeo and Juliet" or as short as the "Nutcracker" pas de deux; and the first two Mondays she did not dance at all. But it seems to me that this way of being considerate of its leading dancers imposes on the Ballet Theater the further obligation to be fair to the public by publishing casts. The person who pays up to $4.20 for a seat should be allowed to know whether for that price he is going to see Markova and in what. Having read reports of her performances he may have chosen one of them to spend his money on, and have bought his seat well in advance; and he should not discover when he arrives in the theater that she is not dancing that role. or perhaps that she is not dancing at all this evening, and that in her place in the classical bellet he is not even going to see exquisite Hightower, but acrobatic Gollner. And in addition a person who pays up to $4.20 to see Markova in "Romeo and Juliet" is entitled not to have his view of Markova in "Romeo and Juliet" repeatedly cut off by latecomers. The City Center gave him an uninterrupted view of Danilova in "Swan Lake" for only $2.40.

The Ballet Theater's repertory also is a rich one, with many fine works and of course a few that are insignificant ("Romantic Age") or quite bad ("Helen of Troy," "Gala Performance," "Mlle. Angot"), and with adequate representation of the classics and the works of most modern choreographers. One modern choreographers. One modern choreographers. One modern choreographers which was scheduled only twice in the present engagement. This is inadequate because Balanchine, as Mr. Denby wrote after the Monte Carlo performance of "Serenade," "is the greatest choreographer of our time." It is important to have that stated authoritatively; but more important is what Mr. Denby said in explanation of his statement. "His style is classical: grand without being impressive, clear without being strict. It is humane because it is based on the patterns the human body makes when it dances; it is not-like romantic choreography-based on patterns the human body cannot quite force itself into. His dance evolutions and figures are luminous in their spacing, and of a miraculous musicality in their impetus. Sentiment, fancy, and wit gave them warmth and immediacy. But as the audience actually watches, it all looks so playful and light, so unemphatic and delicate, it doesn't seem to call for noisy applause. Ten years later, when noisier successes have faded, one finds with surprise that his have kept intact their first freshness and their natural bloom."

To that repertory there have now been added two new ballets. The first, Agnes De Mille's "Tally-Ho," has music by Gluck which leaves one's ears battered and sore from the almost uninterrupted trumpets and drums of Paul Nordoff's scoring and the blatant performance conducted by Dorati: it has a charming set by Motley, and costumes, also by Motley, which wonderfully point up the witty movements and gestures with which De Mille introduces her characters in their initial situations. Unfortunately she has not realized the end of the story in dance terms as entertaining or even as clear in meaning as those of the beginning. De Mille herself, Laing, Dolin, and the others give the work a first-rate performance.

On the other hand Jerome Robbins's "Fancy Free" carries its brilliant caricature unfalteringly to the very end. What is sharpened into caricature is the ways of sailors; and the dance movements with which this is done are themselves sharpened caricature of everything from low-down dances of sailors and their girls in dance halls to the styles of famous ballet dancers and choreographers. Oliver Smith's scenery is beautiful in color and his backdrop is superb; but the aggressiveness of the exaggerated distortion of his foreground construction bothered me. That, however, was nothing compared with the aggressive self-intrusiveness of Leonard Bernstein's music. The performance by the young second-line dancers-Robbins, Kriza, and Lang as the trio of sailors, Bentley, Reed, and Eckl as the girlsis as brilliant as the ballet.

Is It Journalism?

Dear Sirs: About a year and a half ago the Chungking government organized a School of Journalism and Dean Ackerman of Columbia University gave it his blessing by sending along four or five faculty members from his school. He also announced at the time that someone had anonymously donated $125,000 for the support of the school for a certain period. The announcement of the enterprise was made by Hollington K. Tong, Vice-Minister of Information in the Chungking government, and all information from Chungking led to the conclusion that the School for Journalism was merely a branch of Tong's propaganda department. In other words, the object was to train Chinese for service as public-relations men in the various Chinese consulates and embassies all over the world.

Those who are sincerely concerned with democratic development in China held their peace until recently when Hollington K. Tong announced the appointment of a new dean of the department, one Rodney Gilbert, who has been a member of the contributing staff of the Herald Tribune, writing under the name of Heptisax. It now develops that Gilbert, up to about ten years ago, was a notoriously anti-Chinese writer on the staff of the British North China Daily News at Shanghai. Gilbert has never taught journalism but has been . visiting lecturer on the staff of Columbia University.

The episode is of special interest because Ackerman has always adopted a sanctimonious attitude toward journalism and never passes up an opportunity to write a letter to somebody, opposing fascist tendencies in journalism.

Mr. Browder Protests

Dear Sirs: My attention has been drawn to your issue of April 15, in which you publish a letter from Bernardo Ibañez of Chile complaining that I had slandered him in a speech of January 30, and that I am "a man devoid of any sense of responsibility."

May I point out, as a matter of public record, that it was from friends of Mr. Ibañez that public announcement was made that he had appealed for the recognition of the Bolivian government, and that he had been in consultation with men in the United States who wished that he should displace Vicente Lombardo Toledano M president of the Confederation of Latin American Workers, Mr. Ibañez could hardly have failed to know of these public announcements, since he was in the United States when they were made, and was in association with the persons who made them. Yet he did not find it necessary then to deny the statements made by his own friends and associates, nor does he do so now; he merely says that when I take public notice of what his friends announce on his behalf, it is I who am guilty of "calumny."

I suggest that any Nation reader who is really interested in the facts behind this incident read in the New Leader of February 12 an article by a friend of Ibañez, José Antonio Jerez. This is . truly indecent attack on Vicente Lombardo Toledano, and a naive exposé of the activities of Ibañez as well as of his ambitions. If Mr. Ibañez were seriously interested in protecting his good name in the United States he would publicly repudiate this article published in his behalf. This he has not done.

My interest in this question lies primarily in combating misinformation spread in the United States concerning the Latin American labor movement. Lombardo Toledano needs no defense from me. He is the unquestioned spokesman for the Latin American labor movement, heading its representation to the International Labor Office and to the London Congress to be held in June; he is also the spokesman for millions of Latin American democrats and a major political leader of his own country, Mexico. For the honor of our own country we cannot tolerate the spreading of public calumny against this man, the most eminent of Latin Ameri-EARL BROWDER

The Shape of Things

A NEW IMPASSE HAS BEEN REACHED IN THE negotiations between the French Committee of National Liberation and the Anglo-American authorities as a result of the communications restrictions imposed by the British last month. Only the United States, Russia, and the Dominions were exempted from these measures, and the fact that countries with a vital stake in the invasion were lumped in with the neutrals caused a good deal of heart-burning. The governments of Belgium, Holland, and Norway were at least in London and in direct touch with the High Command. But for the French Committee, with its headquarters in Algiers, the impossibility of any private communication with its representatives in London was a severe handicap. It was all the more so since those representatives, General Koenig and Pierre Vienot, were engaged in delicate negotiations with General Eisenhower covering the relations between the French authorities and the liberating armies. Now, as a result of this communications trouble, the French Committee has decided to suspend the discussions. Maybe in view of the urgent necessity of perfecting liaison arrangements, the Committee is being unduly touchy about a supposed affront to its sovereignty. But this sensitivity is a direct and inevitable result of our grudging and still incomplete recognition of its authority.

LAST WEEK'S PRIMARY RETURNS BROUGHT new encouragement to progressives throughout the country. In the deep South, supposedly a hotbed of anti-New Deal sentiment, two of the President's staunchest and ablest supporters, Senators Claude Pepper of Florida and Lister Hill of Alabama, scored surprisingly easy triumphs. Their victories were all the more notable because both had been violently attacked on the issue of white supremacy. In rock-ribbed Republican South Dakota Senator Gurney was renominated with a safe margin although he had been criticized for supporting the President on various issues, especially on foreign policy. And Indiana's Charles La Follette, one of the outstanding liberals in the House, was renominated on the Republican ticket by an overwhelming majority. All these results might be attribuated—as the tory press is hopefully suggesting—to the natural advantage possessed by the "ins" if it were not for the fact that three of Alabama's most notorious reactionaries encountered unexpectedly heavy going at the polls. Representative Joseph Starnes, a leading member of the Dies committee, was defeated; the other two—Carter Manasco and John Newsome—face run-off elections. The defeat of Starnes was noteworthy as a demonstration of growing labor strength in the South. It is a bad omen for Martin Dies, particularly since labor has succeeded in achieving a 25 per cent increase in registration in the Texas Representative's district.

HOW SERIOUSLY GENERAL MACARTHUR took the campaign to draft him for the Republican Presidential nomination we do not know. Certainly his response to the Miller letters suggested a high state of receptivity. No less certainly, the public reaction to his apparent indorsement of Representative Miller's acutely partisan political analysis was overwhelmingly unfavorable. From then on it was a case of "put up or shut up," and by declaring "I do not covet it [the nomination] nor would I accept it," the General recognized that the trial balloon launched on his behalf had been shot down in flames. His political camp followers were sadly disappointed as they realized the finality of his decision and began to wind up their affairs. But the country at large was relieved to know that henceforth General Mac-Arthur's attention would be concentrated on the military tasks he is so well equipped to perform.

THE GENERAL'S ABDICATION PRACTICALLY clinches Governor Dewey's nomination and leaves the iso-nationalists in a political cul-de-sac. Already the Chicago Tribune, finding itself altogether too well isolated, is complaining that the Middle West is being left out of the Republican Convention program. "The delegates from the heart of the nation," it declares, "should be careful that this convention is not stolen as the last one was." Gerald L. K. Smith, the Führer of Detroit, infuriated by Dewey's recent speech on foreign policy with its cautious approach to internationalism, has accused the New York Governor of "slipping into Willkie's bed"-the ultimate in immorality according to Smith's code. Mr. Smith is toying with the idea of calling a convention of his America First party for the purpose of drafting Colonel McCormick. We fear that this scheme, which would have the merit of bringing all the iso-nationalists into the open and permitting a nose count, will not mature. The Colonel's political I. Q. may not be very high, but he probably has enough acumen not to get in the way of a hungry elephant excited to frenzy by the enticing smells of office.

THE RISING TEMPO OF ALLIED SUCCESSES IN the Pacific and Burma has led most Americans to overlook the significance of Japan's powerful offensive in China. The purpose of the offensive is clear. Since the beginning of the war the Chinese have clung to a short stretch of the main north-south railway linking Peking with Hankow and the Yangtze valley. This has meant that the Japanese forces in central China have been dependent on river communications. Now the Japanese have captured the important junction city of Chengchow and have cleared all but a forty-five-mile stretch of the railway. Capture of this stretch would greatly strengthen their position in central and southern China and enable them better to meet the expected United Nations attempt to set up air bases for the drive on Japan. The inability of the Chinese to stop the Japanese, in conjunction with indications of continued political dissension in Chungking, has aroused new anxiety here, but much of this is probably unwarranted. The Chinese have suffered far greater military reverses in the past without impairing the people's will to resist. And the recent willingness of the Chinese leaders to accept criticism from their Allies bespeaks a strengthening of the democratic elements who are pledged to carry the war to a successful conclusion.

THE DISCOVERY OF SYNTHETIC OUININE IS a scientific event of the first magnitude, but hardly less significant are the circumstances under which two young Harvard chemists came to solve this century-old problem. Although the shortage of quinine and the shortcomings of atabrine made the need for synthetic quinine obvious, neither the government nor Harvard University undertook to organize research into the problem. Instead, the Polaroid Corporation was permitted, for an investment of a few thousand dollars, to hire Harvard brains and use Harvard laboratories, and is now the owner of the process. Despite a glowing press release by the company, it is far from clear that it will make this discovery freely available to the government or to industry. The chances are that the process will be subjected to the kind of cautious and limited commercial exploitation that is part of "business as usual" in the drug trade. The corporate affiliations of certain officials of Polaroid make it unlikely that they will move in any way that might unduly embarrass or discomfit either the natural quinine cartel or the monopoly on atabrine held by Winthrop Chemical for General Aniline and Film and Sterling Products. Yet more quinine is a war essential in the Pacific and cheaper quinine would be a blessing in other tropical and semi-tropical areas, including our own South. Why can't the government take over the patent and give us quick action in making the transition from laboratory experiment to large-scale production?

THE AUTHORS OF "THE RACES OF MANKIND," a pamphlet which gives in simple and succinct language the findings of science on the subject of race, make the sensible and by now hardly sensational statement that all the peoples of the earth are a single family and have a common origin. In March Representative May, of Kentucky, persuaded the War Department not to use the pamphlet in army orientation courses because its cool scientific observations ran counter to his own warm prejudices in favor of white supremacy. Now a subcommittee of the House Military Affairs Committee, of which May is chairman, has solemnly announced, after an "investigation," that the pamphlet is filled with "techniques of Communist propaganda," presumably because it ascribes so-called racial differences to differences in environment over long periods of time and sticks to the scientific thesis that all men are brothers. In those excerpts of the report which we have seen, the committee -its chairman is also a Southerner-plays fast and loose with the text of the pamphlet, misquoting it freely and tearing sentences out of context with complete abandon. The committee even condemns the illustrations—which are both amusing and illuminating-and does not hesitate to make itself ridiculous by pointing out that "Adam and Eve are depicted with navels." The whole performance could be dismissed as comedy if it were not for the fact that the subcommittee's report is one more attempt to perpetuate the tragic fallacies of race. We hope the War Department will continue to put such reading matter as "The Races of Mankind" into the hands of servicemen.

THE TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF CARTHAGE provides few lessons for the builders of a peaceful world. For peace-building is a slow, painful, complex job, demanding the single-minded devotion of men of good will of all nations-including Germany. A group of German exiles in this country have just formed a Council for a Democratic Germany. Differing in political viewpoint and professional interest, they are united in their hatred of Nazism and their faith in democracy. Their objectives are to study practical measures needed for the post-war reconstruction of a democratic Germany, to discover the ways by which the German educational system can be purged of its fascist and Nazi teachings, and to formulate a program of action to which all democratic forces in post-war Germany can adhere. Sponsoring the Council is a group of American liberals including John Dewey, Henry Seidel Canby, William Allen Nielsen, Lewis Gannett, Paul Kellogg, Reinhold Niebuhr, Bishop Henry Hobson, Emil Rieve, Dorothy Thompson, Dean Christian Gauss. We agree with the American group that "neither a soft peace nor a hard peace, neither sentimentality nor vindictiveness will create the conditions of an abiding peace." The responsibility is on those who lead in the reconstruction of Germany's political and economic life and on those who build the larger international order in which the new Germany will have a place.

GERMAN DEMOCRATS MUST FACE THE FACT that the German people as a whole cannot and will not be absolved from all responsibility for Nazism. This was clearly hammered home in the course of the deliberations of an ILO sub-committee which was considering a resolution dealing with the economic rehabilitation of Germany, including the restoration of the free trade unions. By a 9 to 2 vote this resolution was referred back to the Governing Body after a debate colored by the righteous bitterness of the Europeans who have suffered directly from German aggression. One reason for the opposition that developed was the inadvisability of attempting to decide questions related to the peace terms in the absence of Russia. But the emotions aroused during the discussion were related to the strong reaction of the European delegates, including labor representatives, against a proposal which seemed to draw a line between Hitler and the German people. We agree with Robert J. Watt, A. F. of L. representative who was one of the minority, that it is dangerous to treat the German as innately and uniquely brutal. And we support his plea for the rebuilding of the German trade unions. Whatever just punishment may be inflicted on Germany, the re-creation of democratic institutions is an essential first step toward its reclamation.

Mail-Order "Martyr"

THE campaign of the free enterprisers is taking on an increasingly evangelistic tinge. Its apostles dazzle us with glimpses of a future heaven which we shall all enjoy if and when the angels of business overcome the dark forces of collectivism, and scare us with lurid forecasts of the economic hell into which we will be plunged if we do not heed the gospel according to St. Ford. But for all the fervor of the preachers, their revival campaign has wilted from lack of drama, While they talk in terms of persecution and picture private enterprise skulking in the catacombs, they have been unable to exhibit any victims of the White House Nero. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church," and what the religion of private enterprise needs is a good millionaire martyr. In the person of Sewell Avery, chairman of Montgomery Ward, a volunteer for the role has now come forward, and a tremendous campaign is being put on by the press and the Congressional reactionaries to persuade the public that he is the genuine article.

The long history of Mr. Avery's defiance of the government was recapitulated in The Nation of April 29. A year ago, having exhausted every delaying device available, he reluctantly signed a contract with Local 20 of the Mail Order, Warehouse, and Retail Employees' Union (C. I. O.), in compliance with a direct order from the President. As soon as the contract expired, he started the fight all over again. The War Labor Board, whose authority he challenged, handled him gently, acceding to his demands for a new union election to determine whether the union still represented a majority of his employees, and merely ordering him to maintain the status quo until the balloting was completed.

Mr. Avery refused to comply. Clearly he was trailing his coat, intent on putting the Administration in a position where it had either to crack down on him or nullify its whole war labor policy. When he flatly refused to obey a White House order upholding the WLB's ruling, the President instructed Secretary of Commerce Jesse Jones to take over the Montgomery Ward Chicago plant. The would-be martyr challenged the legality of this ruling. When the government sent in a small body of troops to occupy the plant, he staged a sitdown strike, declaring he would order his employees to give no cooperation to the government's representatives.

At this point Attorney General Biddle ordered his bodily removal, and the storm broke. From one end of the country to the other the anti-Administration press relegated the war to a secondary place and proceeded to pillory the President as a dictator who had destroyed the Constitution and torn up the Bill of Rights. Mr. Biddle was assailed as a veritable Himmler, heading a savage Gestapo bent on extirpating every business man who would not kowtow to his infamous master. Never in the course of history has so much newsprint been wasted on so poor a cause. Fortunately the very excess of the indignation, so out of proportion to the actual event, reduced it to absurdity. The supposed victim of this outrage, it turned out, had not been shot without trial, beaten up, or thrown into a concentration camp. As the pictures showed, he had merely been carried out of the Ward building, comfortably relaxed in the arms of two soldiers, and deposited gently on the sidewalk. He then entered his big limousine and was driven to his home, where he has been having the time of his life trying on his cheaply gained halo. Is it not a little indecent to compare the "sufferings" of this phony martyr with the real torments experienced by the victims of the real Gestapo?

The question of whether or not the President has exceeded the very wide powers granted to him by Congress is now before the federal District Court in Chicago, and its decision will not be rendered until after we have gone to press. In the newspapers as a whole the issue has, of course, been prejudged. If the President's action is upheld, we are told, no corner grocery will be safe from seizure. This, of course, is nonsense. The scale on which Montgomery Ward operates—it did half a billion dollars' worth of business last year—and its key position as a distributor of farm supplies link it directly to the war economy. It has received large contracts from the government; it has been granted thousands of priorities on the plea of war necessity.

An even more important consideration, however, is the effect that successful defiance of the WLB by Montgomery Ward would have on the whole machinery instituted by the government to prevent war-time labor disputes. A precedent would be created that we can be sure other corporations would seize upon. Mr. Avery himself has proved his readiness to challenge the authority of the WLB in instances where war production is directly involved. The Hummer Manufacturing Company, a division of Ward's engaged in arms contracts, has refused to comply with a WLB order entered last August and a strike has now started. United States Gypsum, of which Avery is chairman, has defied the board since June, 1943, following exactly the same tactics as Ward's.

If corporations are to be allowed to contract out of the war economy—at least as far as their labor relations are concerned—then the affected unions must be released from their no-strike pledges. But as Chairman Davis of the WLB has pointed out, that would lead to a situation in which the "whole structure of war-time industrial relations would crumble." Either the WLB's authority must be respected consistently or it will become as helpless to prevent labor troubles as the Kellogg Pact was to prevent war

A Mess of Wolfram

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

Let us gladly admit that our government won a modest success in its recent deal with Franco. To try to rob it of its little triumph would be unchivalrous. If one's country is going to sell its birthright of democratic principle for a mess of pottage, one should at least rejoice that it got the pottage.

As a result of the agreement made with fascist Spain, Hitler will have less tungsten with which to harden steel for munitions. The rest of the deal is no more than seasoning. The German consulate in Tangier will be closed and certain "designated" Nazi agents will be kicked out. But since Tangier is full of undesignated Nazi agents and since Franco's own boys have proved quite as useful to Hitler as pure Nordic Nazis could be, and since Spain itself is one great beehive of espionage, with the German embassy and consular offices running wide open, the prospect of serious interference with Nazi activities is not great. As for the Blue Legion, its official career was ended long before the agreement to end it was signed. Whether Spanish fascists are still fighting on the eastern front is a matter of dispute. Neither this nor any other agreement could prevent "voluntary" enlistments in the German army. The ship deal, too, had been concluded some time ago except for a few details which were finally settled on Franco's terms.

What is important is a matter of some hundreds of tons of wolfram, from which tungsten is extracted. That is the heart of the agreement, the solid substance in the pot. But for this, the years spent in buttering up a hostile fascist regime would have yielded nothing but empty humiliation. We should make the most of those tons of potential alloy.

But even in this generous mood one must be realistic about the size of the victory, what it cost, and by what means it was actually won. The New York Times, in an editorial that should become a textbook example of complacent self-delusion, has described the achievement of Ambassador Hayes as a "great service to his country and the Allied cause," and the agreement as a "signal victory for Allied diplomacy." Let's consider these resounding claims.

The agreement itself was admittedly an unwelcome compromise. In announcing its terms the State Department explained that the American aim of depriving Germany of all wolfram shipments had been abandoned "on the urgent request of the British government." How much does Germany actually lose? The Times in another editorial said that Spain would now reduce deliveries of tungsten ore "to about 10 per cent of what the Germans would have obtained under their previous agreement." Perhaps this is so, but on the figures the Times quotes I cannot make it come out that way. Germany, according to the Times, has purchased 1,300 tons of Spanish wolfram for 1944 deliveries, but it can now "get 280 tons, at the most, for the rest of this year." But 280 is 21 per cent, not 10 per cent, of 1,300, and even that is not the real story. Germany imported 300 or more tons of wolfram from Spain in January, 1944; it is to get 20 tons a month to May and June; and thereafter it is to get 40 tons a month for the remainder of 1944. A bit of simple addition makes it clear that Germany's full quota for 1944 will be 580 tons, which is 45 per cent, rather than 10 per cent, of 1,300 tons. Perhaps the 300 tons shipped in January were not supposed to count because they were contracted for in 1943, but since they form a substantial part of Hitler's 1944 supply they ought to be allowed to break into the statistics somewhere. Just what the 10 per cent is supposed to represent I do not know; it may be the estimated proportion Hitler will receive of what he might have bought in 1944, rather than the actual proportion of what he had in fact contracted for. But such a comparison is so vague as to be misleading.

At the risk of sounding school-teacherish I should like to inject one additional comparison that seems to me more revealing than all the rest. Last year Hitler received 800 tons of wolfram from Spain out of a total of 1,100 ordered. This year, invasion permitting, Hitler will get 580 tons. So the actual drop in 1944, as the result of the new agreement, will be 220 tons, and the proportion of last year's wolfram which Hitler will receive in 1944 will be 72 per cent.

The next question is how this "signal victory" was won. The Times tells us that while the "balance" of the war undoubtedly had its effect, the chief credit must go to the policy of the American government. That policy, comprising a "combination of diplomatic and economic pressure, has finally induced the Spaniards to do practically everything the Allies desired." Here, again, I'm afraid a realistic observer must question the Times interpretation. The truth seems exactly the reverse. American policy accomplished exactly nothing as long as Hitler's chances of victory seemed fairly good. Only when it became evident that the Axis faced defeat, and when diplomatic and economic pressure began to be substituted for soft soap, did Franco show any willingness to bargain. Even then, as events have shown, he felt strong enough to force many of his own terms on the two great powers. His strength lay not in his actual position, which today is all but hopeless. It lay in the proved weakness of Allied diplomacy, its unwillingness to risk a showdown. To translate the final result into a brilliant diplomatic victory takes imagination if not political perspicacity.

As to the price of victory, it is beyond computing. We have paid for that ore in good American crude oil, some of which will probably find its way into Germany along with the reduced quotas of wolfram. But little as we can afford to squander oil on unfriendly fascist states, we can afford still less the other costs involved. By giving approval and diplomatic support to Franco we have in effect subsidized the whole international fascist conspiracy against which we were finally driven to wage war. The Spanish regime has carried Hitler's propaganda into every corner of Latin America. Clerical reaction, contempt for democracy, hatred of the United States—all these are spread wherever Franco's agents operate.

The job of American diplomacy in Spain was not to drive a bargain with a neutral; it was to disarm an enemy. Just before the agreement with Franco was announced, our colleague, J. Alvarez del Vayo, Foreign Minister in the last Republican government of Spain, gave a statement to the United Press. I want to quote here a part of his comment because it defines very sharply the price the Allies have paid for the policy that culminated in Mr. Hayes's diplomatic triumph. Said Mr. del Vayo:

To focus the whole diplomatic battle on the question of obtaining a reduction of Spanish wolfram shipments to Germany is to minimize the real problem of Spain's role in the war. . . . The problem is to render ineffective the help that the Franco regime can, and will, give to Hitler at the moment of the European invasion. Otherwise, as a result of the policy pursued with regard to

Franco, invasion day will find an enemy state at the back of the Allied army. Today Spain is the center of espionage, sabotage, and political agitation in Hitler's behalf, and the proposed agreement will not advance the Allied cause a single inch. The crux of the problem is therefore to oust Franco and his Falange from the government of Spain and to help the Spanish people regain their freedom. Until that is done, Spain will continue to be an accomplice in the German war against the Allies.

Digesting the State Department

BY RICHARD ALLAN

Washington, May 2

SportLIGHT on the State Department" by Kingsbury Smith, in the May Reader's Digest, is the Digest's latest and grandest attempt to court the lads of Mr. Hull's great gray palace on Pennsylvania Avenue. As late as last December relations between the Digest and the department were hit-or-miss. The Digest played up prominently a story by Senator Hugh Butler of Nebraska attacking the Good Neighbor policy in terms of dollars and cents. The department was pretty much miffed.

The Digest, a few days before deadline for its next issue, offered Nelson Rockefeller, Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, some space to answer Mr. Butler's charges. No, the department told Mr. Rockefeller, we would prefer that you keep quiet. The department felt, as it does in such cases, that to answer a criticism is to dignify the critic; and anyway, its own experts already had furnished Congressional leaders with speeches denying Butler's words—why share the fun with Mr. Rockefeller?

But all this inter-departmental dickering left the Reader's Digest in a rather unpleasant state of nerves. The magazine had angered the State Department at a time when State Department friendship could be very useful the Digest was pushing half a dozen foreign-language editions into new markets all over the globe. It is surprising how often a publisher engaged on a venture of this sort must come to the State Department: there are matters of priorities, airplane space, newsprint recommendations; arrangements for setting up printing establishments in various foreign countries. So two or three pleasant young men from Pleasantville began appearing in State Department corridors more and more frequently. "We have heard that you do not like all our articles," said the pleasant young men, in effect. "We should like to keep the articles for our future foreign-language editions in line with your own ideas."

I. F. Stone, our Washington editor, has been absent from these columns for two weeks. He has been preparing a detailed study of Governor Thomas E. Dewey, which will appear shortly in The Nation.

This bait was too attractive for even the austere State Department to resist. Currently it is pushing its own culture-and-propaganda program abroad on a dozen fronts, with money newly granted by Congress. Here was a chance to swing the mighty Reader's Digest into line as an ally. So suggestions were forthcoming. "Such-and-such an article would make the Arabs unhappy," the department would counsel the young men from Pleasant-ville. "And here, this article criticizing the home front, it wouldn't really be of much interest abroad, would it?"

The Digest editors were willing, and the department was cooperative. And just to certify the harmony process, the Digest now has played its show-piece—Kingsbury Smith's back-patting article in the May issue. But, amusingly, the article which was meant to please may annoy. There are signs that certain passages already have turned State Department countenances a mild pink.

In general, Mr. Smith's piece is as fine and standard a full-length portrait as the department could have ordered. It presents the following usual statements in the usual way: that our policies with regard to the Ethiopian war and the Spanish civil war, although possibly wrong, were what the American public wanted; that the State Department was no more fooled and no more scared at the time of Munich than were the American people; that the State Department knew as early as 1933 that war was coming, and shared the secret with the American public; that some of Hull's advisers made things difficult for their boss by assuming that Japan was only bluffing; that our months of holding hands with Vichy represent "one of the most successful achievements of American diplomacy" in the war; that we were correct in opposing De Gaulle; that the United States army has asked the State Department not to get tough with Franco; that the results of our Latin American policy have been "highly satisfactory."

But there were two departures from the usual type of article apologizing for the State Department. First—whether for convenience or from oversight—Mr. Smith omits mention of Italy, the Italian king, and Badoglio. Second, in his climactic paragraph Mr. Smith simultaneously pats Secretary Hull on the back so vigorously and shakes so stern a finger at Stalin that one cannot suppress an anticipatory chuckle. Especially at present there is nothing high department officials would dislike to do more than further to annoy or jar Russia. Imagine their feelings, then, when they find their ace defender blandly informing his readers that Mr. Hull went to Moscow and won over Stalin from "world revolution against capitalism" to "cooperation."

Mr. Smith's exuberance, of course, will well serve the cautiously anti-Soviet sentiments of the Digest. But as for the department, which Mr. Smith also meant to serve, the remark—especially if the Russian embassy takes out its shears and does a little clipping—may well prove to be what diplomatic folk call contra producente, or, in common language, a boomerang.

The little mental acrobatics common to all apologists are a frequent practice with Mr. Smith. When he arrives at a discussion of Latin America, he pretends that the much-refuted Senator Butler is the chief critic of this nation's policy in that area. Mr. Butler, as was suggested above, had his words about "too much spending" thrown back at him by the department and by leaders in both major parties months ago. But by setting up this straw man and knocking him down just one more time, Mr. Smith manages to omit mention of the really basic criticism of our Latin American policy—that it has supported dictatorships instead of our real good neighbors, the Latin American peoples.

Like so many apologists, awed by the immensity of their task, Mr. Smith, when he is not sure of the effect of a first argument, hopefully tosses in a second, thereby damning both. Thus after spending most of a Digest page on a high moral level, defending the principle behind our early coldness toward De Gaulle, he winds up, rather lamely, by saying, anyway we weren't the only ones, the British used to feel the same way. This, of course, is the "misery-loves-company" technique, substituted at the last lap for the "we-pursue-a-virtuous-stituted at the last lap for the "we-pursue-a-virtuouscourse" approach.

Except for the few departures sketched above, Smith's article is just such an "ignominiously feeble essay in apologetics" as the earlier piece by George Creel in Collier's which I. F. Stone discussed in The Nation for April 1. However, the appearance of two such articles within a short period gives rise to a gleam of hope. The very fact that the State Department feels called upon to defend itself before mass audiences indicates that dissatisfaction with its record is not confined to a handful of radicals. Taken in conjunction with Mr. Hull's latest speeches, these journalistic counter-attacks are evidence that the critics have not only got under the department's skin but have begun to penetrate its skull.

Mexico Left and Right

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

[Mr. del Vayo has just returned from a month's visit in Mexico, where he talked with President Camacho, General Cárdenas, and other high officials, and with labor leaders, educators, and journalists. This article is the first of a series which he is writing on Mexican problems—political, social, and economic. He will also, in later issues, tell of his conversations with prominent Spanish Republican exiles whom he met in Mexico.]

O UNDERSTAND the current situation in Mexico, we must look back to the period when General Lázaro Cárdenas held the reins of government. His presidency marked the climax of the Mexican Revolution. On the whole the revolution has always been in strong hands, as is proved by the fact that from 1917, when the constitutional regime was established, to today, that is, for twenty-seven years, Mexico has had only nine presidents, an extremely small number for any Hispanic American country. But in each administration one could trace, as with a barograph, the rise and fall of the popularity of the government. The first half of the period always shows a sharp rise; the second half a no less obvious decline. The only presidential term that shows no drop is that of Cárdenas, who left office stronger and more popular than on the day he was elected.

That could happen only as the result of an extraordinary record of accomplishment. Few Americans fully realized what was taking place in Mexico between 1934 and 1940. Their vision was obscured not only by the propaganda of the large oil companies, which did their best to distort the facts, but by the reports of observers. even of some on the left, who were incapable of viewing events in their historical perspective. It was the same sort of thing that happened in Spain. More than one well-meaning liberal went to Spain to witness the civil war and left without having grasped its real import. They were more concerned with the behavior of certain political groups or with isolated mistakes of the government than with the tremendous implications of that great struggle. So it was with Mexico. The Cárdenas presidency was not always appreciated abroad in all its grandeur and significance.

Within Mexico that was not the case. Mexico knew at the time and knows today what the presidency of Lázaro Cárdenas meant in the evolution of the country. The people saw land distributed among the peasants with a determination and energy never known before. They saw how General Calles's plans for building new roads and new systems of irrigation were carried out more vigorously than ever; how the oil companies were expropriated without regard to gloomy predictions that the country would be unable to resist economic reprisal from abroad. Mexico had seen the President traveling to the remotest corners of the country, visiting the most humble villages, instilling in the whole population a new revolutionary fervor. And Mexico had seen him fighting in the international field for the same principles that inspired his national policy. General Cárdenas from the very first day sided with Republican Spain. He was against the Munich pact, in favor of a policy that would halt the aggressors; and he made Mexico a warm shelter for the victims of fascism.

It was to be expected that so vigorous an administration would make enemies. Other Presidents had aroused the opposition of conservative native elements, or of foreign business men in Mexico, or of foreign imperialists. Cárdenas aroused the opposition of all three groups. All of them were eager to have his work destroyed.

CHOOSING A SUCCESSOR TO CARDENAS

The problem of the presidential succession therefore presented greater difficulties than at any other time in the modern history of Mexico, difficulties so great that some people thought the only solution was to forget the classic rule of "no reelection" and to put Cárdenas in office again. When I saw him in 1939, I made a discreet allusion to this proposal. His reply confirmed my impression that he was determined not to allow any departure from the constitutional tradition. The problem of choosing a successor who would follow the basic course mapped by Cárdenas without taking such an extreme position as to give the reaction a pretext for armed rebellion was approached realistically. In a speech delivered at that time before a workers' convention Lombardo Toledano declared that the question was not that of advancing the revolution; the choice was "to secure the work of Cárdenas, or to abandon it."

The man called upon to secure it was General Avila Camacho. He enjoyed solid prestige in the army. He was known as a loyal friend of Cárdenas, as well disposed toward the peasants and workers, and, particularly, as a man of equanimity and judgment, with an unusual capacity to reconcile antagonistic points of view.

The reaction went all out to defeat him. Great sums of money were spent in one of the most violent presidential campaigns the country had known. The opposition succeeded in uniting in a single front the big landowners, the oil companies, the extreme Catholic groups. Thousands of churchwomen joined in a movement that had all the characteristics of an incipient putsch. But Avila Camacho was elected.

His first political problem was to restore tranquillity and to prevent the forces which had been defeated in the election from attempting to gain power through an armed rebellion. He formed his government, therefore, of men from the various groups which had been active in Mexican politics during the past thirty years. Certainly it was not a homogeneous revolutionary Cabinet. It was a Cabinet of national coalition-always a dangerous enterprise. On one hand, Camacho risked alienating those elements of the left for whom such a Cabinet, with no external crisis to justify it, seemed a retreat from the revolution. On the other hand, the right was encouraged, and tried to win the President to its side. The reactionary press took great satisfaction in presenting Mexico under Cárdenas as having been on the verge of ruin and Mexico under Avila Camacho as rising rapidly into prosperity. The sudden boom resulting from the war favored that interpretation. Every political act of the new President was praised as a healthy revision of the work of Cárdenas.

REACTION IN THE SCHOOLS

The reaction became aggressive in all directions. It tried to replace Cárdenas men everywhere with people known for their conservative tendencies. It tried to stop the distribution of land and to create an atmosphere hostile to the labor organizations. It carried on a refined sort of sabotage of everything that had been accomplished. But the place where this reactionary attempt to take over power from inside became most visible was in the Department of Education.

It was natural that this battle should have been staged there rather than in any other department. From the beginning, education had played a major role in the revolution. The advances on this front made in the previous twenty-three years had been a source of constant pride to every Mexican progressive. No one denied that mistakes had been made and that there was still much to be corrected and improved; that higher education had been neglected, and that the universities were not the kind Mexico needed. But the creation of thousands of rural schools throughout the country and the development of their social functions had established an example for the rest of Hispanic America and for the world.

Suddenly all this tremendous effort of two decades was threatened. Octavio Béjar Vázquez, the Minister of Education chosen by Avila Camacho in his desire to have all political elements represented in the government, showed himself an easy tool in the hands of the reactionaries. He took as one of his closest advisers José Vasconcelos, who was once a very good Minister of Education but who had shifted so far to the right that he had even become editor of the magazine Timón, financed by the German legation and finally suppressed by the Mexican government.

Teachers of progressive ideas were replaced by reactionaries. The clergy, especially the Jesuits, began to feel their power. Coeducation, which was an accepted fact in Mexico, was called an invention of the devil and suppressed. The textbooks were altered to minimize the work of the previous governments. The schools began to be looked upon not as a place where the people were being educated in the principles of the revolution, but as a place where they learned to hate it. Leagues of parents become very busy. The same women who, during the elections of 1940, came out of the churches, after service, with the cross in their hands to demonstrate in the streets against the anti-Christ Cárdenas, now prepared to win their battle through the Ministry of Education.

If the right took all these developments as a promise of victory, for the left they reinforced the fears created by the formation of the coalition Cabinet. It was at this moment that in the magazine Cuardernos Americanos, the best publication of its kind in Latin America, appeared a remarkable essay, called The Mexican Revolution in Crisis, which was to have a profound influence on much that has been written since. Its author, Jesús Silva Herzog, editor of Cuardernos Americanos, is one of the most constructive minds in the Mexican left. Former Minister to Russia, he is now fighting courageously in the Department of Finance against the inflation that threatens to overwhelm the country. In his study of the political crisis, Silva Herzog deals not only with immediate issues but with the whole problem of the revolution. He does not try to hide the difficulties which constructive efforts in Mexico have faced. Not the smallest of these difficulties was the necessity for tremendous speed. The determining cause of the revolution was the hunger for land, and when the revolution succeeded, the peasants had to be satisfied immediately. There was little time to elaborate a program. The technical aspects of the problem often had to be subordinated to the political requirements of the hour. Of course many mistakes were committed, but, as Silva Herzog put it, to wait would have been a still greater mistake.

That initial lack of organized planning has always been a drag on the revolution. Many early hopes have been shattered. The standard of life of the skilled industrial worker has risen, generally speaking, and the situation of the peasants has been greatly improved in many regions. But there is still a large section of the Mexican people which has not benefited by the reforms. These difficulties have been aggravated by the evil of corruption, with which Silva Herzog deals very frankly in his study. "The problem of Mexico," he wrote, "is before everything a problem of honesty."

It is not surprising that under such circumstances the left does not always know how to maintain a firm platform, while the right is able to take advantage of any failure in the social or economic field to discredit or attack the revolution. But the reaction made a serious error in underestimating the character of General Camacho and in assuming that the discouragement felt by section of the revolutionary forces was an indication of complete capitulation. The chief maneuver of the opposition, to create a rift between Avila Camacho and Cárdenas, failed. The President remained firm; General Cárdenas, too. They blocked every attempt to play one against the other. The active elements of the left, the workers, and the peasant organizations rallied around the President. At one of the most serious moments of the crisis Lombardo Toledano declared that it was necessary to support the President without renouncing the right to criticize some of his ministers.

THE REVOLUTION SUSTAINED

At or about the same time a very interesting thing happened which proved how deeply intrenched the Mexican Revolution is, despite its weaknesses. Among the men who fought with the early revolutionary leaders-Carranza, Obregón, and Calles-against the old social order of Porfirio Díaz are some who have become extremely wealthy and now head great businesses. They are no longer part of the revolutionary process, and many believed that they no longer had any interest in it. But in a showdown even these men cannot resign themselves to a denial of the work of their youth. They have not gone forward with the revolution but neither can they go all the way back. They are not made of the stuff of genuine revolutionary leaders, but neither are they Pierre Lavals. In the crisis over the schools several of the wealthy ex-revolutionaries went to see Avila Camacho to tell him of their worries and fears. Their action was a great help to the President, who felt that he now had the support not only of the left but of what one may call the high Mexican bourgeoisie.

All these elements together-the Cárdenists, the workers' organizations, even the moderate conservativesproved themselves stronger than the reaction. Popular opinion made itself felt. The President dismissed Béjar Vázquez as Secretary of Education and appointed in his place Jaime Torres Bodet, a liberal of clear vision and determination, who in a short time has been able to reverse the whole policy of the department. He told me of the work done in the last three months by the special committee appointed by himself to revise the school system, correcting not only the methods introduced by the reactionaries but pushing forward education as a whole. He showed me the new magazine that has been founded in order to keep rural teachers informed of improved pedagogical methods in the most progressive countries. He showed me the instructions that had been issued to reestablish coeducation and to put an end to clerical control. He had in his office plans for the creation of new schools from 1944 to 1946, for which he had succeeded in obtaining additional appropriations.

CAMACHO'S FOREIGN POLICY

The outbreak of the war gave Avila Camacho an opportunity to prove that in the domain of foreign policy he was resolved to follow the policy of Cárdenas. On the very day Pearl Harbor was attacked, without consulting any foreign government, he broke with the Axis. Immediately he appointed General Cárdenas to command the Pacific zone and later named him Minister of Defense. He declared war on the Axis when the first Mexican ship was sunk. He reestablished diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. He was one of the first to recognize the French Committee of National Liberation. His energetic Minister of the Interior, Miguel Aleman, promptly laid his hand upon the enemy fifth column, which had been actively associated with the reactionary forces. In an extended interview Aleman described the measures he had taken even before Pearl Harbor to stop the activities of the three Axis legations, particularly the German and the Japanese.

"We also had the problem of the Japanese fisheries in the Pacific," he explained to me. "But there, as in the case of the Germans, we knew who the people were who should be arrested at a given moment. We have registered all foreigners living in the country, and I think our list is very complete. It has enabled us to prevent what has happened in many other countries—the replacement by the Axis of each agent who has been caught."

"The proof of the efficiency of our war-time measures," he continued, "lies in the fact that not a single act of sabotage has been committed in Mexico, and that everything has been accomplished without affecting the individual rights of the citizens. If you ask anyone in Mexico to describe the 'state of emergency,' he will not know what to say. There is no censorship of the press, direct or indirect, no censorship of the radio, nor has the right of free assembly been limited. Foreign groups engaged in anti-fascist activities can carry on their battle here with the same freedom as before."

FASCIST CONSPIRACY

Taken as a whole, the work of the present administration cannot be interpreted as a fundamental departure from the policy of Cárdenas. In the matter of agrarian reform Camacho has continued the policy of his predecessor, and land is still being distributed according to established plans. The irrigation system is being extended, and many projects initiated under Cárdenas are now being completed. As far as the workers are concerned, there has not been a single official decision against the legitimate interests of the unions.

To pretend, however, that the reactionary forces have given up their fight would be infantile. Even if the war has postponed the problem of the presidential succession, the 1946 election is very much on the minds of the opposition. The reactionary groups—Sinarquistas, Unión Nacional, clericals—are joining forces and preparing for the assault. The Sinarquist danger, above all, should not be underestimated. The self-assurance with which certain government officials sometimes dismiss the movement reminds me painfully of the confident smiles with which Republican authorities in Spain, from March, 1936, until the day of the Franco uprising, listened to our warnings of the conspiracy of the right. In spite of its irresponsible and somewhat grotesque character, the Sinarquist movement is spreading throughout the country. It is winning to its side large numbers of illiterate or fanatical people in the interior of Mexico—in the rural districts more than in the cities.

But Mexico is not the only country threatened by reaction. All through Latin America the fascist forces are hatching a vast conspiracy, with the support of the Axis powers and of Franco and his Phalanx, to end democracy forever. For two years I have been insisting on this, and many articles have been published in The Nation by representative Latin American leaders who have not echoed the optimistic tone of official reports and speeches. The situation in Latin America is grave; no country, not even Mexico, is free from danger.

Law in the Strategy of Peace

BY P. E. CORBETT

PROMINENT among the clichés used in speeches and documents touching the objects of this war is "enduring peace and justice under law." Like other clichés, this has in it a core of truth obscured by over-familiarity. The association of law, peace, and justice expresses a wealth of human experience. For all the bitter ridicule heaped by the impatient on lawyers and their trade, none but the anarchist can imagine either security or welfare save in a community organized and ruled by law. To most of us "the law" means a vaguely sensed presence of rules, procedures, and institutions by which order is maintained and men given more or less their due. Yet we all expect two main characteristics in the legal system—fair but firm authority and adaptability to changing social needs.

At times like the present it becomes painfully obvious that no common legal system is operating with fair and firm authority on the conduct of nations. Yet the belligerents on both sides, and the neutrals in between, go on appealing to international law as something which exists and which is consistently observed by themselves and violated by their opponents. Confused by a wordy and futile debate, the common man asks in irony or anger what kind of law it is that fails so utterly to prevent war. There is ground for the complaint; but the people who make it for the most part ignore their own share of the blame.

Men have scarcely begun to learn the essential conditions and elements of a law that could render in the international domain services commensurate with those expected of law within the nation. Since the process of learning will have to be accompanied or followed by drastic changes in popular as well as official attitudes, we probably have a long way to go.

It is as a fresh beginning in the necessary educational process that the "Postulates, Principles, and Proposals" for the International Law of the Future * recently put out by a number of Americans and Canadians should be regarded. I cannot tell how many of the signatories would agree with me in this view, but the trend of recent events and decisions seems to leave little prospect that the text will be adopted and brought into effect in any near future. It nevertheless remains a carefully documented statement of the indispensable elements of an effective legal order, which the world can have if and as men become willing to accept its implications.

What are these essential elements? The text does well to begin by postulating the reality of a community of states, presenting international law as the law of this community, and asserting the need of effective organization. The necessary basis for an effective legal system is a sense of community among the persons to whom it applies, and the strength of the law depends on the measure in which this sense is materialized in community institutions. But as I understand it, the text here has a further meaning which is equally fundamental.

One deep-seated weakness of the present system has been the doctrine, still prevalent among governments, that international law is merely a self-denying ordinance, resting solely on the consent of states and possessed of no external authority. This is part of the theory of sovereignty, which denies the existence of any political or legal superior over the state. It makes of international law a subjective thing, with each state the interpreter and judge of its own obligations. The vague concept of a family or community of nations has not hitherto endowed that grouping with authority over its members.

International law, to be truly effective, must have objective authority. It must be made supranational. This can only be done by recognizing it as the law of a community to which the state, as a member, is subordinate. "The sovereignty of a state," says our text, "is subject to the limitations of international law." In the doctrine of the foreign offices, this is only a collective self-limitation, a sort of multiple New Year's resolution. The text would make it a community limitation, and would give reality to it by organized power.

The second essential is to make the use of force against states a monopoly of the community. Neither order nor justice can prevail in a community where any member may at will take the law into his own hands. Some jurists have held to the vague theory that a state could not legally resort to war except for just cause; but this, if it ever was accepted as a legal rule, ceased to be so regarded and in any event produced no visible effect. The Briand-Kellogg Pact of 1928 was an attempt to establish such a rule; but the interpretation that permitted self-defense and left each state judge of what constituted self-defense, together with the lack of any provisions for enforcement, made this treaty another scrap of paper.

Most systems of law permit self-defense; but anyone who would justify violence on this ground has to prove his case. The international law of the future must forbid states to use force save to repel attack, and must reserve to the community the power to inquire in any given case whether this justification really existed and, if it did not, to exact redress for the injured party.

Scrutiny of self-defense implies that the community has organs of a judicial character with obligatory jurisdiction. This kind of limitation on the use of force cannot operate if states remain free to refuse appearance before a tribunal. The exaction of redress implies power to enforce the tribunal's judgment. These, however, are far from being the only reasons why an effective community of states will need judicial and executive organs. Law cannot be applied without authoritative interpretation in specific cases, and it cannot of itself exact obedience. Disputes must be settled by impartial authority or there will be no peace.

Many states have entered into treaties of obligatory arbitration. But the obligation is limited to what are called "legal disputes," and this limitation has left states free to withhold from settlement disputes of a "political" or "non-justiciable" character. The distinction being a difficult one to draw, the practical result has been a marked tendency to thrust into the "non-justiciable" category any dispute involving a matter of first-rate importance. States have in fact done this with claims concerning territory, debts, and injuries suffered by citizens abroad, the plea being that some higher political interest was involved, such as national dignity, autonomy, or existence, which made judicial settlement inappropriate. Thus disputes of a type likely to lead to war—in other words, precisely those that most urgently need to be arbitrated—are peculiarly likely to escape arbitration.

This wide loophole in the international judicial structure needs to be closed by creating for the community of states organs with unqualified authority to settle any dispute which the parties fail to settle peacefully by themselves. It may well be that some disputes will call for a process of adjustment rather than adjudication, and that these should be handled by a political rather than a judicial organ. But no dispute likely to disturb the peace should be allowed to escape community agencies of one sort or another. The famous Geneva Protocol of 1924 was an attempt to secure just this complete coverage; but the nations were not ready for it, and it failed of ratification.

Once they have submitted to adjudication, the record of states in carrying out judgments has been remarkably good. This virtue may have been partly due to the fact that they have been free to refuse adjudication when they thought the stakes too high to risk an adverse decision. If this escape is closed, effective pressure may sometimes be required to bring a state into court and to compel compliance with the decision reached. As within the state, power behind the law, ready for use at need, will itself reduce the occasions when it must be used.

In all communities disputes occur which cannot be disposed of by the application of existing law. Reference has already been made to cases that call for adjustment rather than adjudication. What is needed may be merely a special exception to the existing law, or it may be a permanent amendment of general effect. Unless provision were made for such contingencies, the law would be frozen into a rigidity that would impose insufferable hardships and stop social progress. That way lies violent revolution. To avoid this in the national community we maintain bodies with legislative power; and these will also be needed in the world community. Nor can such bodies wait for unanimity. All the agencies of an effective community of states will have to act by majority. Otherwise action can be vetoed by any state with an interest in the status quo.

All these essentials—clear recognition of a supranational community exercising authority through law over states, prohibition of the use of force by states in their external relations, compulsory jurisdiction and organized sanctions to enforce obedience to supranational authority, and, finally, a legislative body competent to make particular adjustments and general amendments—are embodied in the American-Canadian text. I would add another, namely, recognition of the individual human being as a direct subject of rights and duties under supranational law. In a great many cases the only real sufferer from a breach of that law is one man or woman. A trader is injured by a foreign state's confiscation of his goods, an engineer is killed because a government fails to take ordinary precautions for the protection of foreigners, and his widow is left without support. Hitherto the victim has had to seek redress through his state, because in the traditional theory only states have any standing in international law. This has meant fantastic delays and a paralyzing complication of procedure. The effects have been regrettable enough in the past: in the future, as the demand grows for universally recognized rights of the human being as such, they will be worse.

Why is a legal system possessing these elements not likely to be incorporated in the post-war settlements? Some say, because our governments are empty of vision. It may be that we could go a long way toward the world-wide rule of law under leaders ready to venture farther from tradition. But the deepest reason is not there. If our statesmen show little sign of subordinating their countries to the kind of world government implied in this text, that is because nothing has convinced them, not even the accumulation of opinion polls, that this war has brought any profound change in the secular attachments of the mass of men.

The traditional law of nations has been useful in the past, and it may be increasingly useful in the future. Most states will be governed by it in their economic and political relations up to the point—which they will decide for themselves—where other means are required to safeguard what they consider vital interests. It will serve as one of several techniques in solving conflicts. Moreover, the promised post-war development of voluntary international institutions may constitute a gradual approach to world government. But a great deal more than political inventiveness will be needed on the way. Any permanent advance will depend on a reorientation of human loyalties.

The system of law proposed in our text calls, as it must, for the reduction of nation-states to the position of locally autonomous units in a ruling universal association. It presupposes the domination of patriotism by a triumphant conviction of world community. It assumes that men can be induced to trust treasured values to a new and strange political organization. In the end there may prove to be no other way of preserving those values. But not much evidence yet exists that the necessary psychological revolution has been accomplished. On the contrary, we are again confronted with one of the paradoxes of war: while it creates a demand for effective world law and organization, it fortifies the emotional barriers to their establishment. Yet the path of patient progress is not closed, and this text renders the service of sharply defining the goal.

Behind the Greek "Mutiny"

BY BASIL VLAVIANOS

THE news of "mutiny" in the Greek army and navy in the Near East was not surprising to persons acquainted with the background of the outbreak. When force is used against a people which has sacrificed everything for freedom and independence, a strong reaction is inevitable.

As late as last August the Greek people were united as never before in their history. At that time they were represented in Cairo by six prominent members of the Greek underground—one of the best-organized movements in Europe—and by George Exintaris, the accredited representative of all political parties except the Communists. The delegation had gone to Egypt to stress the necessity for national unity, which alone, the members believed, could insure the "success of the national struggle and the normal development of the country."

These men, behind whom stood almost the entire Greek nation, demanded a statement from the King that he would not "return to Greece before the people have decided on the form of government." The National Liberation Front (E. A. M.), the most powerful underground group represented in the delegation, also demanded the formation of a coalition government in which all political parties and organizations would participate.

Allied diplomats had to choose between two courses: they could carry out the spirit of the Atlantic Charter, which they had created and extolled, or they could oppose the will and ignore the rights of the Greek people, rights for which the Greeks had shed their blood. Choosing the second, they advised the King to ignore the unanimous demand of his people. The representatives of the underground were placed under house arrest by the British authorities, kept strictly incomunicado, and later sent back to Greece under the most humiliating circumstances. Censorship in Egypt became increasingly ruthless, and the British government joined with the Greek royalist clique in a campaign to defame the guerrillas and justify their own antagonism toward them.

Minor differences between some guerrilla groups were deliberately exaggerated and were presented in the international press as bitter civil strife, in which the guerrillas were apparently squandering their strength to the neglect of the fight against the enemy. The E. A. M. was systematically smeared as "Communist" and, strange contradiction, as a collaborator with the enemy. Instead of supplying the E. A. M. with arms to the same extent as before, the British government began to favor the much weaker National Democratic Army (E. D. E. S.), thus laying the basis for real civil war in Greece. The E. D. E. S. would never have dared to attack the E. A. M. had it not been encouraged by unmistakable signs of the royalist and British policy.

Despite all this intrigue against them, the Greek guerrillas continued their gallant fight against the enemy. Last October Lieutenant Colonel Edmunds, chief of the Allied military mission in Greece proper, sent this message to the general staff of the army of the E. A. M., after a great victory in central Greece: "I have the honor to congratulate you and all guerrillas who participated yesterday in the battle against the German forces near Makrakome. I also wish you the same success in all future engagements with the enemy." But neither the message nor the news of this important battle, in which artillery and armored cars were employed by the Nazis, was published in this country.

On December 17, 1943, Prime Minister Tsouderos, in an interview granted to a Reuters correspondent, denounced the Greek guerrillas for wanton crimes committed for no other reason than their leaders' greed for personal power. The same accusations were subsequently repeated in an appeal to the leaders of the guerrillas to return to their "peaceful occupations." Their peaceful occupations! Even Secretary Hull was induced by the British and the Tsouderos government to take part in the campaign against the resistance groups. On January 1, 1944, he declared that the guerrilla armies were, in fact, "dissipating their strength in internal quarrels." The State Department, however, must have known of the Greek victories and of the censorship which prevented the news from reaching this country.

These consistent slurs upon the efforts of the Greek people naturally caused anxiety in the regular armed forces and the Greeks in Egypt. On December 30, 1943, the Hellenic League of Liberation, an organization representing the E. A. M. in Cairo, appealed once more to Mr. Tsouderos and the members of the Greek Cabinet to cease their hostility to the guerrillas and to form a coalition government in which the Greek underground would be represented. "Greek public opinion," it declared, "being informed about the magnificent struggle of the Greek people in general and of the guerrillas in particular, is well aware of the great national unity achieved in this struggle, and it firmly believes that the fighting Greek people possess the necessary political maturity not to fall victims to elements motivated by personal ambition. Public opinion, however, is afraid that the causes of the present discord between certain guerrilla groups are not the personal rivalries of the leaders but the intrigues of reactionary totalitarian groups, scheming incessantly, now as in the past, against the democratic aspirations of the Greek people."

This warning and many others from Greece and from Greek liberals all over the world were as voices in the wilderness. The Greek government in exile, with the support of the British Foreign Office, was resourceful in finding pretexts for not complying with the demands of the Greek underground and in obscuring the whole issue. Confronted with this situation, the E. A. M. decided to name a committee within Greece to recommend the formation of a national coalition government. The committee was immediately attacked as communistic, although, of its five members, only one, Mr. G. Siantos, is a Communist. Its president, Colonel E. Bakirdiis, is "as far to the left as Lloyd George in his Limehouse days," to use the expression of the London New Statesman and Nation. Two other members, the hero of Crete, General Manolis Mantakas, and a former deputy in the Greek Parliament, Mr. E. Tsirimokos, are right-wing liberals. The fifth member, Mr. K. Gavrielides, is a leftist Agrarian.

But the political convictions of the members of the committee are irrelevant, since they did not form a government, as they could have done, but simply addressed themselves to the gentlemen in Cairo, urging the creation of a coalition government. Every Greek patriot—civilian or soldier—supported the request, realizing that it was the last chance to attain true national unity. For if the request were turned down, an opposition government like Marshal Tito's might indeed be formed on Greek soil, and disunity would then assume really dangerous proportions.

The crisis grew. Many individuals and organizations besought the royal government to comply with the demands of the underground. Tsouderos made promises and then broke them. The British authorities increased their persecution of democratic officers and soldiers. More than four thousand had already been sent to concentration camps, and many more were arrested daily. The impression became prevalent in the army that the Allies intended to get rid of it in toto because of its unwillingness to support the King. George II continued his intrigues in London, disregarding the appeals of his people to form a government of national unity, to free political prisoners, and to cease his dictatorial practices. The army's determination to end his machinations took more and more concrete form.

A committee of high officers demanded that Tsouderos form a national government or resign. He arrested them. Hundreds of other persons, not only army men but wealthy civilians, were arrested for expressing a favorable opinion of the E. A. M.'s request. People disappeared without a warrant having been issued, without any specific charge having been brought against them, and without notification to their families. The Greek military headquarters in Cairo were occupied by force. The offices of the Greek government were placed under British supervision. The editor of the newspaper Hellim and the directors of the Hellenic League of Liberation and of the Seamen's Association of Alexandria were arrested.

This was the atmosphere in which the "mutiny" occurred. It was carried out by men who had fought against Mussolini and Hitler, who had gallantly covered the evacuation of the British army from Greece, and who had come to Egypt in order to continue their fight for freedom. They formed more than 60 per cent of the Greek army and almost the entire navy; Admiral Alexandris himself was at their head. Several of them were killed; a great many are now in prison or a concentration camp awaiting the judgment of Mr. Churchill.

No one approves of armed revolt in time of war. But to say that this one was provoked by "enemy agents" or by Communists is as lacking in decency as the appeals for unity that have been uttered by those most responsible for destroying it. It is as nonsensical as the pretension of the British government and the Greek government in exile that they can teach patriotism to the Greek people.

A new Greek government has now been formed in Cairo. The new Prime Minister, George Papandreou, is known as an able and liberal statesman. He came recently from Greece and is undoubtedly well acquainted with the people's wishes. He has promised to comply with their will and to restore unity and discipline. Others before him have made promises. They were unable to keep them because foreign interference in Greek politics was too strong.

Greek unity today is more in the hands of British and American liberals than in those of any Greek government in exile. Powerful voices have already been raised in the British press and in Parliament against the official attitude. Other voices have waited over-long to demand the repeal of all illiberal measures in Egypt and Greece and respect for the will of the Greek people. Voices lifted in the causes of Greek democracy are lifted for the democratic future of the world.

The British government's policy toward Greece runs counter to British public opinion. It is inspired by fear of communism and of Russian influence in the Balkans, but it is destined to have the opposite effect from what its sponsors intend. It will lose them friends throughout Eastern Europe and will paralyze the Greek armed forces and the Greek underground resistance at a time when their cooperation can be extremely useful to the war effort and to the restoration of a true democratic order in the Balkans

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ALTHOUGH the railroads of the Reich have become pitifully run down, they were adequate to the demands of a one-front war. But now that the "two-front war" is drawing near, something like a transportation panic has arisen. The most striking sign of this is a recent revolutionary decree about potatoes.

On April 7 the authoritative agricultural organ of the Nazi Party declared: "The German transportation system can no longer be asked to carry millions of tons of potatoes every autumn to distant regions where potatoes are not grown." And to relieve the railroads of this strain the government has taken extreme measures. German potatoes come in large part from the northeastern provinces, where the poor "light" soil is good for little else. The rich "heavy" soil of the rest of the country is used for growing grain and vegetables. Now in the middle of a war all that is to be changed! The agricultural authorities have decreed that this season, to save transportation, each province shall raise approximately as many potatoes as it needs. Thus good soil will be wasted on a crop for which poor soil suffices, and the cultivation of more valuable crops, which require rich earth, will be correspondingly curtailed. Admittedly the change will affect the quantity as well as the quality of the total harvest. But this worsening of the food situation will be part of the price paid for ameliorating the transportation crisis. Even the layman can see how bad the latter must be.

Many other facts confirm such a conclusion. Although coal, for example, is terribly scarce and strictly rationed throughout the Reich, in the coal-producing region of Lower Silesia all coal rationing was lifted at the end of March. Local papers explained this development with the laconic statement that freight cars to move the coal were not available: "If rationing were continued, the accumulation of briquets on the storage dumps would encumber the pitheads."

In the second and third weeks of April 50,000 German railroad workers were sent to France to help operate the French railroads. In fact, the German army has taken full and direct control of the French roads. Some details about German plans for their use at the time of the invasion are reported in the Gazette de Lausanne for April 25. "If the Allies make a landing in France," the paper says, "a prearranged plan by which ordinary traffic will be reduced to 20 per cent of normal will be immediately put into effect. All passenger train service will be suspended, and freight trains will be reserved exclusively for transporting the authorized food supply." It goes on to picture the anxiety of the people of Paris, who are well aware of the Germans' intentions and fear that they will starve during the struggle for their liberation. For the majority of Parisians subsist not on the "authorized food supply" but on the so-called "family package service," which they expect to be discontinued. According to this account, an important official in the Ministry of Food recently said that the people of Paris would soon starve if they could not supplement their daily diet with "family packages."

More than a million Parisians are now living off these packages, which are sent in every day by railway express from the most productive agricultural areas. Within the city a fast delivery service making use of 2,000 handcarts has been organized. Since the occupying forces are constantly increasing their requisitions, it is becoming more and more difficult for the people to obtain even the food for which they have coupons. The situation is particularly desperate for persons earning less than 2,000 francs a month, who cannot afford to buy in the black market. Without the package system these people could hardly exist.

One might suppose that the Nazi authorities, occupied with the pressing needs of the moment, would have temporarily relegated their long-range theories to the background. But that is not the case. The Münchener Neueste Nachrichten of April 11 informs us, for example, of a new measure in the service of that eternal obsession, the increase of the German race.

Munich is the first German city to establish a Marriage Bureau for soldiers on leave. The purpose is to give men and women who want to marry an opportunity to get acquainted. Lectures and teas are held at which people can wander around and choose someone they like. It is said that disabled soldiers experience particular difficulty, primarily of a mental nature, and they are therefore the first ones to be advised by the bureau. As soon as a couple has become acquainted, the bureau tries to deepen the friendship by arranging visits to the theater and excursions. In addition to this service, matches will be arranged by mail for front-line soldiers.

The idea of the Marriage Bureau originated, the paper emphasizes, in the mind of Herr Himmler himself. Apparently the Gestapo chief busies himself with filling not only graves but cradles.

The First World Peace

VICTORY WITHOUT PEACE. By Roger Burlingame and Alden Stevens. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75. UNFINISHED BUSINESS. By Stephen Bonsal. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

BOTH books relate the same dismal tragedy—the sinking of Wilson's great ideal in the quagmire of diplomacy and politics. Both have the same anxious question in view: shall we commit exactly the same errors, with the same ineluctable result? The methods of presentation are radically different; both are extremely effective.

"Victory Without Peace" is not "a new kind of history"; it is standard popular history, with the technique and fascination of romance-Carlyle, Michelet, or Lamartine in their more sober moods. It is "easy to read" in the same way as a pretty woman is "easy to look at." The story is excellently told, without any factitious ornaments. There are fewer slips than in most books concocted by the Dryasdusts. The volume is too brief to be a searching study. It is a bit of hagiography and propaganda: St. Wilson, virgin and martyr, with his halo; the Evil One, Senator Lodge, with his baleful leer-"You shall not escape me!" It is oversimplified but essentially true. The authors take it for granted that Wilson constantly lived on the higher levels reached by his great pronouncements—peaks which dwarf the best achievements of the present generation. Alas! The prophet, in his uninspired moments, was a bit of a politician and a bit of a pedagogue; he could be at the same time vague and arrogant, hesitating and stubborn. But at his best he was a major prophet, and remains our spiritual leader today. For Messrs. Burlingame and Stevens he was 99 per cent pure gold; my own estimate is 66 per cent. This places him in a totally different class from the alleged statesmen who were solid brass, tin, lead, or plain pasteboard. I wish this book the most brilliant success. It tells a great story with directness and sympathy; and it is, without wearisome moralizing, a good preparation for the ordeal ahead of us-an ordeal which more than actual war will try men's souls.

Stephen Bonsal, a great foreign correspondent, became the trusted assistant of Colonel House: his confidential adviser, contact man, interpreter: the gray shadow of the Gray Eminence, with the appropriate rank of lieutenant colonel. By Wilson's request he kept notes on committee meetings of which no official record was preserved. Nearly one half of the book—Colonel Bonsal's missions to Vienna, Prague, Belgrade, Budapest, Berlin—is fascinating but of no unique value. The rest, devoted to the drafting of the Covenant, is a document of commanding importance.

The proof of Bonsal's honesty is that, with the facts as he presents them, we may reach conclusions quite different from his own. He disposes easily of the accusation that the European politicians "ganged up" against Wilson; on the contrary, every country was more eager to cooperate with America than with any other ally. Clemenceau comes out very well—a realist with an ideal, "I became convinced that your President wanted the same thing that I did . . . but . . . Mr. Wilson has lived in a world that has been fairly safe for democracy. I have lived in a world where it was good form to shoot a democrat."

The villain of the drama—a great surprise to me—was Lord Robert Cecil. At every step he took the most thoroughgoing reactionary line: no freedom of the sea; no equality between races; no equality between nations; no international force in which a British officer might have to take orders from a foreigner; no compulsory arbitration; no disarmament that would actually disarm Britain; in a word, nothing that could have made the League a reality. In addition, atrocious manners, outbursts of temper against "pestiferous" Hymans, "long-winded" Bourgeois, and Bonsal himself, who happened to know French better than the noble lord

As I read this book, the great flaw in drafting the Covenant was that Wilson and House, devoid of genuine international experience, thought that agreement with England would suffice. All other nations were mercilessly snubbed. The words of Dmowski have a tragic ring today: "I had hoped that our distinguished and most welcome visitors from across the seas, broad as well as narrow, would carefully weigh the unanimous opinion of those unfortunate peoples who dwell so near the cave where the wolf pack lowers." Léon Bourgeois was pompous, no doubt, and verbose, but he was no fool; he knew Europe, and he had studied the problems of a League, not like Wilson for fifteen months, but for twenty years. To the last he fought for definite commitments, an organized force, were it only in the form of a general staff. When he insisted on clarity, Wilson responded with a tolerant shrug: "Let us not attempt to be precise. If the thing is really clear, it goes without saying; saving it might imply that it was not universally accepted. If it is not obvious, let us leave it out; it might offend somebody sometime. Definition is limitation. We want the Monroe Doctrine to mean whatever we choose whenever we like. If anything is hazy, let us leave it to the tribunal of public opinion." No wonder Larnaude, an authority on international law, was appalled.

"The court of public opinion"! I believe the common people were with Wilson, in America and in Europe. But they had no direct way of making their will manifest. Wilson could not have had "a solemn referendum" unless he had actually taken a referendum; and this form of direct democracy is not in the American Constitution. He could not have made an all-out appeal to the European masses without inciting them to revolt against their lawful governments. From an assembly of diplomats and politicians, jealously watched by the politicians at home, no democratic constitution for a new world can be expected. When we do want a World Charter, it will have to be prepared not by two or three supermen in secret conclave but by a convention of the common man in open debate.

Both books dwell on the tragedy of Wilson's illness; it had cast its shadow long before. Both equally fail to note the most momentous decision in the conference—a decision into which the Mighty apparently slipped unawares. It was understood that there would be a short meeting of the Allies, to agree on a common program; this, according to House, would last perhaps three weeks. Then the actual conference would begin, involving full and free discussion with the Germans. Imperceptibly, the preliminary conference became the main show, and the meeting with the former enemy was reduced to handing down a Dikiat.

Bonsal, in his scrupulous honesty, bears witness to a couple of things which at present we should prefer to forget. The first is that Baron Makino, of Japan, made a briliant fight for the juridical equality of races and nations. He won, eleven to six, but Wilson ruled that in this case unanimity was necessary. The second is that in exchange for the recognition of the Monroe Doctrine the right of Japan to proclaim a similar doctrine in Eastern Asia was tacitly recognized. It is a great tribute to our freedom of the press that such a damaging document could be published at the present time.

ALBERT GUERARD

The Poet Perse

ELOGES AND OTHER POEMS. By St. John Perse. Translated by Louise Varèse. Introduction by MacLeish. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

THE Germans, when they took Paris, in 1940, sacked the apartment of Alexis St. Léger Leger and destroyed several manuscript volumes of his poems. Hence, all the poems by the famous St. John Perse now in existence, other than those composed since his escape to the United States, are the ones he had already published. They are the tiny epic "Anabase," and the volume of the "Eloges"—pictorial poems that like so many of the Psalms are laudi or songs of homage—which has just reappeared in the present superb French-English version. For Perse and Leger are one person.

What took the Germans to his apartment was the fact that he was a French public servant, since 1931 the Permanent Secretary of Foreign Affairs, who had opposed the cabal preparing to surrender France and been dismissed from office. Pertinax, the wholly reliable publicist, characterizes him in his last volume, "Les Fossoyeurs" ("The Gravediggers"), as "a man of absolute moral and intellectual integrity."

Why Leger had chosen to publish under a pseudonym, unlike Joseph de Maistre, Gobineau, Claudel, and other French diplomats who also were bellettrists, is not quite clear. He first appeared in print in the initial issue of La Nouvelle Revue Française in 1909, with the earliest version of the least representative section of the "Eloges," the sardonic "Images for Crusoe." It was over his own name. But the later poems in the book, and all its editions, as well as "Anabase," were signed St. Jean Perse. Rumor has it that Briand, whose intimate collaborator he was for many years, requested the disguise. Another and plausible explanation is proffered by MacLeish in his introduction to the Norton volume. This much is certain: in literary Europe it was an open secret that the influential author of "Anabase," whose array of translators included Rilke, Eliot, and Ungaretti, presided over the Quai d'Orsay.

Yet if merely the "Eloges" had survived, one still could perceive the spiritual figure of the author. Plainly it shows him as the foil of Gide, whose exquisite, sensuous, minimally metaphoric style his own resembles. One of the volume's loveliest sections, "Friendship of the Prince" (the soul), is the antithesis of Gide's clever prose fantasy "El Hadj." That also concerned a prince who was the soul. But there the prince died and left his prophet a charlatan. Another section, the ballad-like "Homage to a Queen," is a sort of anti-Corydon. The "Queen" not only is Woman. The homage is bare of masochism. (This exciting, amusingly audacious poem archly also reverses the direction of a perverse line of Rimbaud's, from his prose-poem about the hermaphroditic demi-god.) Indeed, Perse's attitude is entirely the counterpart of Gide's hesitant, detached, infinitely variable one. Perse is the man of participations, connections, constancies.

The "Eloges" are songs of connection, frequently with those "suburbs of Marseilles," the French Antilles, where Leger was born of an old colonial family in 1889; and with his childhood there. The attitude is emphasized by the pervading spirit of praise and the accents of gratitude. Again one sees it in exclamations like certain of those in which he salutes the "Queen": "O body like a table of sacrifices! and table of my law!"; "Ha Necessary One! and Solitary!" The very form symbolizes connection. It is incantatory, built of the chanting recitation of words, refrains, obsessive rhythms resembling those that fortuitously rise to the surface of the mind when it is in singular states of receptivity to objects, landscapes, cosmic forces and in continuity with them; saturated with their qualities.

At first these rich songs must seem strange. Their movement is close to that of lyrical French prose, though distinguished from it by subtle but pronounced linkages of assonances and sustentations of rhythm. Really they fall into the shapely free-verse mold which Leger took over from the young Claudel and has steadily elaborated and variously employed: the mold, established on the principle of the French alexandrine, which equilibrates irregularly extensive, complexly rhythmical, alternately rising and falling utterances with sounds that evoke the elements continuously about caesuras. And some of his pictures, curiously, recall the weird treasures of ethnographic museums; others, figure or landscape paintings by Matisse: still others, the gaudy emblems inside the covers of Havana-cigar boxes. It may be that some of the poems will even suggest those minor triumphs of French epicureanism, pâté de foie gras and camembert! This is the consequence of a romanticism in Leger's style of imagination. He loves picturesquely strange, timeless, tropical, or barbaric symbols and imagery. Boldly he has continued the variegation of poetic French. And he possesses an occasionally over-rich, over-ripe sensuousness, a taste for word and color clashes and concentrated piquant and pungent effects.

But his poems shine: by virtue of the clarity of their pictures; the serenity of their feeling; their sapient exploitation of sound-values and the delicate sonority of their dense and sumptuous verbal textures; above all, by virtue of their

DAVY JONES, I Love You

By F. R. Buckley

The hearty, pungent story of a ship and her crew . . . crammed to the hatches with tense action, salted with humor, glowing with the simple courage of brave men. Written in Conrad's tradition, with an eya for drama, a ear for virulent speech and a comprehending heart. "A delight to read."

lyricism of emotional contact and the steady pressure of their taut and expanding rhythms. And let not the unwary reader be deceived into believing it is entirely earthly objects they seek to embrace. Their gesticulation rather more concerns "a high condition. i. in the dominion of the shifting lights"; a wonder couched in the sensuous circumstance a divinity within the rhythm and color of the earthly. It is something akin to what is celebrated in that "holiest of holy books" "The Song of Songs." Theologians might call it "the immanence" of God.

Hitler's Military Machine

THE GERMAN ARMY. By Herbert Rosinski. The Infantry Journal. $3.

R. ROSINSKI'S excellent book on the German army traces its history from the time of the father of Frederick the Great to the Battle of Salerno. It supersedes not only the author's previous study of the same subject—in fact, the present book is more than a revised edition, it is a completely new work—but also most of the other books on the German army published in recent years. Since it contains a penetrating analysis of the functioning of the German military machine and a discussion of the military ideas prevailing in the German General Staff, it should be read by all those who are currently engaged in destroying the military power of the German Reich.

Dr. Rosinski balances well the influences of external circumstances and necessities with the contributions to the development of the German army made by personalities such Frederick, Scharnhorst, Gneisenau, Boyen, Moltke, Roon, Schlieffen, Ludendorff, and Seeckt. He rightly stresses the importance of moral and intellectual factors, such as the principle of duty and the philosophy of war of Clausewitz. The causes of the extraordinary strength of the German army are found largely in its system of coordination and command, in the organization of the General Staff, which even today has many features as yet unequaled in other armies, and in the military concepts according to which the Germans shape their strategy. These concepts include the Vernichtungsgedanke-"directing the military effort not upon an inconclusive 'ordinary victory,' but upon a decisive act of annihilation"; the idea that in matters of war the whole determines the part, and not vice versa; and the rigid rule that every military operation must be based upon a center of

It must be emphasized that Dr. Rosinski's book contains many pages of original historical research. The author is able to shed light on several hitherto inadequately known events and persons. In particular, his description of General von Seeckt and of the post-World War maintenance of the German army deserves the utmost attention, certainly on the part of our "peace-planners."

There will be disagreement with some of the book's judgments. A life-long study of the subject has caused the author to adopt an attitude toward the pre-Hitler army which frequently is too benevolent. The acts of Frederick the Great are open to different interpretations. Not all students of the First World War will be inclined to accept the author's version of the causes of the German failure in 1914, or his evaluation of Falkenhayn. In the reviewer's opinion there is no evidence for the statement that the German attack on Norway in 1940 was primarily a defensive move, particularly since the author himself recognizes that the strategic importance of the Scandinavian area was not realized by the Allies. In his analysis of the current German military ideas, the author has omitted two of the most important-namely, the doctrine that surprise is the key to victory, and the Wehrmachtgedanke, that is, the notion that ground, sea, and air forces, while maintaining their organizational independence, should be welded together for the purpose of combined strategy. The failure fully to carry this idea out in practice may be one of the main reasons why the Germans are going to lose the war. Finally, one would have liked to hear more about the consequences of Nazi infiltration into, and Hitler's leadership of, the German army. Obviously, the author was handicapped in this respect by lack of material. But an important institution like the Führungstab should deserve more than a passing reference.

However, all these are largely matters of opinion. They do not alter the fact that Dr. Rosinski's concisely and lucidly written book is one of the most revealing and timely contributions to the history of the present war.

Empire and India

EMPIRE. By Louis Fischer. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $1.

MPERIALISM means India, and in so short and "popular" a book Mr. Fischer is quite right to ignore the more complex colonial problems that exist in Africa and the Pacific. He is not trying to stimulate anti-British prejudice, and the uninformed reader would come away from this book with a true general picture as well as some quotable facts and figures.

As he perceives, the uninformed reader is the one most worth aiming at. No enlightened person needs any longer to be told that imperialism is an evil. The point Mr. Fischer is at pains to make clear is that it not only breeds wars but impoverishes the world as a whole by preventing the development of backward areas. The "owner" of a colony usually does its best to exclude foreign trade; it strangles local industries—the British, to take only one instance, have deliberately prevented the growth of an automobile industry in India; and in self-protection it not only goes on the principle of "divide and rule" but more or less consciously fosters ignorance and superstition. In the long run it is not to the advantage, even in crude cash terms, of the ordinary Briton or American that India should remain in the Middle Ages; and the common people of both countries ought to realize this, for they are the only ones who are likely to do anything about it. No one in his senses imagines that the British ruling class will relinquish India voluntarily. The only hope lies in British and American public opinion, which at the time of the Cripps mission, for instance, could have forced more generous offer upon the British government if it had understood the issues.

At the same time Mr. Fischer does oversimplify the Indian problem, even in terms of the very general picture that he is trying to give. To begin with, he does not say often enough or emphatically enough that India has no chance of freedom until some kind of international authority is established. In a world of national sovereignties and power politics it is improbable that even a British government of the left would willingly grant genuine independence to India. To do so would simply be to hand India over to some other power, which from either a selfish or an altruistic point of view is no solution. Secondly, in his anxiety to sound reasonable Mr. Fischer overplays the economic motive. It is not certain that increased prosperity for India would benefit the rest of the world immediately. Just suppose, he says, that 400,000,000 Indians all took to wearing shoes. Would not that mean a wonderful market for British and American shoe manufacturers? The Indians, however, might prefer to make their shoes for themselves, and as the Indian capitalist's idea of I living wage is two cents an hour, the effect of Indian competition on the Western standard of living might be disastrous. At present the West as . whole is exploiting Asia a whole, and to right the balance may mean considerable sacrifices over a number of years. It is better to warn people of this and not lead them to imagine that honesty always pays in the financial sense.

The direct, assessable money profit that Britain draws from India is not enormous. If one divided it up among the British population it would only amount to a few pounds a year. But as Mr. Fischer rightly emphasizes, it is not divided among the population; it flows into the pockets of a few thousand persons who also control government policy and incidentally own all the newspapers. Up to date these people have been uniformly successful in keeping the truth about India from the British public. To enlighten the American public may perhaps be a little easier, since American interests are not so directly involved, and Mr. Fischer's book is not bad as a start. But he ought to supplement it by warning his readers of the difficult transition period that lies ahead, and also of the sinister forces, political and economic, that exist within India itself.

The Complete American

THE COMPLETE JEFFERSON. Containing His Major Writings, Published and Unpublished, Except His Letters. Assembled and Arranged by Saul K. Padover. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $5.

PVERY reader of books should be grateful to Dr. Padover and his publishers for making available at last—at long last—a sizable Jefferson in one volume. Here are letters, state papers, diaries, notes on gardening and gadgets, speeches to Indian chiefs, and soliloquies on religion, art, and the conduct of life. Jefferson is displayed as the encyclopedist that he was and as the complete American who was also a thoroughly acclimated European.

What is surprising is that his collected thoughts should be as much suited to desultory "bedside" reading as his views are worthy of being called a philosophy. Anywhere that you dip in, you find the man, with his tone and temper,

"It has a vast quantity of fact-crammed reading matter, a disarmingly friendly tone, a real faculty for clear exposition. A book for the times by virtue of its intelligent discussion of linguistic problems and its resolute insistence that for the ordinarily intelligent adults there is no insuperable obstacle to the learning of several languages."—GEORGE GENZMER, Nation.

and not merely a cultivated echo of an enlightened epoch. We have all, perhaps, been led to misjudge Jefferson's style, on the strength of the first paragraph of the Declaration of Independence. We forget that he was composing a peculiarly solemn public document and that if he knew how to suit the occasion so well, he must at other moments be able to sound a livelier tune. Read in Dr. Padover's collection how you can make a metronome with a piece of string and five brads, what Dr. Franklin reported about English physicians and old women, or why John Adams should think Plato nonsensical, and you will be convinced that Jefferson was not only a universal mind but also a nimble pen. He is as good a writer of pensées as any French moralist, and he carries besides that flavor of the New World which attaches him to our tradition.

This last element has had something to do with creating the commonplace that Jefferson's doctrine is "fundamental" in our national life. I would not disturb this belief, to which we owe the upkeep of his works and reputation. But it is clear on reading him in bulk that there was in him a good deal of the "superior man," which the national tradition hardly tolerates. He was "for" the common people by taste and principle, but equally against their tendency toward herd behavior. He was far less adept at manipulating group opinion or yielding to group pressure than his friend Franklin. Jefferson, in fact, brings out all the latent ambiguity in the word democracy: he was a great democrat because his instincts were aristocratic. He trusted the principle of equality because he did not feel insecure, downtrodden, or envious. He was for the little fellow's rights because he himself was independent.

Let us rather hope, then, that Jefferson's thought becomes more and more representative of American life until it erases the blot discerned upon the fabric of our social relations by every honest and observant lover of freedom, from Tocqueville and Emerson to Whitman and Wilde. Whatever may be the effect of books upon conduct, we shall no longer be able to plead ignorance of Jefferson's deeper meaning. The list of Jeffersoniana, in hand or in prospect, is pleasantly staggering. Besides Bernard Mayo's neat anthology and the older collected writings, there is to be m definitive edition, planned by the Princeton Press and the New York Times, under the editorship of Dr. Julian Boyd and associated scholars. early years is, I believe, being carried forward to make a full biography, and just recently the Guggenheim Foundation subsidized Miss Adrienne Koch, author of a monograph on Jefferson, for a further study of his philosophy in comparison with that of Madison and Monroe.

But most of these books are or will be for scholars. Hence the special value, now and for a long time to come, of Dr. Padover's one-volume unencumbered edition. It should be the home Jefferson, the traveler's vade mecum, the omnibus of the bedridden. Unfortunately and quite unnecessarily, it weighs three and three-quarter pounds. Why do American publishers sell the spirit of man by the hundredweight? It is not true that 1,300 pages must always show a great alacrity in sinking, for there is no need to bind them in second-hand coffin lids, or to use paper artificially loaded with clay. European books of comparable size can be held in one hand or read in bed with comfort. Indeed, one New York firm of foreign origin, Pantheon Books, has shown what can be done even under war-time restrictions, and I see no loss of face involved for anyone who should follow their lead.

In the second printing of "The Complete Jefferson," which I hope may be thus improved, the editor will also want to correct a scattering of misprints, particularly in foreign words. Perhaps, too, he might be induced to add two things at no great expense of space—first, the emendations offered by Adams and Franklin to the original Declaration of Independence and, second, the list of texts from the New Testament which form the Jefferson Bible. One page of these numbered references would be equivalent to adding a characteristic work and would make clearer the grounds for the religious opinions Jefferson propounds in the essays here reprinted.

Down with Fifty-seventh Street!

GOOD-BYE MR. CHIPPENDALE. By T. H. Robsjohn-Gibbings, Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THIS little book, written by one of the leading designers of contemporary furniture and gaily illustrated by Mary Petty, is as pertinent to post-war thinking as the speeches of Henry Wallace. Mr. Robsjohn-Gibbings wants to take the American home out of the snobbish hands of Fifty-seventh Street—and its Grand Rapids imitators—and give it back to the American people. The author has wit, and his exposé of the history and present practice of the antiques racket is highly entertaining reading. But beneath the urbane surface is a crusader's fervor.

Elsie De Wolfe once offered the sinister advice to the wives of America that in interior decoration they must remember that "men are forever guests in our homes." Actually both the Little Woman and her husband were guests—and barely tolerated at that—of Elsie De Wolfe, Condé Nast, and others who controlled the taste of the fashion magazines in New York and erected their snobberies into a national canon of "good taste." Because the United States was little more than a large absence on the spiritual map of these fashionable New Yorkers, the taste of average Americans was turned toward antiques and the Olde Worlde.

It didn't matter that Europe itself was hailing us for just those aesthetic achievements which had escaped the tasteful aegis of Fifty-seventh Street. Our kitchens and bathrooms were marvels of functional design. Frank Lloyd Wright, the pupil of Louis Sullivan ("Form follows function"), was acknowledged abroad as the most creative force in contemporary architecture. But the Elsie De Wolfes and Condé Nasts, like good colonials, were not to be put off. Plus royaliste que le roi, they knew what was good taste even if old Mother Europe forgot.

One must realize that the taste represented by Fifty-seventh Street is colonial. It is not a question here of advocating a strident nationalism. Civilized nations have always swapped contemporary idioms. But the colonial taste does not swap; it borrows, passively and sentimentally. And in the borrowing the organic connection between the thing borrowed and the life for which it was created is lost. A modern American kitchen is good art, an expression of American life. Most American furniture is not art at all; it is a sentimental décor for colonials.

Significantly enough, Mr. Robsjohn-Gibbings, now an American citizen, came here from Britain seven years ago. Like other creative Europeans, such as W. H. Auden, it was the neumess of the New World that attracted him. While Elsie De Wolfe, now Lady Mendl, was happily enveloped in eighteenth-century dream at the Villa Trianon in Versailles, Mr. Robsjohn-Gibbings had arrived in New York to join in the fight to win America back for the Americans.

Drama Note

IDDING the Greeks is a theatrical device that has given faithful service. "Helen Goes to Troy" (Alvin Theater) indicates that it ought to be retired, at least temporarily. The production has everything—the music of Offenbach, gorgeous costumes, pretty girls, choreography by Massine, sets and lighting by Robert Edmond Jones, Jarmila Novotna, and a charming young lady named Rose Inghram who plays the part of Discordia. It has everything, that is, but wit. The "new book" sounds as if its authors had had an old joke book propped up between them as they labored. The new lyrics for Offenbach's lighthearted music seem to have been put together with the aid of me rather dog-eared copy of the Tin Pan Alley Thesaurus.

A Viennese friend informs me that in the European version the words of "La Belle Hélène" were never as good as the music, but that the piece was a handy vehicle for comedians, in the parts of Menelaus and Calchas, who wanted to make something of them. In the American version Ralph Dumke makes something very heavy and obvious of the role of Calchas. Ernest Truex does better with Menelaus, but all the gods, modern and ancient, are against him. Miss Novotna passes well enough for Helen, but her grand-opera training is something of a handicap for musical comedy. She doesn't take the part lightly enough. I found it difficult to take Paris (William Horne) seriously enough.

The spirit of Offenbach is pretty well buried in what turns out to be a lavish musical designed for the summer trade.

FILMS

SOME of the following films are worth more detailed comment and may get it in the course of time. Meanwhile here is a check-list.

"Going My Way," a rather saccharine story about priests, has a gentle, engaging performance by Bing Crosby, a very full and fine one by Barry Fitzgerald, and a general leisure and appreciation of character which I think highly of. It would have a little more stature as a "religious" film if it dared suggest that evil is anything worse than a bad cold and that lack of self-knowledge can be not merely cute and inconvenient but also dangerous to oneself and to others. "It Happened Tomorrow" is the deftest, prettiest film René Clair has made here, and a few moments in it-notably a box-office holdup-are beautiful. But its basic idea seems a limp one, the story is over-ingenious, and there are only glimmers of the pure joy which was so abundant in Clair's great films; I doubt that anyone could achieve such joy, or its equivalent, in contemporary Hollywood. "The Adventures of Mark Twain" gets long and soggy but has frequent good intention and occasional near-successes, especially when it forgets to be a biography and stretches its points for the fun of it. The jumping-frog contest is really funny.

"The Hitler Gang" fascinates me as all waxworks do: otherwise it worries me because of its solemn effort to stick to the "facts" before an audience which is liable, on that account, to swallow it whole. Hitler strikes me as something other than a pitiful, vicious psychotic incapable of an idea, and I don't enjoy the picture's apparent suggestion-through the respectful porrayal of Gregor Strasser-that there would be nothing wrong with Naional Socialism if only the vicious ringeaders were eliminated. "Address Unknown" is rather vapid anti-fascism, oo: full of sincere and, in their unineresting way, skilful shadows by Wiliam Cameron Menzies. But neither Paul Lukas nor anyone else can give it nuch bite. Lukas can do nothing for he Errol Flynn vehicle "Uncertain Glory," either, beyond increasing one's espect for an actor who refuses to sink o the level of his material. In "Buffalo Bill" William Wellman has constructed Technicolored Indian battle, derived erhaps from the battle in "Alexander Nevsky," which is fun to watch, and in eneral he makes good use of the plains and the movement of people on them. But most of the picture is boring. "Up in Mabel's Room" is as horrible, and wonderful, as watching a Gopher Prairie dramatic club play a mail-order farce (6m., 6f.). "The Yellow Canary" is mediocre British spy stuff, relieved only by British film cliché, which is several times as realistic and intelligent as ours. "The Lady and the Monster" is a madscientist movie featuring Erich von Stroheim and a Czech ex-skating champion named Vera Hruba Ralston, who does not skate in this one and whom I thought unusually attractive. The picture is two-thirds mildly amusing cliché and one-third mildly successful sharpening or avoidance of cliché.

My regret at having somewhat overrated "Cover Girl" is more than counterbalanced by even a glancing remembrance of other current musicals. If I really sat down to think of them. I'm afraid I'd rate it even higher. I serve warning, in no special order of disgrace, against seeing the followingmentioning any good thing I can, about each: "Follow the Boys" shows you the sort of entertainment American soldiers and sailors are subjected to at home and abroad, and shows you also how very proud Hollywood is of its role in the war. Purple Hearts should be handed out after every projection. "Broadway Rhythm" contains perhaps three minutes of good acrobatic dancing and lasts nearly two hours. In "Show Business" there are a few bits of archaic vaudeville which give off a moderately pleasant smell of peanuts and cigar smoke. During the making of "Pin-Up Girl" Betty Grable was in the early stage of pregnancy; everyone else was evidently in a late stage of paresis. "Knickerbocker Holiday" uses the smirking mannerisms and attitudes of Gilbert and Sullivan as one might use Sanka dregs the fifth time. In "Seven Days Ashore" I thought Alan Carney pleasant and promising; Margaret Dumont very funny. I also liked glints of cynicism in the script and of flexibility in the camera work. But in the aggregate these good things cannot amount to better than 5 per cent of the picture. If music be the breakfast food of love, kindly do not disturb until lunch time.

RECORDS

OLUMBIA'S April list was not much more rewarding than Victor's, with exactly one single disc (71509-D; $1) which offered music and performance of major stature. The music is "Der Doppelgänger," one of Schubert's greatest, most overwhelming songs, and "Die junge Nonne," in which he occasionally transmutes obviousness into wonderful details. The performances are by Lehmann and Ulanowsky, and are superb—though I am bothered by things like Lehmann's alteration of the rhythmic shape of the last phrase of "Der Doppelgänger" and her change of a G natural to G sharp in "Die junge Nonne." Voice and piano are excellently reproduced.

The rest of the list, like Victor's, seems to indicate that the company is pretty near the bottom of the barrel of what it had in reserve when Petrillo put an end to recording; though it leads me to wonder why Columbia has not issued Beecham's last London Philharmonic recordings of Mozart symphonies and its own recording of Schubert's "Schöne Müllerin" sung by Lehmann. But, as with some Victor releases. I must wonder also at the original decision to expend equipment, labor, and materials on Dohnanyi's Quintet Opus 1 for piano and strings, a fluent recapitulation of Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Brahms, played by Kilenyi and the Roth Quartet (Set 546; $4.50). Kilenyi's playing is percussive and aggressive, often blanketing the sound of the strings. This may be due to poorly balanced recording; and recording also may be responsible for the dull sound of the piano, the brash sound of the strings.

On a single disc (11983-D; $1) is a performance of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music by Stokowski with the All-American Orchestra, which almost explodes off the record with its ostentatious virtuosity, and which consequently is a poor performance of this exquisite piece. On the reverse side is a monstrous transcription for Stokowskian full orchestra of the great Prelude of Bach's E major Partita for unaccompanied violin. The recorded sound of the performances is not good.

And finally a set (X-240; $2.50) with four favorite waltzes—Strauss's "Blue Danube" and "Tales From the Vienna Woods," Sibelius's "Valse triste," and the Waltz of the Flowers from Tchaikowsky's "Nutcracker"—played by Barlow and the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony with plastic discontinuities and stylistic vulgarities that don't require detailed description.

To feature as its April record classic Columbia chose from its catalogue Beethoven's Ninth Symphony performed by Weingartner with orchestra (Vienna Philharmonic), chorus, and soloists of the Vienna Opera of ten or twelve years ago (Set 227; $8.50). Toscanini's great performance of the work is not available on records: the attempts to record it at a concert have produced results which he has considered unsatisfactory and has refused to release. There have been, therefore, only two recorded performances to choose from-Weingartner's and Stokowski's; and of these Weingartner's impressed me, when I heard it, as simple, direct, and powerful, but poorly recorded-but to be preferred nevertheless to Stokowski's well-recorded performance, which was not simple and direct. Re-hearing Weingartner's performance now, I was freshly aware of the straightforwardness of his statements of the first two movements, and of their power-though I was aware this time of the greater power that Toscanini had achieved at certain points; and I found the recorded sound of these two movements agreeable and clear-the only defect being an occasional faulty balance which, for example, obscured some of the woodwind counterpoint. It was in the third movement that I began to hear unpleasant recorded sound; and the fourth brought additional defects of balance which, for example, made the opening strident outburst sound miles away and the recitative of the string basses sound very near. This time, in addition, noting Weingartner's fast tempos and his lack of all rhetorical underlining-for example, in the Andante maestoso "Seid umschlungen" and Adagio . . . divoto "Ihr stürzt nieder" of the fourth movement-I found his statements of these two movements perfunctory; and certainly the ecstasy of parts of these movements is not to be achieved by perfunctory statement. I also noted the deficiencies of the soloists-the great Richard Mayr's rhythmic slovenliness in the bass recitatives. Maikl's unpleasant tenor, Anday's terrific contralto tremolo. Only Helletsgruber does well; and the chorus is superb. But with all its defects this version is to be preferred to Stokowski's.

Most of these April records had poor surfaces.

I keep getting enormous pleasure from Edwin Denby's dance criticism—the pleasure that comes from all that I begin to see when Mr. Denby makes it possible for me to look at things through his eyes. All of us are amused by Markova's performance in "Pas de quatre"; but through Mr. Denby we become aware of "her charmingly ironical exaggeration of what correct academic dancing looks like," and, in this, of "the suavity of her wrists and arms." Or we are excited by one of her movements ending in a motionless pose; then, through Mr. Denby, we realize "her secret of a lightning change from tension to relaxation"-her tensing "right after the spring upward . . . which makes her figure look so exact in the air." Or we look at Youskevitch's movement through space and know that it is more wonderful than anything of the kind done by anybody else; then, through Mr. Denby, we "see easily what the action is, how the trunk takes the main direction of the dance and how the limbs vary the force and the drive by calculated countermovements. The changing shape of the dancing body is vigorously defined. The weight of the body and the abundant strength of it are equally clear; and the two aspects blend gracefully in the architectural play of classic sequences. The distribution of energy is intelligent and complex. In his leaps, for instance, the noble arm positions, the tilt of the head sideways or forward, make you watch with interest a whole man who leaps; you don't watch, as with most dancers, only the lively legs of a man. And while most dancers leap for the sake of the bound upward only, Youskevitch (like Markova) leaps for the entire trajectory, and for a mysterious repose he keeps as he hangs in the air."

The Cost of Living

Dear Sirs: Your editorial entitled Price Control Works, in The Nation of April 22, is in certain respects slightly on the unfactual side. I am not discussing your apparent disagreement with the C. I. O. on the stabilization issue. You have a perfect right to disagree with us, even if your disagreement proceeds from a grievous case of bad judgmen. My objection is to the use of unfactual material in stating your disagreement.

Your editorial states: "An analysis of the C. I. O. Cost-of-Living Report shows, however, that it includes such items as taxes, war-bond purchases, and black-market purchases—none of which properly belong in a cost-of-living index." This statement is in error. The C. I. O.-A. F. of L. Cost-of-Living Report, which shows a minimum rise of 43.5 per cent in war-time living costs since January, 1941, does not take into account in its figures any of the items which you report that it does.

On black markets the report states: "Neither the BLS Index nor this report takes into account rising living costs resulting from sales through black markets. The Special Committee of the American Statistical Association thinks that [black markets] should not be represented in an official index of living costs.' This ethical judgment, however, does not alter the fact that black markets do increase the actual living costs of workers, as sporadic Department of Agriculture reports indicate. BLS states that its index does not include blackmarket prices as they are not available. This report does not reflect the contribution of black markets to higher living costs for much the same reason. If data were available to measure the extent to which black markets have raised workers' living costs, such data would be a chief weapon in wiping out such black markets. Therefore, the findings of this report suffer from a downward bias to the extent that they do not reflect blackmarket prices."

No one familiar with the exorbitant profits of food corporations, which are at the root of black markets, would argue that black markets are not a legitimate part of war-time living costs.

On taxes, the C. I. O.-A. F. of L. report states: "Neither the BLS Index nor this report reflects higher living costs resulting from increased direct taxes. A prevalent view, in which the BLS concurs, is that the effect of direct taxes should be accounted for at the other end of the stick from living costs, namely, income. Whether the effect of increased direct taxes is shown in the form of higher living costs or in the form of lower disposable income is academic. This report, therefore, avoids controversy on this matter and does not take into account increased direct taxes in measuring the war-time increase in workers' living costs."

On war bonds and other savings the C. I. O.-A. F. of L. report states: "As in the case of direct taxes, neither the BLS nor this report takes into account increased savings resulting from bond purchases and other forms of savings. That they affect disposable income and expenditures is obvious."

Your error in this connection arises from the fact that you relied upon the worthless cost-of-living report of the National Industrial Conference Board. We in the labor movement did expect that The Nation would at least consult labor's material before rushing into print with fallacious propaganda emanating from business sources.

HAROLD J. RUTTENBERG, Research Director, United Steelworkers of America Washington, D. C., April 23

[Mr. Ruttenberg is largely right in his specific criticism of the National Inhis specific criticism of the National Industrial Conference Board's analysis referred to in our editorial. The board either erred or was misquoted in the press in the statement that taxes and war-bond purchases were factors in the C. I. O.-A. F. of L. cost-of-living estimate. It is difficult to account for this error in view of the fact that the Conference Board, regardless of its associations with big business, is normally accurate and responsible in factual statements.

The board is right and Mr. Ruttenberg is wrong with respect to black markets. The text of the technical portions of the report states clearly that the estimates of increased costs for food assume violations of the price ceilings, that is, that the housewife will buy part of her food at black-market prices. Undoubtedly such violations occur, and it cannot be denied that they affect actual living costs. But the Bureau of Labor Statistics is on sound ground when it points out that no housewife is compelled to buy at prices above ceiling, and patriotic citizens have an obligation not to. Furthermore, a rather substantial part of the increase in living costs indicated in the Thomas-Meany report results from changes in buying habits—such as the greater tendency to eat in restaurants rather than at home. It is a debatable question whether such changes should be ascribed to higher living costs or a higher standard of living.—BDITORS THE NATION.]

Our Tactics, Not Our G. I.'s

Dear Sir: While our two campaigns in Italy continue to lag, the American High Command there seems to have launched all-out upon a third, a disciplinary campaign to enforce saluting, maintain punctilious correctness in the wearing of the uniform, and other such stringencies. M. P.'s are reported shamefacedly accosting disarrayed soldiers almost within gunfire of the front lines. And one corporal who had just captured fifteen Nazis single-handed found himself jailed for not wearing his helmet, even though he was in protected area at the time. Public reaction to this campaign is not favorable. Perhaps the army resents the implication that better-dressed, more smartly saluting soldiers might have had that extra "something" which would carry them through to victory. For reports of military analysts seem to agree that it was our tactics, not our G. I's, that lacked that extra "something."

German military sources have stated that at the time of our original landing in southern Italy rapid exploitation of the situation would have meant almost certain capture of all Italy with the possible exception of the northern provinces. And a Russian admiral who acted as an observer at the Anzio-Nettuno landings expressed surprise at the hesitancy of our unit commanders after reaching the beaches. The actions of our High Command in Italy in this case remind us, we regret to say, of the man who, every time he was unfaithful, found fault with his wife's cooking. Be that as it may, the fact remains that the public would much rather have its boys enter Rome unshaven than hear that they are wowing 'em in Naples.

The Shape of Things

EVERYONE IS FEELING THE PRE-INVASION tension, but among civilians, magazine editors, perhaps, bear an extra strain. The Nation goes to press at midday on Monday-21/2 days before it will reach any reader. Monday, as our deadline approaches, the offensive in Italy is the big news, but we have no means of telling whether it will not have fallen into place as a part of a much bigger whole by Thursday morning. In the Teheran declaration we were promised an assault on the Nazi fortress from east, west, and south. The southern fist has now struck, and we can be sure that the still mightier punches from east and west will follow in short order. In Russia the fall of Sevastopol has been followed by a lull, but reports of supplies moving up to the front hint at a new blow in preparation. In the west the aerial assault is still growing in intensity, with ever greater attention to tactical objectives—defense works, airfields, supply dumps, railroad yards, bridges. Zero hour cannot be far away, but whether we shall again be waiting for it next Monday, facing the same dilemma, only General Eisenhower and a few others know.

WISCONSIN CONTINUES TO BE A CENTER OF political interest. After Wendell Willkie's defeat there last month, Eastern Republicans were at great pains to deny that an isolationist trend in the state was indicated. But now we see the Wisconsin Republicans adopting a plank calling for "a clear-cut, realistic foreign policy which will promote world peace and protect American ideals." Comparatively harmless as these words sound, they take on a new significance when we learn that the following sentence was deleted from the original draft: "We do not believe in isolating America from the rest of the world to the detriment of a permanent peace." This plank brings the Wisconsin G. O. P. close to the isolationist policies long championed by the Wisconsin Progressives under the leadership of Robert and Philip La Follette. And in return the Progressive convention two days later declared its liaison with the Democrats to be at an end, opening the way for a deal with the Republicans. It is true that Senator La Follette, when asked what he intended to do in the Presidential race, said that he would await developments. But after describing the New Deal as "a casualty of war" and charging the Administration with failure on both the home and foreign fronts, it would seem that he must either support the Republican nominee or stay on the sidelines. It is probable that he will choose the first alternative, for "Bob" himself will be looking for new support in 1946. Moreover, if he moves into the Republican camp he will become third ranking Republican member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where his two seniors are men approaching eighty. Thus he could expect early succession to the chairmanship if the Republicans won the Senate. Surely the prospect of a new Borah in this key post will stir internationally minded Republicans to vigorous action.

THE DAY OF MARTIN DIES IS AT AN END. No longer will the loud-mouthed demagogue parade as the impartial investigator, the informer be elevated us the savior of his country, the bigot be hailed as patriot, The day is past when to be liberal is to be "un-American," when the "American way" leads back into the dark recesses of yesterday's intolerance, when black is called white. The quitting of Martin Dies is a victory for that Americanism which Dies talked about so much but understood so little. For Dies felt the mounting wrath of the American workers he classed as "red": their registration was up 25 per cent in his district. His own county Democratic organization denounced him. His withdrawal followed almost immediately the announcement that a decent Democrat would oppose him in the Texas primaries. The ground swell of fundamental American liberalism is running strong-Rush Holt was stopped cold in his attempted comeback in West Virginia; Martin Sweeney, friend of Father Coughlin, was blocked in his gubernatorial aspirations in Ohio by liberal Mayor Lausche of Cleveland, who is said to have a good chance against the Republicans; Representative Howard J. Mc-Murray, stalwart internationalist and fighting liberal, was chosen as the Democratic candidate for the Senate in Wisconsin. Americans are shaking themselves clear of the doldrums. The battle is not over, but it is well begun.

AS SENATOR GEORGE W. NORRIS REMINDS US on another page, the TVA idea is spreading around the world. This immensely fruitful experiment in the geopolitics of peace, which incidentally has made so important a contribution to our war effort, is likely to exert a powerful influence on the post-war planning of other lands. Hundreds of pilgrims from all over the world will in years to come flock to the Tennessee Valley to observe the methods by which the development of a whole great region has been built on flood control, soil conservation, and power. They will, that is, if TVA is allowed to continue as it has begun—a responsible publicly owned corporation operating on a non-political basis. For the TVA is under heavy attack in Congress. where the Senate has approved proposals which would strangle it in political red tape. At the instigation of Senator McKellar, amendments were attached to the Independent Offices Appropriation bill which would take from TVA the flexibility in management it derives from its ability to use its revenues as a revolving fund, and would plunge it into politics by making employees earning more than $4,500 a year subject to Senate approval. Fortunately, these proposals are encountering strong opposition in the House. They have also stirred antagonism in the valley itself, where something like a popular uprising in the defense of the TVA has taken place. In Tennessee Senator McKellar seems to be in a minority of one. The whole Congressional delegation from the state is fighting his amendments, and the voters of the state, and even the business interests, are opposing them vociferously. These protests are being echoed all over the country. If Congress has an ear to the ground, TVA will be saved.

THE SUSPENSION OF FATHER ORLEMANSKI looks like an over-hasty Bishop's move. The Springfield priest had just returned from a private mission to Moscow that promised great gains for his church and for the Polish people. Stalin had talked to him for nearly three hours and, reiterating his belief in an independent Poland, had assured him that the Catholic church would be free from persecution. Stalin's promise is in line with the general abandonment of Soviet anti-religious policy. Bishop O'Leary took stern disciplinary measures because Father Orlemanski was AWOL from his parish over Sunday and because he was guilty of "treating with Communists." In contrast with a large section of the Polish American community—as Eric Estorick shows elsewhere in this issue—Father Orlemanski had been active through the Kosciusko League in urging a policy of understanding and cooperation with Russia. His suspension, therefore, is more than a personal rebuke; it is almost tantamount to a slap in the face for Joseph Stalin at the very moment when, for a variety of reasons, he is showing himself particularly kindly disposed toward the Catholic and other religious faiths. If Father Orlemanski carries his case to higher courts in the church, it is to be hoped that there will be found the imaginative justice to admit that the unorthodox vision of a courageous priest sometimes penetrates to a reality hidden from the eyes of ecclesiastical legalism.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR HAS once again repulsed the advances of John L. Lewis, and John is not so much hurt as he is terribly, terribly angry. In blistering polysyllables he has denounced the executive council of the Federation for its refusal to admit his United Mine Workers to membership on his terms. He accuses the council of "characteristic servility to the Roosevelt Administration" and "base hyprocrisy approximating to moral turpitude." There is, of course, ground to believe that one reason for A. F. of L. hesitation in welcoming Mr. Lewis was his hostility to the President. For whatever complaints some of the A. F. of L. leaders may have to make about the Administration, they are unlikely to forget how much labor has improved its position under the New Deal. Yet it is doubtful whether the political issue would have proved a final barrier to readmission of the U. M. W. if Mr. Lewis had not so obstinately insisted that his charter must cover District 50 -the catch-all machine with which he has been raiding other unions. Apparently he was willing to drop some of District 50's claims, but he stuck to his demands for the right to organize all chemical workers. This encroachment on the jurisdictional fields of other unions outraged the most sacred principles of the A. F. of L. Thus Lewis by his dictatorial claims has played into the hands of his political enemies and succeeded in isolating himself. Perhaps he will still try to make a deal with the Republicans, but they may well regard him as a dubious asset, especially since there is no guaranty that he can deliver even the miners' vote.

REJOICING OVER THE FRANCO AGREEMENT did not last long. Editorial writers and radio commentators ordinarily engaged in glorifying our foreign policy had barely forty-eight hours to hail this latest great diplomatic victory of ours. On the third day, signs of discouragement became evident in London, which, in this case at least, bears greater responsibility than Washington for allowing the United Nations to make fools of themselves. The London press has begun to complain about the double game Franco is playing in giving wide publicity to the lifting of the oil embargo while silencing any talk of commitments he made in return for our generosity. Allied representatives in Madrid have had to make repeated demands that General Franco live up to his written word and expel Nazi spies from Tangier. Up to the moment of writing, these demands have fallen on deaf ears. No Nazi spies have been expelled from Tangier. The German Consulate there is as active as ever, and its doors as wide open. On the eve of invasion, Franco Spain, as we pointed out in last week's issue, is permitted to continue its work of espionage and sabotage behind the Allied armies. As far as the economic aspect of the argreement with Franco is concerned, the Russian publication, "Red Star," has expressed the point aptly: the agreement failed to include "iron ore, lead, copper, mercury, and other mineral products that Germany imports from Spain." There is only one safe outcome for our relations with Franco-to break them off, and immediately.

THEY DO SOME THINGS BETTER IN Hollywood than in Washington. Once a villain, in Hollywood, always a villain. The moviemakers know better than to confuse the customers by casting Boris Karloff, say, in the role of a good old family doctor. But the policymakers in Washington are seemingly incapable of such subtle psychology. Time after time they try to make us accept fascists as democrats, quislings as patriots, careerists as martyrs, and enemies as friends. We can be thankful that Elmer Davis, though he is no policymaker, has enough pride in his work to keep them from making some particularly bad blunders now and then. His latest public service along this line was his editing of a radio speech by John F. Montgomery, former Minister to Hungary, calling on the Hungarians to resist the Nazi forces of occupation. We were at war with the government of Regent Horthy for a long time before Hitler found him inefficient, but Mr. Montgomery was planning to tell the listeners to the illegal democratic radio that Horthy was a "great leader," that his government was democratic, and that anything they might hear to the contrary was "mendacious propaganda." He wanted to end his speech with the ringing words, "Back up the Regent!" Mr. Davis, who is responsible for broadcasts to enemy countries, naturally blue-penciled these baffling remarks. Mr. Montgomery then refused to speak at all. Since he is known in Hungary, it is probably just as well.

WE'VE NEVER BEEN RUN OVER BY A GALLUP poll. We've never been stopped by an inquiring reporter. We've never been chosen as "the man in the street." Nobody, you might say, ever asks us anything. We've sometimes felt slighted by this neglect. But we're just as glad we weren't caught by the questioners for the John B. Pierce Foundation which has recently published Volume IV of "Family Living as the Basis for Dwelling Design." "The ultimate objective of the housing research," we are told, "is to design dwellings on the basis of specifications arrived at as a result of scientific investigation." And one section of Volume IV, understandably enough, is devoted to The Bedroom. Most of the findings, and the questions they reflect, leave us relatively calm. We would certainly agree, for instance, that "the most important item in connection with sleep is the bed" (Page 26). We were mildly interested in knowing that "stumbling over bedroom furniture occurs among 23 per cent of the wives and 29 per cent of the husbands"—the awkward brutes. We were slightly alarmed to discover that 14 per cent of the wives reported that they had "slept with their head at the foot of the bed within the past week." "At the time this was done," adds the report with cold imperturbability, "we do not know whether the husband reversed his position too, or continued sleeping with his head at the head of the bed." But what really made us resolve never to be a "sample" were two questions which even the Pierce Foundation, in our opinion, has no right to ask. The first was "Have you fallen out of bed within the past year?" the second, "Did you wear bedroom slippers last night?" Only the Marx Brothers could answer those questions without incriminating themselves.

Prosperity Is Indivisible

IN ANY attempt to appraise the work of the twenty-sixth session of the International Labor Conference at Philadelphia, we must bear in mind the handicaps under which it labored. It met at a moment when the world was entirely preoccupied with thoughts of the impending invasion. The task of the delegates was to project their minds beyond the battle-lines to the time when bread and butter would be more important than cannon, but obviously D-day was constantly in their thoughts, as it was in those of their newspaper audiences.

Another difficulty was the somewhat anomalous nature of the International Labor Organization. In one sense its conference was a gathering of the United Nations, but with neutrals present it could not act as such. Moreover, one of the mightiest of the United Nations—Russia—was absent despite strenuous attempts by the Governing Body of the ILO to persuade Moscow to send a delegation. The Soviet government had several good reasons for abstention. It disliked the fact that the ILO was still organically part of the atrophied League of Nations, from which the U.S.S.R. was expelled in 1939. It objected to the participation of neutrals and particularly of countries like Argentina which lend both spiritual and material comfort to the enemy.

Yet if the Russian seats at Philadelphia were empty, Soviet influence was powerfully present. Unfortunately it was an influence largely of a negative kind, since it served to postpone action. Such questions as the rehabilitation of Germany, the protection of foreign workers transferred or deported by the Germans, and the future status and functions of the ILO itself were shelved partly on the plea that no decision could be reached without Russian participation.

Despite these obstacles, the conference was, we believe, more worth while than the newspaper accounts of its proceedings might appear to indicate. Couched as they are in officialese (Geneva dialect), the resolutions adopted seem at first reading to be rather unexciting catalogues of lofty ideals. The first resolution, for instance, the so-called Philadelphia Charter, sets forth the aim, purposes, and principles of the ILO in extremely large terms. It consists of five parts: 1. A reaffirmation of the fundamental principles on which the organization is founded: labor is not a commodity; freedom of expression and association are essential to progress; poverty anywhere is a danger to prosperity everywhere. 2. A social Bill of Rights which asserts that the central aim of national and international policy must be the creation of conditions under which all human beings can exercise the right to pursue their material well-being and spiritual development. It is the responsibility of the ILO to "examine and consider" all international economic policies in the light of this fundamental objective and to make appropriate recommendations, 3. An extensive program of economic welfare in which the first item is "full employment and the raising of standards of living." Among other provisions are recognition of the right of collective bargaining, social security, protection of the workers' health, assurance of equality of education and vocational opportunity. 4. A pledge that the ILO will cooperate with whatever international bodies may be intrusted with the tasks of promoting economic cooperation. 5. A declaration that, while the manner of the application of the principles set forth in the resolution must take into account the stage of social development reached by each people, they are fully applicable to all peoples everywhere.

The Philadelphia Charter, it will be agreed, is broad enough in its aspirations to satisfy almost any social idealist. But is it so broad as to run the danger of remaining a "paper" resolution which reactionaries can indorse without fear of being called upon to put its principles into practice? The very unanimity with which the delegates, representating the governments, workers, and employers of forty-one nations, voted for the charter might seem grounds for dismissing it as a purely pious declaration.

Nevertheless, at the risk of being labeled "starryeyed" we are prepared to maintain that the charter, and still more the discussions which preceded its adoption, represents a new point of departure in international cooperation. The war has brought home to all but the most opaque minds the fact that "peace is indivisible." The trend of thought at Philadelphia indicated a widening recognition of the equally important truth that prosperity is indivisible. Again and again in the course of the debate delegates stressed the interaction of national economic policies. A slump in one country, particularly if it is highly industrialized, is rapidly reflected in the economies of others. It follows that no one country can hope successfully to promote full employment while others are enforcing restrictionist measures. We can no longer claim that national economic policy is solely our business. It is everybody's business, and we, in turn, are concerned with the budgets voted by the British Parliament or the production decrees of the Supreme Soviet.

Planning for prosperity, therefore, must be undertaken internationally as well as nationally if we are to find a cure for the cruel spasms of alternating economic contraction and expansion. The ILO at Philadelphia has helped to turn men's thoughts in this direction; it needs no other justification.

Avery and the G.O.P.

C EWELL AVERY'S private war goes on. A substan-Utial majority of employees at his Chicago establishment have reaffirmed their allegiance to the C. I. O.'s Mail Order, Warehouse, and Retail Employees Union, but this clear-cut expression of opinion has in no way curbed Avery's anti-union crusade. In costly newspaper advertisements, prior to the election, Avery had piously declared he could not renew a maintenance-of-membership agreement until his employees had a chance to vote. Now they have had their chance, and Avery announces he will not sign a maintenance-of-membership contract under any circumstances, for reasons which he has outlined to the public on many previous occasions. The new declaration is a pretty pointed commentary on the sincerity of Ward's advertising campaign.

Meanwhile the scene of Avery's sitdown strike has shifted. The War Labor Board has certified to the White House a two-year-old conflict involving workers at the Hummer plant in Springfield, Illinois, a Ward subsidiary engaged in extensive war production. The pattern of the dispute is entirely similar to other Ward cases: the company has defied a unanimous WLB order; the workers, after an impressive display of patience and good faith, have finally struck. But the change in locale may be of vital importance. The editorial writers, columnists, and random orators who have invented rationalizations for Avery's conduct in Chicago—on the ground that no war production was involved—can no longer use this smoke screen. Hummer produces carburetors, propellers, gun mounts. The issue is reduced to unmistakable simplicity: can Avery wreck our war-time labor-relations machinery by a successful revolt against the WLB? Even Arthur Krock will find it difficult to show that the Hummer case is more complicated than this statement of it.

There may be divergent views as to the wisdom of the government's course in restoring the Chicago property to Avery before Judge Holley could render a decision on the legal questions involved in the seizure. We would have preferred to see a clear judicial verdict on the government action. But the important fact is that Avery and his associates have served notice they will not be swayed by the outcome of any NLRB election, and that their attitude toward the WLB is in no way affected by the extent to which one of their plants produces war materials. They have just begun to fight. The prospect of imminent European invasion has not diverted them from their major preoccupation-to drive unionism out of their business.

The far-reaching political implications of the battle are plain. The Chicago Tribune gaily informs us that a "prairie fire of indignation" is sweeping the country over the Chicago seizure. The photograph of Avery being transported out of the plant will be a major Republican document, the same journal reports. One year ago it was a Republican labor leader named John L. Lewis who was engaged in a nation-wide war against the Administration's labor program; now it is a Republican industrial baron who carries the banner of revolt. We suspect that this is the real clue to the duration of the fight. If it is humanly possible, Avery will prolong the shooting through the campaign months. The Administration has no choice except tough and resolute action. If Avery wins, labor's no-strike pledge is dead; the rebellion against the no-strike agreement at the Steel Workers' convention last week, quelled only after an extraordinary appeal by Philip Murray, reflects the mood of large groups of industrial workers. Unless Avery's revolt is crushed, labor disaffection may assume grave proportions. This fact is recognized by most government officials, and it is entirely possible that by the time The Nation is off the press the Hummer plant will be in government hands.

This time we hope Administration leaders will make a more serious attempt to tell the country the full story of Avery's war-time record. At his first press conference after his return to the capital, President Roosevelt complained that the press and radio had suppressed the essential facts of the Chicago controversy. As far as most influential organs of opinion are concerned, his charge seems eminently justified; certainly the climate of editorial opinion has been overwhelmingly favorable to Avery, but part of the blame for that result rests in Washington. Neither James F. Byrnes nor other high officials connected with the seizure intelligently utilized the available means of presenting the government's case to the public. Seemingly none of them realized the degree of confusion which would ensue; none of them took the elementary step of going on the radio to explain to the country that the seizure of a mail-order house did not mean the socialization of American society and the expropriation of victory gardens.

Not much reliance can be placed on the two Congressional committees named to investigate the Ward case; Senator McCarran, heading the Judiciary Committee probe, has already dispelled hope that his group will tell labor's side of the story and has indicated that the committee will stick to "legal" aspects of the seizure. Although the House committee is headed by able, progressive Robert Ramspeck of Georgia, the present temper of that body is not precisely sympathetic to labor or to the Administration. So we may expect a new rash of irresponsible doubletalk unless the Administration itself sets forth its case through every medium of opinion. The urgency of such action cannot be overestimated. For Avery is undoubtedly willing to lose half a dozen union elections if he can help the Republicans win the big propaganda war of 1944.

Thomas E. Dewey

BY I. F. STONE

Albany, May 11

LBANY fascinates me, but I can't say the same for Dewey. The capital of New York would in-A spire Dreiser and depress De Tocqueville, but its Governor is a Republican Presidential candidate, very standard model. I've waded through a foot-high pile of Dewey messages, speeches, and statements kindly supplied by his affable press secretary, James C. Hagerty. I listened to the Governor address the American Newspeper Publishers' meeting in New York and watched him being charming to the hopeful on the platform after it was over. I've read almost everything written about him, except the Rupert Hughes work, which seems to have confused him with George Washington and Lucky Luciano with a cherry tree. I've talked to people who work closely with him and to people who hate him, the latter being easy to find in Albany and New York, where Dewey has been seen in close-up. And all I can report is that for the first time since becoming a Washington correspondent and on one of the few occasions since I became a newspaperman, I found myself with an assignment that bored me.

On international affairs, Dewey might be Warren G. Harding, an internationalist but-. On domestic affairs, where straight Hooverism is no longer possible even for Republican, Dewey might be Alfred Landon, unalterably opposed to the New Deal, four square against its threat to the American way of life, but in agreement with its basic principles, though he thinks they are poorly administered. As a public figure, he is as familiar a type -the "clean-government" reformer who is death on all crooks except the really big and respectable ones of our society. As a man, he is competent, courageous, hardworking, but extraordinary only in his drive, his singleness of purpose, the intensity of his ambition. I don't think he is wicked, sinister, dishonest, or fascist, though I suppose he will have such epithets thrown at him when the campaign gets heated; I think he is a good American, very far removed from anti-democratic crackpots, racial bigots, and Bertie McCormicks. But the man is uninteresting because he presents no complexities, deviates in no way from type. I can see nothing but the commonplace in his mind. I sense no lift of idealism in his spirit; his motivations seem to me wholly self-seeking. And the personality is completely lacking in human checks with the reactions of people who are his friends as well as with those of his enemies. Dewey has been called "a boy scout," and he is one in the sense that he sees the problems of our society purely in the obvious and elementary terms of personal morality; I say obvious and elementary because he would not see the profounder immoralities in our customary ways of living and doing business. But he is not a boy scout in the sense that he would let a naive but praiseworthy and wholesome sense of duty stand in the way of personal aggrandizement. He chose the law as a profession because he thought it offered the prospect of greater and more secure financial rewards than singing; none of those who have written of him or who know him claim that he was attracted to the law as a useful way to spend one's life, or because he was inspired by the example of some great judge or advocate. There is nothing in him of the Galahad or the Quixote. His sensational splurge as prosecutor in New York was a quick stepping-stone to the Governorship, not the beginning of a job that he felt had to be completed in the interest of civic duty or clean government, and the Governorship is a stepping-stone to the Presidency. He is a kind of Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford in politics, a man who plays for the quick rise and the big profit. That the profit is in personal advancement rather than money is a detail, not an essential. Dewey's eye has always been on the headlines, not the stars. The men who worked with him as D. A. will tell you that the press was as constantly in their thoughts as the jury.

This may sound harsh and it may be unjust, but it is said only after much thought and consideration, and it

A certain humility makes a man lovable and marks him wise. Dewey reeks of self-assurance. You look at him on the platform and think of Browning's line, "A man's reach should exceed his grasp," but only because the two spring from such different worlds. It is only in the most superficial sense that Dewey would ever think of himself as unfit; he is said to be busy boning up on American history now in preparation for the Presidency. He would never think of himself as unworthy. Big men usually have a sense of fun. Roosevelt has it, Churchill has it, Lenin had it, so saintly a figure as Gandhi jokes and frolics. Dewey would never dream of making a joke at his own expense. His humor, or what passes for it, is heavy-footed, as when he referred to newsboys at the publishers' dinner in New York as "purveyors of your products." (I was there; I heard it.) He is not what we call a regular guy. There is nothing in him of Willkie's rich curiosity, human interest, or careless vitality. Dewey is small stuff and cold fish, handsomer and physically robust but really a good deal like Coolidge, frugal spiritually, a man who does not give himself freely.

I saw Dewey for the first time at the publishers' dinner, a trying event for most of those present because so many long-winded speakers preceded him, a trying occasion for him because Eric Johnston of the United States Chamber of Commerce tried to steal the show, and almost succeeded. Johnston's speech was the improvisation of a shrewd high-school boy, and I remember it chiefly for its gorgeously mixed metaphors, but it went over big with the publishers. Dewey seemed restive until his moment came. He went forward like a singer, chest out, enormously self-possessed. He sounded like a man who had studied with a first-rate elocutionist in a smallish town. One could have written a musical score for the speech. His gestures, the modulation of his voice, the measured emphasis and stress, were too perfect to be pleasant; the manner was conceited. When he praised Secretary of State Hull, it was with the gracious condescension that he might have used in patting a small boy on the head. The speech was expertly prepared and made Johnston's seem as amateurish as it was. Dewey gave an orotund solemnity to such hollow stuff as "When we have ceased to wage war, we shall have to wage peace," with the air of a man delivering an epigram.

In Albany I found those close to Dewey devoted to him. Four investigations are going here full blast, and the town is overrun with racket-busters who used to work for Dewey in New York. They like him, irrespective of political differences, for Dewey is competent, a good executive, and the young lawyer's ideal of a prosecutor. The young men in his immediate entourage are capable rather then brilliant, and already envisage themselves as the Harry Hopkinses and Louis Howes of the next Administration. It is a giddy thing to be on a Presidential band-wagon, and those few of them who have New Dealish backgrounds are rapidly throwing earlier ideas overboard as excess baggage. Even in this innermost circle one has the feeling that Dewey inspires fear and respect rather than affection. "He's very selfcentered and never seems interested in you personally," said one racket-buster reflectively in answer to a question. But outside the circle of Deweyites, one encounters only dislike of the Governor.

In part, this dislike is to Dewey's credit. The town is comfortably corrupt. So is the Legislature. The Governor's attack on the local O'Connell machine brought reprisal in the shape of an O'Connell investigation of the Republican Legislature. Dewey was forced to take the investigation over to protect his party, but the man he chose as special prosecutor, Hiram C. Todd, is forceful and independent, and there will be difficulty in keeping the investigation within safe bounds. Dewey started out to investigate favoritism in assessments in Albany, the payment of current expenses out of bond issues, and election frauds. He hoped to duplicate in Albany the success he had achieved as a gang-buster in New York and break the one important Democratic machine upstate. But an investigation of the Legislature, which has been Republican-controlled for many years, was not part of his original plan. The fears this investigation has aroused in his own party have served to make Republican legislators subservient to him, and he has ruled the Legislature like a little dictator. But the inquiry itself will not be allowed to go too far because it would hurt the Republicans more than the Democrats in an election year and would inevitably involve big money interests with which Dewey is himself allied.

To understand the political problems that confront Dewey in Albany, one must understand this old Dutch town at the head of navigation on the Hudson. It exhibits the slatternly side of the Democratic process. For the first twenty years of the century it was solidly Republican. During the past twenty years it has been as solidly Democratic. During both periods it has been corrupt, and during both the respectable elements have shared widely in the benefits of machine government. They resent these investigations. The Democratic era began with an alliance between Dan O'Connell, son of a saloon keeper, and the old-family owner of the Alleghany-Ludlum steel works. Albany's political revolutions have not been the result of uprisings by an outraged citizenry but of internal feuds in aging political machines. A legislative investigation before the last war plus some fiery attacks by Teddy Roosevelt upon the Barnes political machine only increased the Republican vote at the next election, and there are many people here who think local resentment will enable the O'Connells to pile up a larger majority than ever before. Dewey's unpopularity in Albany might cost him New York State and the Presidency.

From all I can see, the O'Connell machine is still united and vigorous. Unless Dewey can unearth evidence of some major crime, it is unlikely that he can shake its popular strength. But the O'Connell machine has been in power so long that it has been many years since any rough tactics were required to keep either its henchmen or the populace in line. Public standards are higher than they were a generation ago, and in some respects conditions under the O'Connell regime are better than under Barnes. The "Gut," Albany's old tenderloin, no longer flaunts its red-light section. The principal "crimes" Dewey has been able to lay at the door of the O'Connell machine are not of a kind to bring ordinary Albany citizens tumbling from their beds in alarm. "Bookmaking" establishments operate pretty openly. There are plenty of slot machines around. Saloons are open all night selling Hedrick beer, the O'Connell family brew. Election frauds seem to be common, but the O'Connells have so tight a grip on grand and petit jury lists that not much could be done about them.

Albany's city government seems to have been holding down its tax rate by paying current expenditures out of capital borrowings. Assessments seem to be adjusted to aid the deserving and teach the independents a lesson; Dan O'Connell's first political job was as tax assessor, a post he used to good advantage in building his machine. These are dishonest practices no one could wish to condone-except the property owners and lawyers who benefit by them, and their beneficiaries are many. We Americans are for clean government in theory and political favors in practice. This makes the Dewey type popular-at a distance. One of Dewey's advisers in Albany is a nice young Republican lawyer who represents large property interests through his father-in-law's estate, helps run a leading real-estate firm, and does a substantial volume of business representing the Republican minority which has to take its assessment appeals to the courts instead of to the district leader. Dewey assigned him to investigate assessments, and the investigation will make it easier for a time to be a Republican in Albany, but an assessments scandal will neither break the O'Connell machine nor make dramatic headlines elsewhere.

In part Albany's dislike for Dewey is mesult of his shortcomings as a person. Other Governors were gracious and became part of the life of the town. Mrs. Roosevelt and Mrs. Lehman lived, shopped, and entertained in Albany. Both were me familiar sight downtown. "Albanians," must hey call themselves, have the civic patriotism of a Greek city-state. "We never see Mrs. Dewey," they complain. Albany feels that Dewey is only me man on the make, hurrying through on his way somewhere else. It is contented in its corruption, thinks its civic misdeeds no worse than those of most cities, believes it is being smeared and sacrificed to provide a Dewey triumph, resents a certain ruthlessness and self-righteousness in the Governor's attitude toward it.

There are many complaints that Dewey is rude and standoffish in dealing with the townspeople. Lehman was chairman of Russian War Relief in Albany; as a matter of courtesy Dewey was invited to succeed him. The invitation went unanswered. The Inter-Racial Council runs a Booker T. Washington Center here. It held a musicale to raise funds. Tickets were sent the Governor. They were returned unacknowledged. The 4-H clubs held their annual meeting here. It is customary for Governors to address the meeting. Dewey refused because the Mayor of Albany had also been invited. He agreed to speak only when the Mayor withdrew. "He can't put his political ax aside for a moment," said one Albany newspaperman. Albany would agree with the irate Republican lady who once said, "You have to know Dewey to dislike him."

[In a later issue Mr. Stone will continue his discussion of Governor Dewey, with particular reference to his ideas on national and foreign issues.]

TVA on the Jordan

BY GEORGE W. NORRIS

THE TVA idea has gone round the world. Its fame has spread to every place where men have struggled with the problems of nature, for it is a blueprint turned into a reality. Actually, it is a very simple idea, based upon the principle of preserving the natural resources of the country.

Until the advent of the Tennessee Valley Authority men built dams upon streams almost solely to develop power, and the location of one dam had no relation to the location of any other on the same river system. The TVA considered a whole river system as a source of power, and prepared to develop it as a whole, not piecemeal. Before the TVA our fertile valleys were being ledeled of their soil and their natural fruits. Annual floods swept through them at terrible cost to life and property. Erosion was unchecked upon the hillsides, and the swollen rivers carried thousands of tons of top soil down to the sea. The dams built by the TVA prevented flood damage, and also kept open navigable channels.

A comparatively small additional sum enabled the Authority to utilize the waters impounded behind the great dams for the generation of huge amounts of electric power. This power has been carried into the homes of farmers and provided amenities they never knew before; it furnishes cheap electricity to city dwellers; and in factories and industrial plants throughout the South it is contributing mightily to the war effort and bringing prosperity to the people.

From the very beginning, as soon as the TVA revealed the tremendous scope of its plans, the project excited the curiosity and admiration of engineers and scientists the world over. Dr. Walter Clay Lowderrailk, eminent soil conservationist, scholar, and world traveler, was one who expressed his deep interest, and in 1938 the United States Department of Agriculture sent him to make a survey of the use of land in the Near East, in the interest of land conservation in the United States. Dr. Lowdermilk returned with a project for the reclamation of Palestine which he recently presented in book form under the title "Palestine, Land of Promise." He calls the project, which is modeled after the TVA, the Jordan Valley Authority. "The Tennessee Valley Authority," he says, "has set the pattern whereby agriculture, power, and manufacturing can be developed in a coordinated way in the highest interests of the people of a given area. And this pattern can be applied to Palestine."

Centuries ago Palestine was a prosperous country, covered with fertile fields and forests. Its fertility was destroyed by man's failure to conserve its natural resources. After Palestine was set aside as a Jewish homeland, it became a great experiment in reclamation. The Jews built cities and formed agricultural colonies and brought the soil back to abundant production. But the area of their efforts was necessarily limited, and vast stretches outside "the fertile crescent" lay untouched. "It is practically impossible," says Dr. Lowdermilk, "to estimate what the final absorptive capacity of Greater Palestine could be if all its unoccupied and underpopulated areas were rejuvenated by the same vigor and understanding love of the land as have characterized Jewish efforts on a tiny fraction of the land, and if such an allinclusive reclamation program as that of the IVA were put into effect."

Dr. Lowdermilk advocates a system of dams on the Jordan River and its tributaries to irrigate the arid lands of the Jordan Valley. He points out, too, that in the rush of the river down to the Dead Sea, more than a thousand feet below sea level, there are wonderful possibilities for the generation of hydroelectric power. Enough electricity, he says, can be developed upon the Jordan River and its tributaries to supply the entire country with an abundance of electric power for all purposes. But power and irrigation are only part of Dr. Lowdermilk's project, Like the TVA, the IVA would include water conservation and flood control among its activities. Supplementing the work of the Jewish Agency and the government, it would reforest lands unsuitable for farming or grazing and would undertake to extract important minerals from the Dead Sea on a far greater scale than is now being done.

This work would be extended into the Negeb, the south country, which has an area almost equal to that of the rest of Palestine, and into Trans-Jordania, transforming these regions from desolate wastes into thriving agricultural and industrial communities. The Jews, says Dr. Lowdermilk, who has become a convert to the idea that Palestine can be developed by the Jews as a national homeland, would be made the "custodians" of this work and directors of the Jordan Valley Authority under the United Nations. "If the forces of reclamation and progress that Jewish settlers have introduced," he says, "are permitted to continue, Palestine may well be the leaven that will transform other lands of the Near East. Once the great undeveloped resources of the countries are properly exploited, twenty to thirty million people may live decent and prosperous lives where a few million now struggle for a bare existence. Palestine can serve as the example, the demonstration, the lever, that will lift the entire Near East from its present desolate condition to a dignified place in a free world."

Other reclamation projects patterned after the TVA have been proposed, though none have been so carefully worked out as Dr. Lowdermilk's. Some time ago the president of the National Association of Manufacturers declared that we were not fighting this war to supply Hottentot babies with milk or to build a TVA on the Danube. He spoke derisively, implying contempt for the idea of the TVA, but the expression "TVA on the Danube" took hold, and many thoughtful progressives began to wonder whether the idea was not a good one. If the TVA could be developed here without regard to state lines, why could not Europe, the Near East, or any other region develop a TVA without regard to national boundaries?

The economic backwardness of the eight countries which form the Danube basin—Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Greece-does not derive from a lack of natural resources. The region has always had a great agricultural potential and rich mineral deposits, and in the Danube River it has a tremendous source of hydroelectric power. Its economic backwardness stems from a surplus farm population, causing overcrowding and a hunger for land, from neglect of scientific farming methods and a lack of working capital, and from the resulting low monetary vield. A program of industrialization such as a TVA on the Danube would make possible would absorb workers no longer needed on the farms and stimulate agricultural production. The political-economic structure of all these countries is based on the peasantry. Were the peasants granted the benefits which would flow from a great scientific project patterned after the TVA, who knows what the effect would be on the future peace of the world?

While the TVA idea reaches out to the Near East and Central Europe, opposition to it, strange as this may seem, is displayed in the land of its birth. This opposition comes primarily from the private power interests, properly known as the power trust, and is aroused by the generation and sale of hydroelectric power by the TVA. There would be little or no objection to the TVA if this aspect of the project had been turned over to private power interests. The power trust opposes the TVA because it interferes with its profits and with a monopolistic domination which extends over almost the entire United States.

The power trust has thrust a hand into every field of American politics. It is active in every election, whether it be that of a district school board, of members of Congress, or of a President of the United States. It has controlled and corrupted state legislatures the country over, and it has lobbied unceasingly for the passage of laws that would legalize its greedy claims and take from the people the control and management of the natural resources of their country.

Paradoxically, much of the opposition to the TVA has come from the South, which has derived the greatest benefit from its success. It is startling, indeed, that a Tennessee Senator is now fighting the completion of the TVA program, and with telling effect. I do not mean to charge that opponents of the TVA have always been moved by selfish considerations. Many opposition leaders in the Senate and House of Representatives have honestly believed that the national government should not go into the business of developing and transmitting electric power. But what other instrument would have been able to carry the project through? No state, no corporation organized by a state, could properly develop a system extending into many states. The only agency great enough to plan and implement such a development was either the national government itself or a corporation created by and representative of the national government. The government entered a field where no private corporation had ever ventured, where, from the very nature of things, no corporation could successfully venture.

The evil and dominating influence of the power trust made the TVA a necessity if we were to attain the happiness, comfort, and prosperity that can come from the preservation of our God-given gifts and from respect for the principle of the greatest good for the greatest number. The forces which seek the TVA's destruction must not be allowed to halt the tide of progress.

Polish American Politics

BY ERIC ESTORICK

Patther Orlemanski is no longer a little-known leader of the Polish American opposition to the Polish government in exile. His interviews with Stalin have lifted him from obscurity into the limelight and entitled him to speak with authority of the Soviet government's intentions toward Poland. If the message he brings, on the strength of two private conversations with Stalin—that the Kremlin desires an independent Poland and looks with friendliness on the Catholic church—attains any considerable degree of acceptance among American Poles, the congress of Polish American organizations to be held in Buffalo over the Memorial Day week-end will be troubled with grave doubts about its position.

The conference purports to be a meeting of American citizens of Polish origin to discuss American foreign policy as it affects Poland. But it will be used to bring pressure on Washington to support the Polish government in exile and oppose the Soviets in the Polish-Russian boundary dispute. No organizations or individuals who do not support the Polish government in exile have been invited to attend.

The anti-Soviet feeling among Polish Americans which will be expressed by the congress has been fomented for years by certain Polish leaders in this country. Chief among these is Ignacy Matuszewski, a brilliant writer and skilful politician who was Minister of Finance under Pilsudski. When Premier Sikorski, first head of the Polish government in exile, announced a policy of friendship and collaboration with the Soviet Union, Matuszewski launched a violent campaign against him in this country, using as his vehicles the principal Polish-language newspapers published here—among them, the Nowy Swiat of New York, the Dziennik Polski of Detroit, and the Dziennik Dla Wszystkick of Buffalo.

At first Matuszewski's flood of invective seemed to win little response. On the whole the Polish population here trusted Sikorski and respected his admonition—stated explicitly during his second visit to the United States in March, 1942—that the raising of issues with the U. S. S. R., especially the boundary question, should be avoided. However, by the time Sikorski arrived in the United States for his third visit in December, 1942, Matuszewski's counter-movement had definitely set in and Sikorski found himself on the defensive respecting Russia. Opposition had also developed in London, where anti-Russian campaigns were being carried on by Tadeusz Bielecki, an extreme rightist, in the monthly Mysl Polska, and by Stanislaw Mackewicz, formerly an editor in Vilna, who also contributed to the New York Nowy Swiat.

The death of Sikorski enabled the ultra-nationalists to gain dominance in the Polish government in exile; except for a few Socialists in the Cabinet, notably the Minister of Labor, Dr. Stanczyk, there was no one to raise an effective voice for a rapprochement with the Russians. Matuszewski, thereupon, ceased his attacks on the government, while continuing his denunciations of Soviet Russia. But long before this his fascist predilections had been apparent. I have in my possession photostatic copies of documents concerning him written in longhand by the Polish ambassador to the United States, Jan Ciechanowski, and his press attaché, Wladislaw Besterman, approximately two years ago, when General Sikorski was still alive. These documents declare that after Poland's defeat in September, 1939, Matuszewski "hoped to become a minister in the new Polish government but was so involved with the former regime and had been so close to fascist ideas that he could not be fitted into a government of national unity representative of all democratic parties. His rabid opposition to General Sikorski and his government then began."

Matuszewski and his group, according to Besterman, "definitely interfered in American affairs and disrupted American unity," tended to destroy Polish unity and to injure United Nations solidarity, showed "distinct fascist ideology," and "by publishing Hungarian anti-Czech newspapers worked for the disruption of Polish-Czech relations at a time when Poland and Czechoslovakia, after years of unpleasantness, had declared for confederation." According to the Polish ambassador, Matuszewski "financed between 1937 and 1939 the only openly fascist newspaper in Poland, the Jetro Polska."

For the last two years Matuszewski has been carrying on an unrelenting campaign not only against the Soviet government's course with respect to Poland but against all Russian culture. In direct opposition to official efforts by the United States to consolidate relations with the Soviets, the Polish press, for which he provides intellectual leadership, has proclaimed that collaboration is impossible, that the Russians are not Slavs but Mongols, and that Stalin intends to become the Red Czar of Europe. Matuszewski even went so far as to say in the pages of Nowy Swiat that, as a result of the alliance between Poland and Great Britain, in legal right a state of war now exists between Great Britain and Russia.

Recently Matuszewski addressed seven articles to American Poles under the sly title "Your Sweat." Pegged on lend-lease, the argument ran thus: Four per cent of lend-lease to Russia is the work of American Poles; Russia is set to destroy Poland; therefore American Poles on the production lines work and sweat only to enslave their relatives and destroy their homeland. Making use of Under Secretary of State Stettinius's book, "Lend-Lease—Weapon for Victory," Matuszewski asks American Poles if they are not forging a "weapon for defeat." He also asserts that President Roosevelt, in giving priority to the defeat of Germany and in making initial lend-lease shipments to Russia, "subordinated the needs of the country to the needs of a foreign nation."

Nor does he stop with Russia. He inveighs even against the British and of course against the Czechs and Benes. At the same time he enlists American Ukrainians and Lithuanians in the so-called common cause and throws out negative suggestions that the Germans, by comparison with the Russians, may not be so bad after all.

Matuszewski and M. F. Wegrznek, who is the publisher of Nowy Swiat and owner of Amerikai Magyar Nepszaram, a pro-Horthy Hungarian daily published in New York, founded the National Committee of Americans of Polish Descent (KNAPP) primarily as an instrument to embarrass the Sikorski regime. After Sikorski's death KNAPP succeeded in enlisting the support of many conservative and liberal elements in the Polish American community. Perhaps the most prominent was K. Rozmarek, who as president of the Polish National Alliance had originally supported Sikorski. The KNAPP was the chief group behind the call for the Buffalo congress.

A Chicago meeting which planned the congress declared that its object was to support the war against the enemies of democracy opposed to the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms, to work for the achievement of a just peace, and to help Poland, as represented by its legitimate government in London, safeguard the frontiers which are threatened today. It has been announced that the congress is to result in the creation of a central organization representing all American Poles—apparently American Poles not supporting the Polish government in exile will lose their status as American Poles!

The purpose of the congress was further elaborated by Mr. Rozmarek in a speech quoted by the Dziennik Zwiazkowy of March 9. All American Poles, he said, are unanimous in defense of Poland's claims, and the congress is to express that unanimity. In doing so it will try to bolster the claim of the London government to be the true representative of, and indeed the only spokesman for, the Poles now under German domination. Critics of the government in exile assert that there is no substantial evidence that the Poles beleaguered in their homeland look to London for their leadership.

Since the congress is timed to coincide with the deeper penetration of Russian forces into Poland and the possible opening of a second front, and will shortly precede the Democratic and Republican national conventions, it is clear that the main purpose of its sponsors is to stage a demonstration in support of the Polish government at a moment when that government may be confronted with a severe crisis. The planned appeal to Americans of non-Polish descent indicates that the congress will try to mobilize all public opinion in this country against Soviet Russia. It will directly propagandize other foreign elements dissatisfied with our present foreign policy—Hungarians, Slovak separatists, Croatian separatists, Serbian royalists, Finns, and Lithuanian, Latvian, and Estonian nationalists. The political intent of this propaganda is seen in a statement by Frank Januszewski, treasurer of KNAPP and publisher of the Dziennik Polski. The votes of Poles, Lithuanians, Estonians, Latvians, and Finns, he said, "will be directed against the Administration which sold these European countries to Soviet Russia."

Matuszewski, Wegrznek, and Januszewski, together with their allies in London, were specifically mentioned by the Russians as principal agents in building up the exasperation which finally led the Soviet government to break off relations with the Polish government on April 25, 1943. For a long time their inflammatory and subversive campaign aroused no adequate protest from Polish Americans or from others who knew of it. (Matuszewski, however, was obliged to register with the Department of Justice as a foreign agent.) Finally, the American Polish Labor Council; the Kosciusko League, led by Father Orlemanski; Professor Oscar Lange of the University of Chicago, a well-known Polish American Socialist; Dean Frank X. Swietlik of Marquette University, and a few other individuals realized that something must be done. They knew that some three million Poles were concentrated in key war cities-Chicago, Buffalo, New York-and working in essential war industries. They knew that these Polish workers had considerable influence with other Slavs in America, who constitute, it has been estimated, 50 per cent of the men employed in heavy industry. They saw that Matuszewski's campaign against Soviet Russia struck at the heart of America at war and must be offset; according to Leo Krzycki, president of the American Polish Labor Council and vice-president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the effect upon Polish labor has been marked: discontent and unrest have led to serious slowdowns.

The most important action taken so far to counteract the totalitarian tactics of the machine working for the Polish government in exile has been the muchpublicized trip to Moscow of Father Orlemanski and Professor Lange. The KNAPP has tried to convince people that both men are anti-Christians, Communists, and stooges of the Kremlin, but there is evidence that the rank and file of American Polish workers, practically all of whom are trade unionists, do not accept the Matuszewski line. The Kosciusko League desires an independent Poland, respecting the legitimate claims of Ukrainians and White Russians, and does not regard the 1939 Polish-Russian boundary as inviolable. The number of workers who have recently joined the league certainly contradicts the claims of the congress to represent all Americans of Polish descent.

A LONDON AIR-RAID WARDEN, surveying a recent night's bomb damage, was surprised to hear organ music—Handel—issuing from the smoldering ruins of a large church. The organist looked around and explained that this was the only way he could get the water out of the pipes. He was playing Handel's Water Music.

The Tasks Ahead in France

BY JULES MOCH

BOTH the French Committee of National Liberation and the Consultative Assembly in Algiers are studying the problems of economic reconstruction that will face the government of liberated France. Eventually the entire economy of the country, as indeed of all Europe, must be rebuilt, but the two most pressing needs will be to resettle the millions who have been driven from their homes or deported and to provide food for the starving people.

The population of metropolitan France before the war was about 40,000,000. Of this number one in seven has been uprooted; one in ten has been deported to Germany. According to reliable statistics, 850,000 Frenchmen are still held as prisoners of war-four years after the capitulation at Bordeaux, which was supposed to assure their speedy repatriation. Another 350,000 ex-soldiers have been impressed into the service of the enemy as laborers. and 900,000 French workers have been deported to Germany as "volunteers" or under the man-power levy. Some 60,000 more men and women, classified as Jews or resistants, have been removed from the country to an unknown fate. Men of Alsace and Lorraine to the number of 180,000 have been drafted into the German army as German subjects and sent to the eastern front. Finally, many thousands of patriots have fled to Africa or England, either to escape persecution or to serve with the Fighting French forces. In all, therefore, nearly 3,500,000 Frenchmen must be repatriated.

But even this figure does not tell the whole story. More than 1,500,000 people have had to leave their homes in the border regions and go to central and southern France. At least 50,000 were evacuated from the frontier zone by the French government in 1939, 180,000 refugees from the battle areas joined them, and 80,000 residents of Alsace and Lorraine were transferred to the interior by the Germans. Another million were recently ordered out of the coastal region by the German High Command, and the number grows daily. Some 100,000 men have been forcibly enrolled in the so-called Todt organization and sent to work on fortifications, and at least another 100,000 young Frenchmen have taken to the maquis. In one way or another, then, more than 5,000,000 people have been uprooted in France alone.

These millions must be returned to their homes, and at the same time almost a million foreigners now living in France must be sent back where they came from. At least 500,000 Germans have "colonized" the frontier departments, to escape the bombings at home and to "justify" the annexations proclaimed by Hitler; others are scattered through the rest of the country. Also, between 1940 and 1943 some 150,000 Italians settled in Savoy and the other provinces claimed by Mussolini.

Similar mass deportations and migrations have occurred in Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, Norway, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Greece, and Yugoslavia. If we add the slave laborers brought to Germany from the Axis satellites and the prisoners taken in Russia, we get a total of probably 30,000,000 people who must be moved—east, west, north, south—across Europe.

How is this to be done; how organize the transportation of these millions of men, whose only desire will be to flee headlong from the hell in which they have been living? None will want to wait, not for a day. From all the camps and factories of Germany long lines of haggard men will start toward the frontiers of their homelands. How will they live on their weary march? The first punishment of Hitler's Germany will come from the columns of deportees turned conquerors.

At the frontiers or in occupied territory close to the frontiers it will be necessary to establish temporary rehabilitation centers for feeding, clothing, and supplying medical care to the returning men. Barracks will be required to shelter them. Bureaus will have to be set up to help them find their families; for the families themselves in many cases will have been evacuated from their old homes. The returning men will not tolerate red tape and delay. But the Algiers government has not even a complete record of the German camps and factories where Frenchmen are held and therefore cannot tell at what points along the frontier the columns will converge.

In order to be prepared to cope with the whole repatriation problem the French Committee of National Liberation has set up a special ministry to study it—the Commissariat for Prisoners and Deportees—and has named M. Fresnay, leader of one of the strongest resistance groups in France, as its head.

The other most urgent task before us—providing food for the French people—presents equally staggering difficulties. The returning French will find a country stripped bare of food. Stockpiles have long since disappeared. There will be no wheat unless the liberating forces reach the productive regions at or before harvest time; no wine unless the landing is made in the south. Most if not all of the livestock has already been seized by the enemy. There will be no fats, oil, or soap. Transportation will be hopelessly disorganized.

Down with Badoglio!

The anti-Fascist militants who still live in an atmosphere of battle in northern Italy cannot forget that Badoglio was the general of the Ethiopian campaign, the attack on France, and the ruinous acquiescence in the German occupation in September, 1943. Although today the Allies consider him the most suitable collaborator, and the anti-Fascist parties, who cannot estrange themselves from what goes on in Italy, agree to work with him, militant patriots who offer their lives for their country cannot forget his misdeeds.—From a Milan dispatch in the Swiss paper Libera Stampa.

It is clear, therefore, that the food requirements of large percentage of the population will have to be brought in from abroad. What will this mean? Suppose for the moment that food from outside will be needed for only one-seventh of the population. Even that would call for a million tons a month, the cargo of a hundred Liberty ships. Powerful Allied organizations will help, to be sure. The U. N. R. R. A. has been set up for the purpose. The Allies are building up stockpiles of food. A French minister, M. Monnet, has been assigned to work in the United States with American officials. But the U. N. R. R. A. will not establish itself in any area until the Allied army holds the upper hand there. And if the Germans put up a desperate resistance on our soil or at the frontier, ships needed to bring in civilian supplies will be diverted to military demands. Allied trucks moving from the ports to the interior will carry ammunition, not bread.

The Algiers committee, therefore, wishes to have its own stockpiles and shipping with which to supply the French people. It wants to form stockpiles as near as possible to France-in Corsica, Algeria, England-and to acquire ships, however small their tonnage, which will be able to make frequent trips along the French coast carrying food, clothing, and medical supplies. Efforts in this direction have thus far had little success. The committee has been able to build up some reserves of fats in Senegal, of olive oil in Tunisia, of sugar in Réunion. But it has no ships. For those which slipped out of German-held France or were seized by the Allies in Allied ports or North Africa have been placed in an inter-Allied pool and are carrying munitions to Italy or troops to Great Britain. Even the little wheat reserve built up by the French in Algeria for aid to France was sent to Italy to feed the starving civilians there.

The French people inside France who consider the Algiers government their government expect it to look out for them. If the National Committee accepts this responsibility, it must have the material means of fulfilling its obligations. We have seen that the scant resources of the National Committee, as in the case of the merchant marine and the wheat stock, may be diverted to military needs in the common interest of the United Nations. France will need much help from the Allies, but what it receives will have been partially paid for in advance by the diversion of the French fleet and of French colonial products.

Aid to France should not be administered for any long period by the Allied armies or the U. N. R. R. A. The French merchant marine should be assigned the task of transporting foodstuffs; the colonies and overseas France should grow what cannot be raised at home. Allied aid must be immediate, but it need be only temporary.

[In a second article M. Moch will discuss the problems of employment and industrial reconstruction that the French government will face.]

Poland's Frontier Claims

BY JERZY NEYMAN

SINCE the dispute about the future Polish-Russian frontier is still in progress, Nation readers may be interested in some relevant documentary material taken from the "Statistical Yearbook" issued by the Bureau of Statistics of the Republic of Poland. The map reproduced here is from the 1939 edition of the "Yearbook." It shows the sixteen administrative districts, or voievodships, into which Poland was divided. The figures on the map give the percentage of the population of each district whose mother tongue was Polish as declared in the general census of 1931. Published by a Polish government agency before the war, these figures can hardly be suspected of m is representing the situation in the interest of a foreign power. They may be presumed rather to exaggerate the number of Poles in the eastern and southern districts, since the non-Polish population there was notoriously subject to persecution and the admission that one's mother tongue was not Polish required a certain amount of courage. It will be seen that in the three districts in the southeastern corner of Poland the percentage of people speaking Polish at home is less than 50 per cent. In two others on the eastern border the percentages are only 16.6 and 14.5.

On the other hand, in the districts adjoining Germany, including the "corridor," the density of Polish-speaking people is very high. The percentages are the more remarkable because the pro-German policy of the government at that time relieved the German inhabitants of any compulsion to pose as Poles.

Cultural affiliations are frequently mentioned in the dispute over the eastern provinces, and I believe that the cultural unity or lack of unity of border provinces is a valid argument for territorial adjustments between neighboring countries. No cultural ties exist between the Poles and the inhabitants of the eastern border region of pre-war Poland. Moreover, no serious efforts were ever made by the government to develop such ties. On the contrary, the eastern provinces were treated largely as colonies; schools were few and unsatisfactory, and no improvement of living conditions was attempted. This policy resulted in appalling illiteracy among the population, in poverty and filth in the villages, revolts and assassinations in the cities.

One must conclude that Polish claims in the west are better justified than those in the east.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ALL newspapers in the Königsberg district carried on April 20 the following announcement by the head of the criminal police (Kriminal policeitstelle):

It has been repeatedly noticed of late that people who want to go into hiding temporarily or indefinitely find asylum in private homes and thus evade police control. Tenants of private apartments who furnish lodgings to strangers without immediately registering them with the police as required by the Reich Registration Act incur the risk of severe punishment, since persons who do not wish to be registered are often criminals wanted by the police. Tenants found guilty of an offense against the above act will moreover be subjected to permanent police supervision.

This column has frequently spoken of the growing number of Germans who "disappear" and afterward live in hiding, officially non-existent and hence without official income or ration cards. The warning by the Königsberg police is one more sign that a maquis flourishes also in Germany.

To a greater or less degree all countries at war are acquainted with the phenomenon of black markets for certain commodities. Germany even has a black market now in services. This has arisen as a result of the attempt of the Nazi authorities to ration the work of the few artisans who are left. Direct contracting between artisans and the public is being forbidden in one city after another. People who want any kind of repairs made must apply to an official agency, which will investigate their necessity and then give out the job. In consequence mechanics are taking black-market work in their free time-especially after air raids. It is reported that they do not charge more money for this forbidden and risky work but ask instead to be paid in goods. The customary rates for certain jobs are given in the Stockholm Arbetaren for April 15. For repairing a roof, for example, the charge is a dozen eggs or a pound of butter; for putting new glass in a window, two pounds of meat or twenty cigarettes; for repairing a slightly damaged wall, one medium-sized sausage.

Private housekeeping is dying out in Germany and is being replaced by communal meals. A dispatch from Berlin published in the Swedish paper Vestmanlands Laens Tidning of April 28 says that at least 26,000,000 people eat their principal meal or all their meals in some 25,000 communal dining-halls, camp kitchens, factory canteens, and the like. They have to give ration points for these meals, but they are spared the immense difficulties and loss of time connected with marketing.

Yet the public kitchens themselves do not always function smoothly. The failure of the potato crop, in particular, was a calamity for them as for private housekeepers. In the late summer of 1943 these kitchens, like every family in the country, were asked to lay in a supply of potatoes which, reckoned very exactly, so many per person, would last until April 30, 1944. During the winter, however, the shortage was discovered to be much greater than had been anticipated, and a new decree declared that stocks must be made to last three months longer, until July 31. The public kitchens have addressed earnest appeals to the authorities for a supplementary allotment, but the Reich Food Ministry recently refused once and for all to grant them any relief. The Völkischer Beobachter for April 24 commented on this decision as follows: "Those who have prematurely consumed the potatoes allotted to them have no claim to new supplies. The decree, therefore, denies all applications made by communal kitchens, factory canteens, and the like." An ingenious way out of the difficulty-for the kitchens-was suggested. "We have been informed," the Beobachter said, that "the arrangement by which employees bring their own potatoes to factory canteens has worked out very well." In other words, the unhappy individual is again asked to shoulder the burden. The public kitchens were organized to relieve people of marketing cares. Now the kitchens say, "You get the food and we will cook it for you."

Great Books and Scientific Method

PAIDEIA: THE IDEALS OF GREEK CULTURE. Volumes II and III. By Werner Jaeger. Translated by Gilbert Highet. Oxford University Press. $3.75 Each; Three Volumes, $10.

S A manifestation of post-war planning, educational controversy at the moment is at a peak of intensity which has not been equaled since the years following World War I. Since this controversy often takes the form of a dog fight between the partisans of the Great Books and the partisans of Scientific Method, it is valuable to have an authoritative account of the educational enterprise of the Greeks, who both invented Scientific Method and wrote . good share of the Great Books. They were also the people who, as Professor Jaeger argues, most persistently related all of their activities, from the moment when they began to be articulate, to the central aim of creating a higher type of human nature. This aim, inadequately expressed either by our word education or by our word culture, or by the two in combination, gave content to the term paideia. Its original meaning of child-rearing was expanded to designate the whole effort to shape the life of man, individual and social, from eugenic selection and pre-natal care to the guidance of the adult by politics, art, and religion; and it was conceived as the responsibility not of a few professional educators but of the entire community.

There is a recurrent disposition, shown particularly today by some of the proponents of the Great Books, to take the ideas of the Greeks as timeless verities which can be studied outside of their historical context. Although this approach is not without a measure of justification as a reaction against that type of historicism which is concerned with the conditions under which ideas occur, to the exclusion of questions of their truth or falsity and hence of their application, such is not Jaeger's procedure. If the Greeks sought an educational ideal that would be universally valid, this was not in fact, he insists, "an empty abstract pattern, existing outside time and space. It was the living ideal which had grown up in the very soil of Greece, and changed with the changing fortunes of the race, assimilating every stage of its historical development." The historical approach can be, and too often has been in our educational institutions during the past century, a vast quicksand which swallows up the very urge of paideia itself—the urge to turn all knowledge to the delight and ennoblement of man. But before ideas can be applied they must be understood, and this can occur only with some perception of the problems they were intended to solve and of their consequences in action. It would seem to follow for our own educational effort that the historical approach is neither something to be avoided nor a resting place, but something to be worked through. In practice, this might mean that our students would profit less from the inclusion in the curriculum of twenty Greek classics than from reading seventeen of them together with three volumes like those of Jaeger's, or ten classics plus "Paideia" plus seven books, not all of them necessarily destined for immortality, about analogous problems of our own culture. The students would then be better fitted, and perhaps also more eager, to go on and read the remaining classics for themselves.

The first volume of "Paideia," which appeared in German in 1933 and in Gilbert Highet's excellent translation six years later, traced the development of Greek education to the end of the fifth century. During this period it was largely the poets who were the acknowledged educators of mankind, and Solon and a few others were its legislators as well. The aristocratic ethos found its first clear image in Homer, and its first great critic in Hesiod, who with his advocacy of social justice played something of the same role for the Greek moral consciousness as the prophets for the Hebraic. With Tyrtaeus and Solon, Sparta and Athens began to define their respective national ideals. If such poets as Pindar and Theognis were reactionaries yearning for the restoration of aristocratic society, they succeeded in educating the new middle classes in some of the heroic virtues. It was the Ionian and Aeolian poets, and later Euripides, who gave expression to the rising individualism and made the Greeks aware of the nuances of personal emotion and the inner life. Aeschylus adapted myth to the presentation of the religious, ethical, and social preoccupations of the Periclean Age, and Sophocles turned it to the acquisition of self-knowledge. With Aristophanes the comic mask expressed an educational energy which turned its searchlight of criticism on matters topical and perennial.

Volumes II and III deal with the maturity of Greek educational thought in the age of Plato, and bring Jaeger's project to a conclusion, since he holds that the fundamental ideas had all been stated by this time, and that the Hellenistic age, of which he conceives Aristotle to have been the chief spokesman, did little more than elaborate tendencies already at work, and showed a decline in the intensity of the ideals themselves. Even before the fourth century the Sophists and Thucydides had attempted to develop the insights of the poets into a theory of paideia. From then on the ideals of Greek culture were articulated chiefly by prose writers—the philosophers, scientists, and rhetoricians.

Although the Sophists first spread the idea that virtue should be founded on knowledge, Socrates and his followers insisted that the core of this knowledge should be ethical wisdom, and that "care of the soul"—which Socrates understood primarily in humanistic rather than supernatural terms—was the most important business in life. In commenting on the two chief schools of thought about Socrates, Jaeger supports the moderate thesis that Socrates was neither a mere speculative philosopher nor a mere hero of the moral life, but that his person "united the contradictions which even then or soon after his death fell apart." These com-

The men can write of America's newspapers and newspaper history with as much authority as Mr. Villard. For twentyone years the managing owner and editor of the historic New York Evening Post, and later the publisher and editor of the Nation, he has been a lifelong student of journalism. In The Disappearing Daily he analyzes America's outstanding newspapers and newspaper men in terms of their specific achievements.

Here are set down his mature views of the great newspapers, publishers, and editors of the past and present, with particular emphasis on present-day practices and tendencies. He discusses the columnists, the Associated Press, the present peculiarities of the Scripps-Howard and Gannett chains, the new Marshall Field enterprises, the relations between the press and the President, and the real meaning and responsibilities of the freedom of the press. This timely analysis is set against a solid background of such historical figures as Watterson, Pulitzer, Munsey, Curtis, Godkin, and others. The result is not only the most important but certainly also the most interesting book on the American press that has appeared in a long time.

ponents of the Socratic paideia continued, however, to be held in solution by Plato, who not only founded the first university and made the first plea for state-supported education in Athens but wrote his dialogues in pedagogical form and devoted his two greatest works, the "Republic" and the "Laws," to the development of an educational system. The "Laws," the work of Plato's old age, tried to construct in detail a life-long educational program for every member of the community, while it reserved the more exacting training for an aristocracy of ability.

Although the larger part of the new volumes is devoted to an exposition of Plato, Jaeger also treats fully the rhetoricians Isocrates and Demosthenes, who as the first great publicists took as their aim the political education of the adult community, and he includes a study of Greek medicine, which was the first science to use precise methods of empirical observation and which, in accordance with the Greek emphasis on the harmony of soul and body, was conceived not as an esoteric specialty but as a part of general culture, prescribing for the individual a regimen that was preventive as well as curative. Particularly valuable is Jaeger's discussion of his thesis that the physicians' conception of a single "form" of disease underlying the multiplicity of symptoms was a shaping influence on the Platonic doctrine of Ideas, and of equal importance with mathematics as a key to the understanding of that doctrine.

Jaeger is committed to writing "objective" history in one of the better senses of that term, and he does not, like many classical scholars, draw easy and oversimplified parallels between ancient times and our own. Yet the problems of the Greek city-states in the fourth century have so many points of contact with those of our civilization today that more than an antiquarian interest attaches to his treatment of the struggle between Athenian democracy and Spartan totalitarianism—where he argues that the "Spartanizing" tendencies of Plato have been vastly exaggerated by his interpreters—and of the failure of the Greek educational effort to meet the demands of democracy and internationalism.

The scope of "Paideia" is so wide that criticism of it for incompleteness may seem ungrateful. Yet it does neglect some important factors in the development of Greek ideals about which we should like to be informed. Greek literature is examined almost entirely for the ideas it contains, and for its moral meanings in a narrow, if not the narrowest, sense. There is almost no discussion of its aesthetic qualities, or of the cultural influence of the non-literary arts. Although more space is devoted to the scientists than one customarily expects from a humanistic scholar, Plato's proclamation of the ideal of formal or deductive science in Book VI of the "Republic" is treated superficially, and the "critical" dialogues in which he developed his methodology and his theories of knowledge and reality are ignored entirely. Such matters were considered by Plato to be absolutely central to his educational program; they had a profound influence on the world view of the Renaissance; and, as Whitehead among others has argued, they have come to full fruition only in the logical and metaphysical researches of our own time. The political aspects of Greek paideia are treated in much closer connection with economic and

From 1919 to 1932 the author was a member of the German Reichstag and for two years was a member of the Bruening Cabinet, which put him in close touch with the relations of the German Republic to Russia.

Why is Russia's history pock-marked with revolutions like a periodic red rash? What yeast springing out of the life on the soil has been and still is fermenting the peasants to formidable resistance to change and to authority? Why are up-risings endemic in this strange land and the key to its destiny? In this book's answers to these questions is genuine and full understanding of our ally.

- 2. It supplies an incisive appraisal of the great personages of yesterday and today.
- 3. It condenses the fascinating story of modern
- 4. It presents the key to Russia's problems of the future.
- 5. It deflates many popular misconceptions about Bolshevism and Communism in Russia.

social factors in the first volume than in the subsequent ones. But all these are points on which Jaeger can be supplemented by other writers, and they will not prevent "Paideia" from standing with such works as Zimmen's "Greek Comonowealth," Murray's "Five Stages of Greek Religion," and Bowra's "Greek Lyric Poetry" among the books which most successfully make Greek life and thought accessible to moderns.

Twice-Told Tales

TELL THE FOLKS BACK HOME. By Senator James M. Mead. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.

THEN THERE WAS ONE: THE U.S.S. ENTERPRISE AND THE FIRST YEAR OF WAR. By Eugene Burns. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THIS reviewer knows an able war correspondent who returned from the front and rejected offers to write a war book on the ground that he didn't have anything much to say that hadn't already been said. He is a rare character. The fact is that there is a spate of overlapping war books which must be as tedious to the public as to the reviewers. Much good white paper could be saved if war authors read one another's works or if publishers were vigilant editors. Many of the current war books might turn out to make good Talk of the Town pieces for the New Yorker.

It is regrettable to have to cite as a prize example of repetition Senator Mead's account of his trip around the world's battlefronts with four other Senators. Surely he must have learned more on that journey than he tells in the book, for he could have learned almost everything he tells by staying home and reading books written previously. For instance, it is galling to come once again across the crack which the Aussie made to the Yank about his being a fugitive from Pearl Harbor; this was mildly amusing when John Lardner recounted it more than a year ago, but the mirth has long since been drained out by subsequent retelling. It is wearisome, too, to learn again that the Arabs smell bad; to be told how funny it is to have two Mondays when crossing the international date line; or how odd the New Guinea natives look after chewing betel nuts. Senator Mead even follows the Gunther-Reynolds tradition of telling what he ate here and there around the world-information of little interest to any stomach but his own.

To be sure, there are patches in Senator Mead's book which contain fresh, interesting information—notably his vivid account of the fam'ne conditions in Calcutta. On the whole, however, his work can be recommended most enthusiastically to those who have read no other war book, and then only if the prospective readers don't mind the Senator's style of dictation, which betrays his fondness for Time.

In "Then There Was One," Eugene Burns has written an able, if not very distinguished, history of the aircraft carrier Enterprise from Pearl Harbor through Midway and the Solomons up to June, 1943. This particular kind of reporting job has not been done before. Nevertheless, it just Mr. Burns's hard luck that the public already has heard about aircraft carriers in "Queen of the Flattops," "Torpedo 8," and sections of several other works.

The two books here mentioned just happen to furnish the text for this crotchety sermon. There are all too many which are worse. Would it be too much to hope that publishers gradually will become more hesitant about printing war books unless they contain a generous amount of new information or a fresh interpretation of human behavior in the midst of cataclysm? # Our Foreign Policy

A MODERN FOREIGN POLICY FOR THE UNITED STATES. By Joseph Jones, The Macmillan Company. $1.35.

HIS book, consisting of three articles from Fortune and a brief postscript, reviews the well-known weaknesses of the United States State Department and emphasizes the urgency of reforms. America must accept more responsibility, says Mr. Jones, for the world's peace and prosperity. To this end, he continues, "it is imperative that we develop a new responsibility in the conduct of 'foreign affairs' (a) of the Executive toward the Congress and the people, (b) of the Congress toward the Executive and the people, (c) of the people toward the Congress and the Executive, and (d) of this government toward foreign governments."

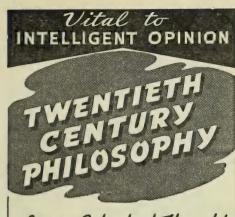

Mr. Jones, unfortunately, seems more excited about a and d than about b and c. The latter are fully as important. And it is especially imperative now that the Administration's opponents, in Congress and on the campaign rostrums, accept their share of responsibility. The doubletalk of the men now most prominent in the Republican Party is even more shocking than the failures of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull.

Quite rightly, Mr. Jones observes that "as national sovereignty crumbles, vast areas of national affairs automatically become international affairs." He seems more impatient, however, with those leaders who have shown some awareness of this than with those who have shown virtually none. VOLTA TORREY

The Elizabethan View

THE ELIZABETHAN WORLD PICTURE. By E. M. W. Tillyard. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

THE commonplace notions and basic assumptions of an age, those elements which determine the form of literature as well as of a society, are difficult to isolate since they are seldom explicitly stated in writing that endures. Dr. Tillyard's method is to examine the ordinary beliefs forming the Elizabethan's world picture. Through an analysis of the manifold relationships between the various components of the Elizabethan "chain of being," from God and the celestial orders to the natural forces, man, and the animal and plant worlds, and through an exposition of the complex correspondences, physical, ethical, philosophical, deriving from them, Dr. Tillyard finds that the Elizabethan notion of the cosmos was still solidly theocentric. It was a simplified version of the hierarchical order of the Middle Ages. Although the main outline of the medieval pattern still held firm, the details underwent an "agile transition from abstract to concrete, from ideal to real, from sacred to profane" which made them capable of a freely imaginative and metaphoxical treatment. Thus within the frame of the undisputed fundamental pattern all the intensities and extremes of contemporary thought and feeling could be meaningfully expressed.

Dr. Tillyard has written an informative and exciting book. It clarifies many puzzling Elizabethan concepts and is particularly valuable for the explanation it offers of the characteristically metaphorical language, which cannot be accounted for solely from a philological standpoint. Illustrations are drawn from Raleigh, Spenser, Shakespeare, Hooker, and Donne, and from Milton, who is rightly considered the last great exponent of the Elizabethan tradition.

Fiction in Review

AFTER finishing Anna Seghers's new novel, "Transit" (Little, Brown, $2.50), I thought I had better read "The Seventh Cross," Miss Seghers's previous novel which was so well received when it appeared in 1942. It seemed to me impossible that a book of the quality of "Transit" could have followed a book worthy of the critical acclaim that greeted the earlier novel. Either Miss Seghers's abilities had considerably diminished between books or "The Seventh Cross" had been considerably misjudged.

But it turns out that neither of these conjectures was entirely correct; or rather that both are in some part correct. "The Seventh Cross" is certainly a better book than "Transit"; yet the connection between them is not too remote. And "The Seventh Cross" was, I think, overpraised, but not un-understandably; perhaps I too would have been more impressed by it if I had read it before instead of after "Transit."

With "Transit" in mind, however, Miss Seghers's earlier novel strikes me as one of those novels which flowered because the soil in which it was planted was so richly prepared. We all like nothing better than to witness a defeat of Nazism, and Miss Seghers's intensely dramatic narrative of an escape from a concentration camp excited all our ready and strong emotions. Because in his flight the hero of "The Seventh Cross" moves through a varied landscape and touches many people's lives, we were quick to translate what is only a varied experience of suspense into a deep and various human experience. Because Miss Seghers's courageous hero pits himself alone against large hostile forces, we accepted the illusion that the author was herself grappling with large literary materials. But actually "The Seventh Cross" is only an adventure story on an unusually high level. and it occurs to me that if we were to change the political allegiance of its hero-as, say, in the movie "The Invaders" -the story would be equally exciting, although there would then be no temptation to read into it artistic significances beyond those it really achieves. What I mean is that from literary point of view "The Seventh Cross" very much trades on the advantage of our political sympathies.

Of course this is no a priori fault in a novel; it is simply something we must take into account in judging it. And similarly we must take into account the possible disadvantage of writing to an already prepared audience. In "Transit" Miss Seghers suffers from being out of line with our established feelings. She is writing about refugees; and precisely in the degree that we have strong emotions against Nazism, most of us have strong emotions of sympathy toward the people whom Nazism has made homeless wanderers. But Miss Seghers deals with refugees so unsympathetically that at least one reader's sentiments were deeply violated.

Technically, "Transit" is even more skilful than "The Seventh Cross," if only because it is more closely knit. It is the story of a young man-the narrator-who escapes from French labor camp before the German occupation and makes his way to Paris and then to Marseilles. In Paris he accidentally comes into possession of the papers of a German writer named Weidel, who has committed suicide, and in Marseilles he falls in love with Weidel's beautiful wife. Like all the refugees crowding Marseilles, Mme Weidel and the doctor-lover with whom she is traveling are caught in the terrible maze of transit visas, exit visas, and steamship accommodations, and it develops that the narrator, by using his false identity, can expedite Mme Weidel's departure. But he is infatuated with her and wants to keep her near him. Since he doesn't learn until very near the close of the book what the reader has guessed all alongthat although Mme Weidel has been estranged from her husband, she still loves him-he feels no scruples about encouraging the delaying action which Mme Weidel is herself playing against the moment when she must depart with the doctor. Although the woman he is supposed to love roams the streets and cafes frantically searching for her husband, the narrator never confesses to her that Weidel is really dead and that it is only his own use of Weidel's papers that has spread the report that Weidel is in Marseilles. And even at the end, when he has learned that she still loves her husband, he lets her leave believing that she is about to be reunited with her husband on board ship.

This is the plot of Miss Seghers's new book, and to me it is a cruel joke of m plot. And if "Transit" is more than its plot, I fail to recognize it—unless, indeed, the "more" is the embroidery of scenes among Miss Seghers's subsidiary characters. The subsidiary characters are the refugees whom the narrator meets daily in the cafes and consulates and steamship offices; I can only describe the author's treatment of them as something between ironic superiority and a sneer. The narrator himself, it is pointed out, has no desire to get out of the country. His willingness to remain in France is given no political purpose, but it is shown to be a kind of affirmation of life in contrast to which the effort at departure of the other refugees is m weakness or a negation. This is m new and unpleasant slant on the people who fled Europe.

I have said that the connection between Miss Seghers's first and second novels is not too remote. It must be traced, I think, through Miss Seghers's political point of view. In "The Seventh Cross" the author frankly expresses her Communist sympathies, but although "Transit" has no such open political bias, it is profoundly rooted in a Communist philosophy of means justifying ends. The "end" in "Transit" is no longer political, it is personal; the hero, however, pursues his love, as he would no doubt pursue his political objective, with ruthlessness, cunning, and small regard for truth-and this despite the fact that his author thinks of him as a good person. Miss Seghers's novel, in other words, can be read as a rather frightening statement of the outcome, in personal morality, of a political morality which never stops to question the methods it employs.

IN BRIEF

THE BLACKBOOK OF POLISH
JEWRY. Edited by Jacob Apenszlak.
Roy Publishers. $3.

The first and longer part of this book is "an account of the martyrdom of Polish Jewry under the Nazi occupation," based chiefly on material smuggled out of Poland. Here is the appalling story of a community which comprised threeand-a-quarter million souls in September, 1939, and had been reduced through starvation, epidemics, and wholesale slaughter to less than a third of that number by the end of 1943. Yet the remnants of Polish Jewry continue to fight the invaders. The second part deals with the thousand-year history of Polish Jewry, and its numerous contributions to learning and art. The book is illustrated with striking photographs and reproductions of documentary evidence of Nazi atrocities.

THE STORY OF PAINTING: FROM CAVE PICTURES TO MODERN ART. By Thomas Craven. Simon and Schuster. $5.

The title of this book is a misnomer. for it is concerned only with Western painting. Mr. Craven writes less brazenly than usual. Something has taken the wind and vinegar out of him, and he seems to be addressing himself to children. All the standard facts and interpretations are here, with now and then some egregious error, such as the statement that Leonardo "invented chiaroscuro." Mr. Craven credits Burchfield, Curry, Grant Wood, Marsh, and Benton with being "leaders of the most important art movement thus far produced in America." He also says that Seurat, Renoir, and Cézanne utilized the discoveries of Monet, Sisley, and Pissarro, when the opposite would be much closer to the truth.

HISTORICAL ATLAS OF THE UNITED STATES. By Clifford L. Lord and Elizabeth Lord. Henry Holt. $3.

The Lords' comprehensive collection of maps is not intended as a work of reference but rather as a collateral text, requiring only the application of a fair degree of imagination to make it serve as a striking graphic illumination of the country's history. The distribution of natural resources, population, geographical advantages, etc., as demonstrated through these maps, throws a strong light on the nature of our sectional differences and on the origins of such major crises as the War Between the States.

JEFFERSON AND THE PRESS. By Frank L. Mott. Louisiana State University Press, $1.

In an interesting little monograph Dr. Mott here restores Jefferson's remarks on the press and its freedom to their context. Jefferson has sometimes been quoted against himself by those who have seized on sentences in isolation from their place in his correspondence and in the political developments of his time. This book should leave no doubt that Jefferson was an earnest and ardent champion of a free press.

MIRO belongs among the living masters. He is the one new figure since the last war to have contributed importantly to the great painting tradition of our day-that which runs from Cézanne through fauvism and cubism. During the last ten years his work has maintained a very high level with a consistency neither Picasso nor Mondrian has equaled. The adjectives usually applied to Miró's art are "amusing," "playful," and so forth. But they are not quite fair. Painting as great as his transcends and fuses every particular emotion; it is as heroic or tragic as it is comic. Certainly there is a mood specific to it, a playfulness which evinces the fact that Miró is comparatively happy within the limitations of his medium, that he realizes himself completely within its dominion. But the effort he must exert to condense his sensations into pictures produces an effect to which playfulness itself is only a means. This is "pure painting" if there ever was any, conceived in terms of paint, thought through and realized in no other terms. That Miro's imagination is ignited by its contact with the anatomy of sex takes nothing away from the purity. In Picasso, who is indeed a more profound artist, we can sense 1 dissatisfaction with the resources of his medium; something beyond painting yearns to be expressed, something which color and line laid on a flat surface can never quite achieve. Miró, on the contrary, seeks the quintessential painting, is content to stay at the center of that exhilaration which is only felt in making marks and signs.

Picasso is more ambitious, more

Promethean; he tries to reconcile great contradictions, to bend, mold, and lock forms into each other, to annihilate negative space by filling it with dense matter, and to make the undeniable twodimensionality of the canvas voluminous and heavy. Miró is satisfied simply to punctuate, inclose, and interpret the cheerful emptiness of the plane surface. Never has there been painting which stayed more strictly within the two dimensions, yet created so much variety and excitement of surface. With an exuberance like Klee's. Miró tries other textures besides canvas and paper-burlap, celotex, sandpaper-a kind of experimentation Picasso usually finds irrelevant to his concerns. Picasso piles pigment on the surface; Miró sinks it in. Yet despite the restricted scope of his ambition, one or two of the large canvases which Miró executed around 1933 are in my opinion more powerful demonstrations-because more spontaneous and inevitable-than Picasso's Guernica mural. And Miró's smaller pictures frequently during the last five or six years before the war manifested greater conciseness and lucidity than anything produced by Picasso during the same period, except for his drawings and the "Femme endormie" of 1935, the "Femme assise au fauteuil." and the "Girl with Rooster" of 1938.

The present Miró exhibition (at the Matisse Gallery, through June 3) contains paintings done between 1934 and 1939, with one oil dating from 1927. Most of this work has not been seen in New York before, and it confirms, if it does not raise, Miró's standing.

André Masson has been an ambitious painter from the beginning, one who accepts and tries to solve the most difficult problems proposed by art in this age. Very little he has done is without interest; yet little so far seems capable of lasting. There is some lack in Masson of touch or "feel"-a lack dangerous to an artist who relies, or professes to rely. so much on automatism or pure spontaneity. A line either too Spencerian or too splintery weakens his drawings; an insistence upon multiplying and complicating planes, while combining two such color gamuts as violet-blue-greenyellow and brown-mauve-red-orange, renders his painting turgid, overheated, and discordant. Energy is dissipated in all directions.

Masson strains after that same terribilità which haunts Picasso, is obsessed by a similar nostalgia for the monstrous, the epically brutal, and the blasphemous. But being nostalgia, it has something too literary about it-too many gestures and too much forcing of color, texture, and symbol. The latest showing of Masson's oils and drawings (at the Rosenberg and Buchholz Galleries respectively, through May 20) does reveal a small advance, especially in two recent oils, "Pasiphae" and "Histoire de Thésée." In the first, black-brown, a dull red, and a mouldy yellow-green are unified into a whole that is cooler and more clarified than any of its parts, with a surface which is alive but not restless. In the second, happily, almost everything except calligraphic line is eliminated. Self-control, elimination, and simplification would seem to be the solution for Masson. But not as these operations are exemplified by two paintings in a new style, which permit thin, curling lines to describe figures over diluted lavenders, mauves, pinks, and greens, arriving at a kind of fermented-sweet decoration. This is impoverishment, not simplification. But even here, possibilities can be glimpsed of better things. There is a chance Masson will surprise us all some day.

ASLIGHT," Metro-Goldwyn-TMayer's production of "Angel Street," is very handsome, generally well acted, especially by Ingrid Bergman, and in most respects a pleasure to see. It is the story, as you probably know, of a man (Charles Boyer) who tries to drive his wife out of her mind. Some of it is fascinating in its demonstrations of pure psychological skill and of the mutual progressions of deceit and pain; it even suggests with what tragic exquisiteness and biological absoluteness the torturer and the tortured are liable to be made for each other. Morally, however, it smells bad to methough I realize that that may only be, in the language of the pure in heart, my own upper lip. I feel that my own unconscious resources of cruelty are too shrewdly titillated by it, that there is not sufficiently deep understanding or illumination of the subject matter, or any rebuke. Confused about this, I can only report my confusion; but I mistrust the film as I do Ivan Albright's horribly meticulous paintings of wrecked fleshbecause of a feeling that the artist, and his admirers, not being mature enough for the subject, have dishonored it and made it immature. ## MUSIC

HERE are a large number of concerts and broadcasts to comment on, the first of which that comes to mind is Leonard Bernstein's concert with the New York Philharmonic. It is natural to begin by looking at a conductor as he conducts; but I find that Bernstein's movements are something I don't like to look at. However, a conductor has a right to do what he wants to achieve his results; and a critic's proper concern is solely with those results. One of Bernstein's mannerisms-his exaggerated, sharp upbeat-might lead one to expect tense and nervous performances; actually the performances of Mozart's "Figaro" Overture and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony at that Philharmonic concert were all suavity and grace and unstraining brilliance. But then came a performance of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" which was full of violently and hectically discontinuous shifts from slow tempos that were excessively slow to fast ones that were excessively fast, and the other way around. As for Bernstein's symphony "Jeremiah," which he conducted at the concert, it gave me the impression of a facility in pouring forth sounds that proceed from nothing more than this facility. Since then there has been his score for the ballet "Fancy Free," which several hearings have convinced me is atrocious not only as music but as ballet music, because of the way it competes with the choreography for attention.

One of the memories I treasure is of a marvelously light and winged and radiant performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic, with Corigliano playing the solo part with delicacy and purity of style. Toscanini's recent performance of the work at his final General Motors broadcast had the great Heifetz playing with pretentiously mannered and sentimentally distorted phrasing; and someone I know who plays the violin exclaimed: "He exaggerated his staccatos to the point where they didn't have any musical sound!" People have found it difficult to understand how Toscanini could play some of the music he has played; I have found it more difficult to understand how a man who is himself a performing artist with a passion for plastic perfection in phrasing, and who would explode in anger if a solo wind-player in his orchestra were to commit the slightest of the phraseological vulgarities committed by Heifetz-how such a man has come to have Heifetz with all his vulgarities as soloist in performances of concertos.

Then, curious to hear a performance that had been described to me as "simply fantastic," I listened to the New York Philharmonic broadcast at which Horowitz played the solo part of Rachmaninov's D minor Concerto. I might say first that my attitude toward the products of men like Rachmaninov and Ravel has changed. A couple of years ago, when I deplored Webster Aitken's devoting part of recital to Debussy's Etudes, on the ground that they were examples of mere Debussy piano style in a vacuum, I saw the force of Aitken's reply—that as a pianist he was obligated to play, among other things, what had been written to exploit the resources of his instrument. There were of course things like Chopin's Etudes-and indeed all of Chopin's music-which exploited the resources of the piano and in addition had expressive content that gave them value as music; and this was true also of Debussy's "Images." But Aitken's argument made me realize that some of the piano pieces of Ravel, which could not provide musical experiences of any value with the expressive or evocative power of their content, did provide exciting experiences of a different non-musical kind with the effectiveness of their exploitation of their medium. Or rather they did so when they were played in way that realized this effectiveness. The force of Aitken's reply was derived largely from the magnificence of Debussyan piano sound that he produced with those Etudes, the humor that he imparted to their play with the varieties of the Debussy piano style. In the same way Ravel's exploitation of the orchestra in "Daphnis and Chloë" is something to listen to when the piece is performed by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony. And Rachmaninov's D minor Concerto-with its piano part that is an exploitation not just of the piano but of the piano as Rachmaninov played it in his unique incisively rhythmic and dramatic style-was something to listen to when he was the solo pianist in the performance. But it proved not to be worth listening to when the piano part was played by Horowitz merely with phenomenal technical virtuosity, and with appalling sentimentality.

Aitken's feeling for his medium and his feeling for music were evident in the beautiful sound and superbly contoured phrasing of his playing in a performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto K.271 broadcast from WOXR. The conductor was Leon Barzin, who, whenever I have occasion to watch him work and hear the result, always impresses me with his complete technical competence and his first-rate musicianship. And that is interesting in connection with something else. When you try to find out why an Ormandy was engaged for the Philadelphia Orchestra (and why the only other man considered was Iturbi), why a Barbirolli was engaged for the New York Philharmonic, why a Rodzinski was engaged to succeed him, why a Defauw was engaged for the Chicago Symphony, and why in each case a Beecham was passed over, the answers invariably include the statement "And the directors wanted a young man who could grow with the orchestra as Stokowski did in Philadelphia." This is the consequence of having orchestras run by men with smart financial and legal minds but with an understanding of orchestral affairs which caused them to reason that since a young conductor named Stokowski produced the Philadelphia Orchestra, what they had to get was a young conductor-men who, in other words, did not understand that Stokowski produced the Philadelphia Orchestra not with his youth but with his competence, and that what they had to get was not a young conductor but a competent one. Not only that; but having decided to have only a young conductor these men engaged an Ormandy, Barbirolli, a Rodzinski, a Defauw, but in each case passed over the one young symphonic conductor-Barzinwith the technical competence and musicianship for the job.

It Won't Do

Dear Sirs: The radio address on Wednesday night, April 12, by the Honorable James F. Byrnes was one of the most terrifying symptoms of the bloody mess coming up that has appeared in many months. Looked at in another way, it was the best argument for communism that has been offered since Strachey's "The Nature of Capitalist Crisis." If Byrnes, the highest official of the government specifically designated to worry about the post-war economy, hasn't been able to think up anything better than federal aid to the states to deal with "nation-wide unemployment," it is clear that those who are trusting the government for brains and leadership are going to get their hands pierced by a broken reed.

Unemployment relief and WPA projects won't do, and to attempt to make them do is to ask for a very brutal awakening. Neither civilians nor soldiers are in a mood to be put off with empty phrases. It has been demonstrated that the technological and human resources of this country are capable, even while blowing two or three hundred million dollars' worth of effort a day on war, of turning out the goods for a decent living for everybody. That decent living we are going to get-or a good many heads are going to have to be broken to stop us. If the government cannot produce, we will get another government that can. We're not going to take unemployment, bread lines, Hoovervilles, and undernourished children. No better service could be done Brother Byrnes than to wake him up to that fact right now.

Citizenship for Indians

Dear Sirs: Bills have been introduced in both houses "to authorize the naturalization and the admission into the United States under a quota of Eastern Hemisphere Indians and descendants of Eastern Hemisphere Indians." The people of India do not ask for any special privilege or for unrestricted immigration. Every country of course has the right to have immigration laws and fix such quotas as it may see fit. But they do wish and ask that the stigma of inferiority be removed, as it has been in the case of the Chinese.

Under the Immigration Act of 1924 only tourists, students, visitors, etc., from India may enter the United States, and only as non-quota immigrants. The bill now under consideration would provide that about seventy-five nationals of India may enter the United States annually as immigrants, a number so small that it obviously would create no economic or social problem.

Also, according to the Nationality Act of 1940, nationals of India are ineligible to citizenship in the United States. This bill makes qualified nationals of India eligible. At present there are about 3,000 nationals of India in the United States.

People in India will watch anxiously the progress of these bills in Congress. Questions have been asked in the India Legislative Assembly in New Delhi about it. The Council of State (upper chamber) of the Government of India recently passed a resolution recommending that early steps be taken to obtain United States citizenship rights for the nationals of India.

One of the powerful weapons that Japan possessed in the psychological warfare against the United Nations was removed when the American Congress repealed the Chinese Exclusion Act, another when the Congress passed an amendment to make India a beneficiary of the U. N. R. R. A. Passage of this bill would be a staggering blow against Japanese propaganda, and for the cause of a democratic world order.

Readers of The Nation who agree with the purpose of the bills are asked to write to their Congressmen, to urge that they support the bills in Congress.

A Little of Both

Dear Sirs: In one and the same issue of The Nation (April 15, 1944) the state of Wisconsin is called (1) in an editorial, "the Bible Belt of isolationism." and (2) by I. F. Stone, "the home of progressive Republicanism." Now, I am wondering whether progressive Republicans are Biblical isolationists, or whether the doctors disagree as to the malady-or health-of Wisconsin. Per-

IN WARNING AGAINST IMPERIALISM IN THE guise of a "realistic" policy of post-war military alliances. Sumner Welles has sharply clarified the basic foreign policy issue now before the American people. Mr. Welles was profoundly right when he declared that isolationism is dead and that the choice facing us is between a true world organization and system of military alliances involving "the indefinite piling up of armaments and their inevitable adjunct, stark imperialism." His analysis of the danger of relying on force or a system of alliances to preserve peace was one of the most trenchant yet made by an important national figure. He pointed out that such alliances at best provide a "temporary and precarious balance of power," and that even while they exist the members will inevitably engage in jockeying for individual influence and selfish advantage—as they are, in fact, doing in the course of the war. This rivalry can only be held in check by an international organization strong enough to establish security on the basis of law and equity. The formation of such an organization cannot safely be postponed until some convenient time after the war. Basic decisions affecting the future of the world are being made every day-chiefly by the three great powers. If these decisions are to reflect anything more solid than the interests and rivalries of those powers, they should be worked out by the United Nations as a whole. Mr. Welles appeals for the immediate establishment of some kind of United Nations political council-a move we have long advocated.

THERE IS NOT MUCH TIME LEFT TO FIND THE way out of the Soviet-Polish impasse. In the course of the summer the Red Army will probably complete its reoccupation of the controversial eastern provinces and cross the Curzon Line into undisputed Polish territory. A dangerous situation will then arise if there is no Polish government in existence which enjoys both popular support in the country and good relations with the Soviet government. The Polish government in exile claims it commands the allegiance of the vast majority of Poles—a difficult matter to prove under present circumstances—but it certainly does not command the confidence of Moscow. Some commentators here profess to see in the Russian demand for a friendly regime in Poland an insistence on a communist puppet government. The close relations between Moscow and the definitely non-communist Czechoslovakian government ought to dispel this idea. The Soviets have not made any pronouncement on the future social system of Poland. They have, not unreasonably, indicated that they will not tolerate a Poland dominated or influenced by elements who, to quote Walter Lippmann, "even before they are liberated from the Nazis conceive themselves as the spearpoint of a hostile coalition against the Soviet Union." Recently hostility to such elements has become manifest among the London exiles. Criticism of reactionary officers, brought to a head by revelations of anti-Semitism in the army, has resulted in a demand by the National Council that the commander in chief, General Sosnkowski, be divested of his appointment as successor to the presidency. Against this timid first step to check the militarists who surround President Raczkiewicz must be set the enforced resignation of Stefan Litauer, an able journalist who has worked for agreement with Russia, as chief press officer of the Polish Ministry of Information.

SPRING HOUSE-CLEANING FOR GOVERNMENTS in exile is part of the preparation for D-Day. In Lebanon the conference of all Greek political parties and resistance groups called by Premier Panpandreou has signed a "national charter" as a basis for an inclusive coalition government. The unity program is believed to include the formation of a national army which will consolidate the regular forces with the various partisan contingents. This brings hope for an end of the internecine warfare which has so reduced the effectiveness of the Greek resistance. But plans may still be upset by the recalcitrance of the King, relying on British backing. In London the Yugoslav government is in the midst of one of its perennial crises. King Peter has made a gesture to Marshal Tito by announcing the dismissal of General Mihailovich as Minister of War, and is seeking to reorganize the Cabinet. It is reported that four men are under consideration as the new Premier, among them Dr. Ivan Subasich, former governor of Croatia. Dr. Subasich is one of the ablest leaders of the Croatian Peasant Party and from the beginning has been a strong supporter of Tito. But at the same time he retains a warm devotion to the royal family, and the fact that he has the approval of the British and American governments suggests he may have been brought forward to bolster up a shaky monarchy.

THE RESULTS OF THE LONDON CONFERENCE of British Commonwealth prime ministers give hope to people distressed by recent signs of a return to power politics. Many feared that the conference itself was an attempt to forge an empire bloc to match the strength of the "Soviet colossus" and the United States. As Pr fessor F. H. Underhill forecast in The Nation of May nothing of the sort has taken place. Accepting the lea ership of MacKenzie King of Canada, the conferen expressed its devotion to the Commonwealth in its exis ing form and refused to entertain proposals for a mo closely integrated empire. Mr. King, in a speech befothe British House of Commons, stressed the autonom and freedom of each of the British nations. Canada its relations with the United States provides "surely th supreme example of a smaller nation living in the fulle security and harmony with a powerful one." But the con ference went far beyond refusing to consider an empir bloc and insisting that each nation be free to direct i own foreign policy. Twice in a generation the Commor wealth nations have banded together to wage a commo war against aggression. Now they declare there must I set up "a world organization . . . to maintain peace an security . . . endowed with the necessary power an authority to prevent aggression and violence."

IN THE PRE-WAR DECADE LATIN AMERICAL countries suffered from raw-material surpluses and a lac of foreign exchange to pay for imported manufactures Today they have a hungry war-time market for most c their raw materials and a large and growing surplus o dollars. They are prosperous, but as Mr. del Vayo show in his examination of Mexico's economic position or page 621, it is a feverish kind of prosperity. Speculator are flourishing, but inflation is impoverishing the masses There is an abundance of capital, but it is not possible t invest much of it in ways that will permanently increas the industrial equipment of the country. Obviously wit many lines of production restricted in this country it i not easy for Latin American countries to offset the mone receipts from their raw-material exports by importing consumer goods. And war priorities make machinery an other forms of capital goods almost equally hard to buy But it ought to have been possible to set up south of th border some of the war plants, redundant here when peace comes, which could have made a permanent con tribution to the industrialization of our neighbors. Fo instance, we might have permitted the export of copper fabricating machinery to Mexico and taken some part o the copper we are deriving from that country in the forr of shell cases. It is, of course, commonly argued that b assisting the industrialization of "backward" countrie we ruin the market for our own goods. This hoar fallacy ought never to be disinterred after the buria it received in the past week at the first Conference o Commissions of Inter-American Development. Again and again government speakers and business men alik stressed the point that the more other countries wer able to build up their wealth through industrialization the better customers they became.

THE DIES COMMITTEE'S UN-AMERICANISM eceived its third major jolt within a fortnight when Representative John M. Costello was defeated in the California Democratic primary by Hal Styles, a pro-New Deal radio commentator. The setback was as unexpected s the earlier defeat of Representative Starnes in Alaama and Martin Dies's own withdrawal before the pitter opposition within his constituency. The public's epudiation of Costello was the more significant since ne had sought to feather his political nest by violent ttacks on the West Coast Japanese American évacués. n these attacks he had the enthusiastic backing of core of California's super-patriotic organizations and of nost of the press. The unanticipated collapse of antiapanese racialism as an effective political weapon in California is particularly encouraging in view of the imilar failure of the white-supremacy issue in the Florida and Alabama primaries and the defeat of the Blease machine-campaigning on an anti-Negro, anti-New Deal platform—at the South Carolina Democratic convention. The results of recent elections have so badly rightened demagogues like Rankin of Mississippi and Hoffman of Michigan that they have launched violent ttacks against the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, which they credit with responsibility for the elimination of Starnes, Dies, and Costello. However, the trend gainst reaction has appeared in such widely separated parts of the country under such diverse circumstances hat it can hardly be credited to any one agency.

THE RETTREMENT OF MARTIN DIES MAKES US vonder about the next stage of the fascinating career f his research director and chief informer, J. B. Mathews. All sorts of possibilities must present themselves Mr. Matthews's fertile mind. He could tie up with Gerald L. K. Smith or one of the other fascist tub-thumprs still at large. He could sell his considerable talents Henry Ford or to Sewell Avery. But a more imaginawe move would be back to the left. Just as Mr. latthews, through his long association with Commuist-fringe organizations, was able to initiate the Dies ommittee into the mysteries of transmission belts and nnocent fronts and splinter groups-and also to hand ver membership lists and letterheads—so today, through is years with Martin Dies, he must know all about the lans and purposes of the Extreme Right. Why not offer is services and this rich collection of fasciana to some aterprising labor organization or progressive political roup? The C. I. O. Political Action Committee, last najor victim of the Dies vendetta, might take on Mr. fatthews. How about it, gentlemen? Here we have one rst-class renegade, only slightly soiled, his coat lining most as good as new. He can be had, we'd say, for a odest sum—the traditional thirty pieces of silver, peraps. . . . What, no bids?

HIT BY GUNFIRE FROM A LOW-FLYING NAZI plane, the young Serbian patriot, Nicholas Mirkovich, has died in Yugoslavia. We record his death with intimate regret and admiration. For Mirkovich was one of the finest and most courageous among the liberal Yugoslav group in America. By profession an economist, he came to this country to serve in the Office of Economic Reconstruction as associate of the chairman, S. Kosanovich. He was also chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the Central and Eastern European Planning Board and a member of the Economic Committee of the United Nations Information Office. He often contributed to The Nation and we turned to him for guidance in many problems connected with Balkan affairs. When the government-in-exile revealed its extreme reactionary tendencies, Mirkovich enlisted in the American army and asked to be sent to the Yugoslav front. Before he left this country he told his friends that for him the time had come to turn science and political theory into living realities. In an American contingent he fought side by side with Tito's Partisans. His death is a profound loss to his people and indeed to the democratic cause in the Balkan countries as whole; it can serve a purpose only if the world that emerges from the bitter struggle is the one for which he gave himself so freely and with such complete lack of self-concern.

The Empty French Seat

THE great Allied invasion machine, we are told, is all tuned up and ready to be slipped into high gear whenever the word comes. But the political trailer which it must pull behind it is not yet fully loaded. Representatives of Norway, Belgium, and Holland are in their seats, each equipped with an agreement with the United States and Britain enabling them to get to work reconstituting the civil administration in their countries as soon as the military situation permits. But the place reserved for France remains empty, while somewhere in the rear the long wrangle continues about the terms on which the nominee of the French Committee of National Liberation is to be allowed to occupy it.

We noted in these pages two weeks ago that negotiations on this question had been interrupted by the difficulties which British security rules had placed in the way of communications between London and Algiers. It has since become known that this breach is rather less serious than it then appeared. General Koenig, the French representative, is continuing his talks with General Eisenhower, and apparently the British have allowed him to send some coded messages to General de Gaulle. But although it is some weeks since Mr. Hull said that the Anglo-American authorities were "disposed" to see the French Committee "exercise leadership" in freed

France and Mr. Eden declared that civic responsibility would rest on its shoulders, there have been no hints that a final agreement is near conclusion.

What is causing the hitch? We can be sure that the French Committee will not be disposed to accept an agreement any less favorable than those signed last week by the United States and Britain with the exile governments of Norway, Belgium, and Holland. The terms of these pacts have not been published, but it is understood that they closely resemble the occupation agreement between Russia and Czechoslovakia. This is a brief and uncomplicated document which gives the commander of the invading army supreme authority to the extent that military necessity dictates but provides for the reversion of the civil administration to the Czechoslovak government in any part of the liberated territory which ceases to be an actual war zone.

There is no reason to suppose that the French Committee would refuse to sign a similar agreement. The question is whether the United States and Britain are prepared to grant the committee recognition as a de facto provisional government, for that is what such an agreement would imply. Hitherto this recognition has been refused, usually on the ground that it would compromise the right of the French people to decide their own future. But the French Committee has prepared elaborate plans for holding elections and summoning a constitutional assembly as soon as the military situation permits. How long a period must elapse before these plans are put into effect obviously depends on the speed with which the Nazis are defeated. Meanwhile civil administration will have to be carried on in the liberated regions and preparations made for free elections, including the repatriation of millions of deportees.

There must be one authority to perform these tasks. Both the American and British governments are on record as denying any intention of dealing with Vichy, and this would seem to leave the field clear for the National Committee unless the State Department is hiding some other group up its sleeve. It is inconceivable, however, that any third group could have credentials which would carry any weight with the French people. Every refugee escaping from France brings evidence that it is to De Gaulle and the National Committee that the French people are looking for leadership. The latest proof of this fact is offered by Louis Marin, veteran conservative leader, who declared on arrival in London: "He [De Gaulle] is the only man the country will stand for as a constitutional leader, until normal conditions can be restored."

The rift between the French and the Western powers is growing in a dangerous manner. It can only be bridged by general and prompt recognition of the right of France to command its own destiny under leaders of its own choice and to have a full share in the resettlement of Europe. We must stop harping on the miserable division which defeated France in 1940 and accord full weigh to the resilience of spirit that is showing itself in the heroism of the underground and on the Italian battle field. France is recovering its strength, and we should not take offense if that process is marked by sharp de mands for equality. For a strong and healthy France mus be the cornerstone of European reconstruction.

Poll Tax—Second Round

THE anti-poll-tax bill, twice passed by overwhelming majorities in the House, has been blocked again in the Senate. Ostensibly the bill's passage was made impossible by the threat of a filibuster and by the unwillingness of the necessary two-thirds to impose cloture against this traditional minority weapon. Actually a majority of the Senate, pledged in writing to passage of the bill, used theoretical objections to cloture as a means of breaking their word. The abolition of the poll tax would work a revolution in the Senate, blasting from key positions the old reactionaries whom the Southern oligarchy returns to Washington year after year, and whom the rule of seniority elevates and maintains in the committee system.

The defeat of the anti-poll-tax bill in the Senate must be laid at the door of the Republican Party, which ir alliance with progressive Democrats could have forced cloture and prevented a filibuster. The party leadership chose instead to continue its covert comradeship with the Southern Democrats. Last year the latter betrayed their party by blocking the soldiers' vote bill. This year the Republicans returned the favor by betraying their party and blocking cloture, the one measure which could have saved the poll-tax bill. Governor Dewey might have forced Republican Senators to vote for cloture had his reply to Walter White of the N. A. A. C. P. been specific and forthright instead of vague and disingenuous. Dewey said he had "always fought against the poll tax and every device to deprive free people of their votes." But many of the Southern Senators, including even Bilbo, declared themselves opposed to the poll tax. If one took their statements at face value, they were opposed only to abolition of the poll tax by federal legislation. This was the crucial question, and Dewey left it unanswered.

While Dewey was craftily evasive, his party's Senate leader, White of Maine, was openly hostile to the antipoll-tax bill. It was Senator White who bluntly interpreted the vote against cloture as a vote against the bill which it was. Had the Republicans made a party issue of the poll tax, few of the thirteen Northern and Western Democrats who voted against cloture would have dared to do so. As it was, a Northern Democrat like Walst of New Jersey could safely vote against cloture; his Republican colleague, Hawkes, voted the same way. Most of the Northern Democratic votes against cloture came from the Mountain States of the Far West, often allied with the Southerners. In the South itself Lister Hill spoke against the anti-poll-tax bill. Thomas of Oklahoma, who was absent, was supposed to be paired for cloture. Only Pepper of Florida, not a poll-tax state, pleaded for cloture and for the bill.

Walter White of the N. A. A. C. P. was fully justified in calling the performance in the Senate "a farce" and in deploring the "lackadaisical attitude" of the anti-poll-tax Senators. The White House felt that it could not get the anti-poll-tax bill through the Senate and put up no fight. At the last session the anti-poll-tax bill was introduced in the Senate by Pepper. This year, with bitter primary fight on his hands, he seemed only too ready to heed the Administration's request that he softpedal the campaign against the poll tax, and he did not again introduce the bill. The White House felt understandably reluctant to split the Democratic Party wide open on an issue it could not win. It is pleasant to note nevertheless that the majority leader, Barkley of Kentucky, acquitted himself most honorably in the final showdown in the Senate, and spoke with vigor and ability for the bill and cloture.

The National Committee to Abolish the Poll Tax is confident that despite this second defeat in the Senate the poll tax will ultimately be abolished. The Nation agrees. A major reform of this kind cannot be accomplished overnight. In a few short years the committee has made the country conscious of the poll-tax evil and of its national significance. That in itself is an accomplishment; the vote against cloture was a cowardly gesture, but that it was necessary is encouraging. For a majority of the Senate thereby indicated that public pressure against the poll tax has become so strong that they dared not risk a vote on the merits.

China's Present Danger

A LTHOUGH fierce fighting is still reported from some sections of the Honan front, nothing is to be gained by hiding the fact that the Japanese have won a major victory in that area. The full extent of the military setback suffered by China is yet to be seen, but even if the Chinese at Loyang succeed in escaping the trap that the Japanese set for them, the defeat must still be regarded as the most serious suffered by China since the loss of Hankow in 1938. If the substantial Chinese armies still fighting in Honan are wiped out—a fate that is not unlikely—the Japanese would be in a position to launch a drive southward against Changsha with a view to opening direct railroad communications from Manchuria all the way to Canton, a distance of some 2,000 miles. A secondary drive up the Lunghai railroad to Sian and the province of Shensi would also be a distinct and dangerous possibility.

The gravity of the situation can best be appreciated if it is considered in the light of the announced United Nations strategy for the defeat of Japan. Admiral Nimitz has indicated that the goal of the present naval drive in the Pacific is the seizure of a port, presumably in the southern part of China, to provide adequate supplies for an all-out aerial bombardment of Japan's industrial centers. The Ledo road, the opening of which is the object of Stilwell's present successful campaign in Burma, would provide a supplementary flow of supplies. The first part of this plan obviously presumes United Nations control of the railway from Canton northward, for this is one route which could be used for transporting heavy equipment and supplies from the port to air bases in the north. A Japanese drive into Shensi would block the alternative overland route to North Central China via the Ledo road, Kunming, and Chungking. Furthermore, possession of the north-south Peking-Canton rail route and the east-west Lunghai railway would enable the Japanese to strengthen their Chinese defenses to such an extent that it might require years to drive them out.

Some Chinese have declared that the present crisis is a result of America's failure to send adequate supplies to China. That the problem is considerably more complex than this is indicated by the fact that some 500,000 of Chiang Kai-shek's best-trained and best-equipped troops have been immobilized within a hundred or so miles of the present conflict by their long-standing assignment of blockading the Chinese Communist armies. The American government can hardly be blamed for not sending more supplies to Chungking as long as a strong possibility exists that such supplies would be used, not against the Japanese, but to encourage a disastrous civil war. Nor is America's hesitancy in providing aid directly to Chiang Kai-shek likely to be lessened by statements recently made by prominent Chinese in this country to the effect that the Chinese Communists are "greater enemies than the Japanese."

Fortunately, the political situation within China has shown distinct signs of improvement within recent weeks. Statements such as those of Sun Fo acknowledging the justice of Western criticism of the anti-democratic tendencies within China are clearly straws in the wind. After months of vain pleading, the foreign correspondents in Chungking have at last been granted permission to visit Yenan, the capital of the Communist special district. And on top of this comes news that Lin Tso-han, chairman of the Communist administration, has arrived in Chungking to attempt to negotiate a settlement with Chiang Kai-shek. If an agreement could be reached, the military picture would be changed overnight. For such an agreement would release not only the 500,000 first-line Kuomintang troops which have been enforcing the blockade but would make possible the arming and equipping of at least an equal number of soldiers attached to the Chinese Red Army who are stationed near the threatened area.

To date the United States government has followed a wait-and-see policy toward China's internal conflict. To some extent this would seem to be justified because of the threat of civil war. But it has had the effect of leaving China in the lurch militarily—and thus lengthening the war—while contributing nothing to the solution of China's problems. Democratic groups within China have been bitterly disillusioned by the negative nature of our policy. They feel that China could easily be revitalized and united in the war against Japan if the United States would only throw its immense prestige in the direction of unity and democracy. Obviously, this cannot be accomplished as long as we hold aloof and refuse to give adequate aid. Assistance should be made available on as large a scale as possible, but it should be made contingent upon concrete assurances against civil war through a Kuomintang-Communist settlement and upon elimination of such policies as the recent attempt to exercise "thought control" over Chinese students abroad. The present visit of Vice-President Wallace to Chungking offers an excellent opportunity for some plain speaking regarding the mutual obligations involved in our common war against Japan.

A Catholic Looks at the Dies Committee

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 19 T KNOW of no more important long-range political task for American progressives than to prevent the continuation of the Dies committee, even sans Dies. J. Parnell Thomas of New Jersey, the ranking Republican on the committee, has already called for its reconstitution as a permanent body, and Thomas is, if anything, a shade worse than the Texan. In this connection I should like to call attention to a book bearing the copyright of the Catholic University of America Press. The book is "The Dies Committee: A Study of the Special House Committee for the Investigation of Un-American Activities, 1938-1943," by August Raymond Ogden,* a Christian Brother, a member of one of the teaching orders of the Roman Catholic church. The first full-length study of the Dies committee, the book was written by Brother August Raymond as his Ph.D. dissertation for the Faculty of the School of Social Science at the Catholic University. The author's opinions are of course his own, but the dissertation was published, as the preface notes, "with the permission of Brother A. Ernest, Provincial." One of the Catholics to whom the author acknowledges a debt of gratitude is Father Wilfred Parsons, the former editor of America, an astute Jesuit publicist, teacher, and historian, and hardly, I may add, a leftist.

In directing attention to the author's calling, the circumstances under which the book came to be written and published, and its associations, I intend no condescension. The book is a good book, a solid, competent, and comprehensive job. I do not agree with all the Las Vegas, New Mexico. $2.

his ability as a writer and his honesty as a reporter. And there are no ifs and buts, lay or clerical, about Brother August Raymond's belief in democracy and in fair procedure. This book, from any source, would deserve the very widest attention. I am stressing its source and its context only because these may give it a hearing and inspire confidence in its conclusions in circles no radical like myself could hope to reach or persuade. The author believes "the confusion and violent change brought about by war will tend to foster extreme movements of both the right and the left." He thinks there are "many aspects of subversive activities that only a Congressional committee could thoroughly and completely expose." His basic point of view is made clear when he says, "Throughout this study it is borne in mind that a good end never justifies improper means and that the anomalous use of undemocratic means, even in the slightest degree, in order to preserve democracy constitutes, in effect, a threat to democracy itself." The author feels that "if the country ever reaches a stage where democratic means are found inadequate to preserve its liberties, then democracy will have become a hollow shell." He reaches his conclusion after 275 pages of careful and objective history and analysis, and that verdict is of immediate relevance and importance. Brother August Raymond says:

author's conclusions, but I finished it with respect for

This study of the Special House Committee for the Investigation of Un-American Activities indicates that the said committee is neither an ideal nor a desired means of exposing subversive activities. It has not wholly failed in its endeavors, but with different methods and better procedure it could have performed far more efficient service. Hence, without disparaging the accomplishments of the committee or impugning the motives of any person connected with it, it seems that the Congress should discontinue the Dies committee as the first step to a solution of the very difficult problem facing it. Improvement in the procedure of the Dies committee cannot be recommended because its past history does not furnish any guaranty that such improvement would be permanent or, indeed, that the committee could be expected to change its ways.

The book opens with an interesting discussion of the Congressional investigative process itself and then surveys the predecessors of the Dies committee. The basic pattern of most of them was visible in the first. It was precipitated by a public meeting in favor of Soviet Russia held in Poli's Theater, Washington, on February 2, 1919. The Senate, after a flurry of alarmed speeches, instructed the Attorney General to investigate. The Attorney General, T. W. Gregory, was a brave and honest man and found nothing wrong with the meeting. But the Overman committee, then investigating the brewing industry and German propaganda, seized on this overpublicized meeting to obtain a year's extension in which to study Bolshevist as well as German propaganda. Senator Hiram W. Johnson of California had the honor to be the first of the line of solitary and thoughtful men who have objected in Congress to these hysterical inquiries. Characteristically, the committee from that point on seems to have paid more attention to Bolshevist than to German propaganda. And Meyer London, then the Socialist Representative from New York, turned up at the hearings to protest. "Mr. Chairman," he said, "... every new idea, every new suggestion, every new thought . . . is immediately denounced as Bolshevism. It is not necessary to argue any more . . . it is enough to say, "That is Bolshevism." And that is Diesism.

In 1924 a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations investigated subversive activities as means of blocking recognition of the Soviet Union. In 1927 Sosnowski of Michigan introduced a resolution for an investigation of communism, but it was buried in the House Rules Committee. In 1930 Dickstein and Fish protested against religious persecution in Russia, and Fish got his chance in the uproar over the Amtorg documents produced by Grover Whalen, then Police Commissioner of New York. These were exposed as forgeries by the Graphic and attacked on the floor of the House by LaGuardia; and the Fish committee itself was later forced to report that "the testimony failed to establish the genuineness of the so-called 'Whalen documents.'" The House established the Fish committee and gave it $25,000, although Lindsay Warren of North Carolina, now Controller General, tried to strike a note of sanity by saying, "Remove the causes of discontent, and there will be no danger of communistic activity." The Fish committee was noteworthy largely for its fantastic discovery of 500,000 Communists and Communist sympathizers in the United States and for the thoughtful minority report by Nelson of Maine: "Communism thrives during periods of economic depression and social suffering... we should proceed to put needed reforms into effect sanely and sensibly, without hate or haste or hysteria... we should approach with reserve the consideration of any criminal statutes that seek to fetter the operation of the human mind."

Dies made his debut in this field in 1932 with a bill to deport alien Communists. It won the two-thirds' vote necessary for suspension of the rules in the House and was passed over the objection of LaGuardia, but it was blocked by La Follette in the Senate. The immediate predecessor of the Dies committee was the McCormack-Dickstein investigation into Nazi and other propaganda activities authorized by the House in 1934. This committee, Brother August Raymond finds, did a "good job." It focused attention on Viereck, the work done by the publicity firms of Carl Byoir and Ivy Lee, and the Silver Shirts and other domestic fascist movements, as well as on the Nazis. The author contrasts its procedure with that of the Dies committee: "All witnesses were examined in executive session and then only, if it were deemed necessary, were public hearings held." This, Brother August Raymond writes, "eliminated much useless publicity and prevented the committee from becoming the sounding board for fanatics of any type, as too often happened in other investigations of a like nature." There were twenty-four executive hearings, "at which it was determined if the witnesses had information that was reliable or germane." Only seven public hearings were held, and the records of the others, to protect innocent persons, were placed under seal in the Library of Congress and can be made available only by special act of Congress.

It would be incorrect to say that Dies did not understand the importance of such procedure. For in 1938, in asking the House to approve the resolution for what became the Dies committee, the Texan said, ". . . all depends upon the way the committee is handled. I can conceive that a committee constituted or composed of men whose object is to gain publicity, or whose object is to arouse hatred against some race or creed, might do more harm than good." In an effort to placate Maury Maverick and other opponents of his resolution, Dies declared, "Always we must keep in mind that in any legislative attempt to prevent un-American activities, we might jeopardize fundamental rights far more important than the objective we seek." Maverick, unconvinced, predicted that after the McCormack inquiry one run by Dies would be a "fake side show," and Coffee of Washington warned that it would only be a disguise for an attack on all liberal organizations. The warning may have been a recommendation. The House passed the resolution 191 to 41.

It would also be incorrect to say that Dies never followed the wise procedure established by the Dickstein-McCormack committee. Brother August Raymond's examination of the hearings demonstrates that when the Dies committee dealt with fascists and their sympathizers, the procedure was usually of such a character as to protect many of the people involved and to assure them fair treatment. A striking example is provided in the case of Edward James Smythe, now on trial for sedition in Washington. "The latter's files had been seized," the author writes, "and revealed an extensive correspondence with many of the known fascist clique." In similar circumstances, where the left was involved, Brother August

Raymond cites case after case in which names and hearsay were made public without the slightest effort to check. But in dealing with Smythe's files, the author says, "it was decided not to release the information, since Dies was afraid that innocent people who had repudiated the movement might be injured." And when Fritz Kuhn, the Bund leader, was before the committee, "the entire hearing was honestly conducted and all due regard paid to Kuhn's rights." But when Dies released to the press the list of government employees belonging to the Washington chapter of the American League for Peace and Democracy, Brother August Raymond notes that the committee "never produced an iota of evidence that, individually, the persons on the list were Communist sympathizers."

This is the first of two articles on "The Dies Committee." The second will appear next week.

Europe in Exile

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

THE days of exile are drawing to a close. The invasion of the Fortress of Europe will open the gate for the return to their native land of the thousands who sought refuge abroad from the Nazi blitz or joined the fighting forces of the United Nations after their own countries had been occupied. How will they be received, these returning exiles, by the peoples who for four or five years have been living under Nazi tyranny?

One group of political refugees enjoys a special status in their exile. These are the kings, the cabinets, the former members of parliaments who are recognized as the legitimate governments of occupied countries by the other members of the United Nations. The regimes which they attempted to preserve by neutrality treaties, by diplomatic negotiations, even by force of arms, have been overthrown, but the governments survive in exile, claiming to represent the spirit of the nation that is still unconquered, of the new nation that awaits rebirth. In some cases they cling to the threadbare garments of legitimacy even when these no longer evoke the reverence of their people back home.

Another group consists of the leaders and the rank-andfile fighters in the free movements. They went into exile not merely because the old order collapsed but because they would not tolerate fascism or Nazism. Frequently they were bitter opponents of the pre-war governments which paved the way for the fascist victories, governments which still enjoy prestige abroad. They are fighting for an idea. They understand that this is a people's war. The conflict between these men, inspired by a passion for democracy, and those other exiles who simply wish to restore the old order may seriously impede any integrated effort to build a durable peace.

The governments in exile are of course not all alike. A modern Dante would place some in Purgatory, some in Limbo, and some in an everlasting Hell. In Purgatory, to await their final reward, he would put the governments of four constitutional monarchies-Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Belgium, and Norway. They have served the cause of the United Nations well. Apparently they have retained the full respect and confidence of their people. To Limbo would go two governments which have been guilty of no sin except that, in Dante's words, "baptism was not theirs." The exiled governments of Czechoslovakia and France were formed outside the countries they claim to represent. They must obtain Allied blessing before their full legitimacy is recognized. Two governments which have betrayed their people, and which their people have obviously repudiated, Greece and Yugoslavia, would be placed in Hell. Poland presents a problem, since it is difficult to learn the real attitude of the Polish people toward the London government. An objective consideration of the dominant elements in the Cabinet would certainly condemn them to this lowest circle.

Where would the free movements be found in the vision of a modern Dante? I suspect that he would be as perplexed about their status as the Allied diplomats and hesitate to assign them any fixed abode.

WAITING IN PURGATORY

The Grand Duchess of Luxembourg, whose government conducts its business in a few rooms in an office building in Montreal, still stands at the head of her Lilliputian state. Her people do not question her legitimacy, and their response to her return is assured. They will never forget that she was the first ruler in Europe to lift her voice against fascist aggression.

Nor need Wilhelmina, Queen of the Netherlands, be concerned about the security of her throne. Even the Communists support her. So does the underground. One of the underground newspapers, Je Maintiendrai, recently outlined a post-war program calling for a constitutional, democratic monarchy. That is exactly what the House of Orange is.

At the beginning of its exile the Dutch government had a little trouble with its Premier, Jonkheer de Geer. He was an old man, long in service, and when he found himself in London with a Cabinet comprising all the political parties—Catholic and Protestant, Social Demorat and liberal—he felt doubtful of its legality and was hesitant about signing any statement it prepared. He became homesick for his country and his wife, and resigned his post. When he was given a special mission to the Dutch East Indies, he flew to Lisbon instead and from there was transported to Holland in a Nazi plane. Then he simply retired, refusing to become either a Quisling or a leader of the resistance.

His successor, Pieter Gerbrandy, is considered somewhat authoritarian. Two members of his Cabinet, Steenoergh, the Minister of Economic War, and Welter, the Minister for the Colonies, resigned because they could not agree with his policy. But the government has been strengthened by the arrival of Jacob Burger, who has entered the Cabinet as a representative of the resistance movement. A special committee is now engaged in the preparation of post-war plans.

Among the questions most hotly debated is that of the reconstitution of Parliament, only three of whose members are in exile. A group of the younger officers and civil servants favors the suppression of Parliament and f all free political life in Holland for some time after the liberation. The Cabinet, however, seems to favor a return to regular constitutional procedures in full copperation with the leaders of local resistance movements.

The principle of monarchy is not disputed in Belgium either, but certain difficulties are offered by King Leopold and his attitude toward the war. The New York Times on April 15 quoted the Belgian Premier, Hubert Pierlot, is saying that Belgium would remain a monarchy under Leopold. "King Leopold's position," said M. Pierlot, was fully understood by the nation in his uncompronising refusal to exercise his functions under enemy occupation. Once the King regains his freedom, he will untomatically resume the exercise of his constitutional prerogatives, of which he was deprived the moment he became prisoner of war."

There has never been a serious republican movement in Belgium, but if the Premier believes that his nation has unshakable confidence in Leopold, he is simply deluding himself. It is true that Leopold's decision to remain in the country and to share the trials of his people under the occupation increased his popularity. Many persons hoped that his presence would protect them from German terrorism. When it did not, when starvation, labor deportations, and the severity of the Gestapo were used to crush Belgium together with the other conquered nations, a great part of the country turned against the King and now desires his abdication.

The attitude of the government in exile toward the King has varied. At a meeting in Limoges, France, on May 30, 1940, two days after the surrender, the Cabinet placed the blame squarely on the King. In 1944 M. Pierlot, for the nation, expresses "full understanding" of the King's behavior. During the past year the government has sent many emissaries to the King seeking closer collaboration. But Leopold has always refused to give it, perhaps because he cannot forgive the government for its early accusations, perhaps because he wants to retain his independence. Whatever the existing relationship, his picture is displayed in every Belgian office in Washington and London.

Before the Cabinet left the country it obtained a unanimous vote of confidence from Parliament and the authority to remain in the war until Belgium had been fully liberated from the Germans. The government is the only one in exile which has not undergone changes or modifications; it is composed of Catholics, Liberals, and Socialists and represents 90 per cent of the voting population.

The Belgian Cabinet, like the Dutch, maintains close relations with the resistance. In 1942 the Minister of Justice, Antoine Delfosse, was smuggled back from France into Belgium, where he became chief of the underground. Later he joined his colleagues in London, and through him the Cabinet is able to direct the underground's activities. A committee for post-war planning has been set up which has elaborated a great many projects. The Socialist underground in Belgium has also outlined a post-war program seeking improvement of living conditions among the workers, woman's suffrage, and simplification of the social laws. Some of these suggestions have been accepted by the government, others rejected. The government is ready to report and ask approval of every action it has taken in exile; then to resign and permit the constitution of a new government.

Like the Belgian, the Norwegian government in exile has the authorization of the people. On April 19, 1940, the Storthing convened at Elverum and granted the Cabinet full authority to govern until the Storthing should again convene on free Norwegian soil. The Norwegian Cabinet, nevertheless, stamps every decision "provisional" as a sign of respect for the will of the people.

Contact with the underground is close. Its approval is sought before any law or decree is signed, and the Minister of Finance, M. Hackman, came to his post from the resistance movement. Norwegians are still distrustful of those Cabinet members who based their pre-war policy on the assumption that Norway would never be attacked, and many believe that Mr. Koht, who was the Foreign Minister at the time of the invasion, placed far too much reliance on Norway's proclaimed neutrality. The ministers have indicated their willingness to resign as soon as they return to Oslo.

Detailed plans have been prepared for restoring normal life in Norway within a year after the liberation. As reported by the United Press on April 15, they were formulated in secret conferences with delegates from Norwegian industries, who shuttled back and forth between London and Norway. King Haakon, more popular than ever before, will return to Norway as soon as any part of the country has been liberated. Some 12,000 Norwegians who have been training in Sweden will take over police duties immediately. Newspapers will begin publication the second day after liberation. Fishing, whaling, and commerce will be quickly resumed. Sweden will furnish tools and steel for industrial reconstruction in accordance with a trade agreement already signed.

The position of the governments of Norway, the Netherlands, and Belgium has recently been strengthened by an agreement which they have signed with Great Britain and the United States concerning the control of civil affairs in those countries during the struggle for liberation. Norway has also signed a similar pact with Russia. The Norwegian Foreign Minister, Trygbe Lie, had the satisfaction of seeing his draft proposals serve as blueprint both for the agreements signed in London and for the Czechoslovak-Russian pact.

KEPT IN LIMBO

One great purpose motivates the Czechoslovaks in exile—the nullification of the Munich pact, which betrayed their nation. In July, 1940, Benes succeeded in gaining London's recognition of his government, and in that recognition was implicit rejection of the pact. In 1942 De Gaulle canceled France's signature. Since Mussolini's signature is no longer valid, Hitler's alone remains.

During the First World War Eduard Benes was in the forefront of the battle for democratic principles and for recognition of the sovereignty of the small nations of Southeastern Europe. Today he continues in the same course. But he knows that Czechoslovakia, facing a permanently hostile Germany, must stand with Russia. More than that, he believes that the mission of his small nation is to further, 25 far as moral action can, mutual understanding among the great powers and to neutralize any effort to separate Russia from the West.

No abyse exists between Benes's government in London and the people of Czechoslovakia. Many observers believe, in fact, that Benes has the support of 90 per cent of his people and that the bewilderment and disappointment which followed his resignation have completely disappeared. Nor do the complicated relations between Czechs and Slovaks limit his authority. Slovakia became an "independent" state under Hitler. Benes understands that the Slovak people were not responsible—only some separatist leaders—and that anti-Slovak action would undermine the unity of the Czechoslovak nation.

The Slovak people agree. In 1943 the Slovak under ground, in what is known as the Bratislava Memoran dum, declared that the "Czechoslovak government ir London is the only legal government of our nation." Five Slovaks are on Benes's council. Many of the diplo matic representatives of Czechoslovakia in the capital of the Allied nations are Slovaks, Ambassador Hurbar in Washington is one. Three Slovak brigades now serving with the Red Army take orders from the Czecho slovak embassy in Moscow.

The Czechoslovak program for the post-war world i generally considered one of the best yet formulated be an exiled government. It seeks a more democratic economy and a decentralized administration for Czechoslovaks, and Ruthenians. An agreement placing Czechoslovak territory under the Soviet military command as is liberated by Russian armies, but providing that Czech administration shall take over when the area in longer a battle zone, was recently announced by the government in London.

Through the heroism of the resistance, France has regained its national honor. In Algiers under the leader ship of General de Gaulle, the Committee of Nationa Liberation, which recently renamed itself the Provisiona Government, is planning a new France, which can provide inspiration for the democratic reconstruction of a Europe.

Unfortunately, not all French exiles are sharing is the revival of the great French tradition. Many liber leaders, like Henri Laugier, Jacques Maritain, Emi Buré, Pierre Cot, Paul Rivet, and Henri Forcillon, who untimely death robbed France of one of its wisest patrots, have served the cause of French liberation brave and effectively. But others have proved poor represent tives of the new France. A certain decadent analytic spirit has pervaded their writings, and Bonapartism hen been stronger than the impulse of the French Revolutio When you read Henri de Kerillis, you are faced with tame dilemma which tortured France between the twars: fascism or anti-fascism, democracy or totalitaria ism, Franco or Stalin, Giraud or De Gaulle. Whe Pertinax discusses the small nations of the Balkans, page of the staling of the staling of the Balkans, page of the staling of the stali ticularly the Mihailovich-Tito issue, he supports the rulers, not the people. He follows the same line as Alexis Leger, former Permanent Secretary of the French Foreign Office, who for a decade before the war bolstered the dictatorial governments of Yugoslavia, Rumania, and Greece. Many French people regret that Leger's influence should be so strong in Washington today.

But French underground leaders continue to arrive in Algiers. The Fourth Republic is taking shape. Though De Gaulle is still fighting for his formal recognition, it seems fairly certain now that liberated France will be governed, at least provisionally, by the committee of National Liberation and the underground, in cooperation with the Allied Military Government. The forces of democratic France are united in Algiers. The Frenchmen who look to the past cannot obscure the clear design of that unity—a unity around which the new Europe aspires to be rebuilt.

[In Part II of this article, to appear next week, Mr. Raditsa will discuss the Yugoslav, Greek, and Polish governments in exile and the free movements.]

When War Contracts End

BY KARL KEYERLEBER

EARLY three months have passed since Senators Murray and George introduced a joint bill setting up machinery to facilitate the settlement of canceled war contracts and the reconversion of industry. It is two months since the Baruch-Hancock report tressed the importance of acting promptly. Yet we still ack legislation which will assure not only an orderly reurn to the production of civilian goods after the war but he effective harnessing of our industrial power to the lemands of the coming invasion.

The problem is not one for tomorrow but for today. Iready government agencies have canceled fifteen bilion dollars' worth of war orders—about three times the ollar value of all contracts settled after victory was won a the last war. Slow settlements have impeded war prouction. They have tied up materials and factories. Legistion to simplify procedure, to unify policy, and to asure prompt payment is needed urgently.

The International Harvester Company, operating a overnment-owned plant in Bettendorf, Iowa, lost a 217,000,000 tank contract last year after only thirteen nks had been turned out. It took three months to transorm the plant into a producer of prime movers to haul eavy cannon, which the army now needs more than nks. The paper work of the settlement is taking much riger; more than a year after cancelation it is still untished.

Harvester is a $500,000,000 concern, and the delay d not seriously interfere with its other war work. Less runate was the Dover Stamping and Manufacturing ompany of Cambridge, Massachusetts, which also had contract canceled last year—one for war-head coniners for torpedoes. According to the company's presint, J. Whitney Bowen, testifying before Senator urray's subcommittee on contract termination, "beteen the time the contract was canceled and the time of the partial payment of $93,798 in July, five months had elapsed, and during that time we had a factory ready and willing and anxious to produce war products but we were unable to do so."

The Hazeltine Electronics Company of New York had $5,500,000 contract for Radar equipment which was terminated by the navy. The settlement took more than a year, and for much of that period scarce materials needed elsewhere by the war program were frozen tight in the warehouses of Hazeltine suppliers.

The settlement of a canceled war contract as conducted at present is a tremendous accounting job. International Harvester has a hundred employees devoting their full time to it. An executive of a big Detroit corporation told me that one division of his firm had thirty-two persons working on it full time and sixty-four part time. In this company's plants work is going forward on 40,000 separate government contracts. The man with whom I talked looks forward gloomily to the time when his entire office staff will be occupied with settling and auditing the claims of thousands of subcontractors.

One contractor is carefully preserving a vault full of time cards—millions of them—against the day when some federal auditor may want to check on the number of workers engaged on a terminated contract. Another man has a warehouse full of old packing cases. Technically they are government property, and the law is specific: government property may not be disposed of until all the proper forms have been filled out.

Cancelations have been running at the rate of $1,500,000 a month, and unsettled claims are piling up. One Cleveland contractor still hasn't got his money for a claim presented in November, 1942, for a contract that was canceled by the Maritime Commission. It is obvious that new methods are needed to speed up the process. The old structure of multiple government checks and audits must be overhauled, and it is for Congress to say how it is to be done.

The George-Murray bill passed by the Senate and now awaiting action by the House creates an office of contract settlement headed by a $12,000-a-year director and a nine-man advisory board of government officials, including the Attorney General and the Secretaries of War, the Navy, and the Treasury. The director and the board are charged with coordinating policy, but terminations are left in the hands of the procurement agencies which let the contracts. In other words, the bill is designed to secure a uniform policy but to decentralize the handling of claims in order to avoid a logjam in some Washington filing cabinet. The General Accounting Office may not review settlements except for fraud.

One section of the bill provides for the prompt removal of materials. Before factories can turn to new war work or civilian manufacture, they must be cleared of government machinery, work in process, and stocks of parts and materials. If the government does not provide for removal of such stuff in sixty days, the contractor may do so. Other sections deal with advance payment and interim financing to keep companies liquid. Contractors may receive up to 90 per cent of their claim without waiting for a final settlement. Some concerns, notably in the aircraft industry, have so much working capital tied up in inventory that they would be pinched by any delay.

A provision for over-all settlement permits a company which has many contracts canceled to file a claim covering all of them, instead of preparing individual claims. This reduces accounting and bookkeeping. Informal contracts are authorized to assure payment to a contractor who to save time loaded himself up with parts and materials before he got a contract. The requirement of thirty days' advance notice of cancelation, not always possible, is to prevent such a situation as that which occurred at Lowell, Massachusetts, last November when an ordnance plant employing 5,700 persons was shut down. Workers were told on a Saturday afternoon that it was their last day on the job. Neither they nor the company had a chance to plan for termination day. Provision is made for court appeal and umpires to rule on disputed claims through an expansion of the Court of Claims.

The bill cuts through red tape and sacrifices traditional government safeguards against inflated charges because of the pressing necessity for speed. Overpayments may occasionally be obtained by avaricious contractors. In this connection I cannot do better than quote the words of Colonel Bryan Houston, tough chief of the army's contract-termination branch. Speaking before a group of automobile executives, he said: "You are going to pay some two hundred billion dollars for this war. Your children and your grandchildren will be paying on it.

The difference between the most penurious, hard-fisted, careful, ruinously slow settlement which could be made of these terminations and the most liberal which could be made won't amount to five hundred million dollars. It is very poor poker playing, dice shooting, or business, to gamble a two-hundred-billion-dollar peace against a quarter of one per cent."

THE VAN SWERINGEN BROTHERS, astute wielders of vast financial power through the manipulation of other people's money, are at present endeavoring to teach an important group of security holders in the Allegheny Corporation, the key holding company in the Van Sweringen railroad empire, that a bond, even when equipped with a fancy title, need not carry with it the protective safeguards implied by its name.—PETER HELMOOP NOYES, May 2, 1934.

IN BERLIN ARE three Americans representing American firms which are helping Germany to build up the best air fleet in Europe. It is an open secret in foreign official quarters in Berlin that the Hitler regime has already ordered and received from British and American companies special parts for the making of 2,500 modern bombing and fighting planes. The companies supplying these parts are Pratt and Whitney, Curtiss-Wright, and Douglas Aircraft in the United States, and the firms of Vickers and of Armstrong, Sidley in England.—May 9, 1934.

DEAR READERS of The Nation: On the twenty-seventh day of this July I will begin my nineteenth year in durance vile for a crime that I was acquitted of on the twenty-fourth day of last May. With the verdict of "Not Guilty" still ringing in my ears, the judge admonished all to remain seated while the bailiff snapped the handcuffs on me and speeded me back to San Quentin Prison in less than one hour—for the rest of my natural life. That is Democratic Capitalist Class Justice—with a vengeance. . . . Sincerely, TOM MOONEY (31921). (ADVT.)—May 16, 1934.

THE DOLLFUSS GOVERNMENT in all private and public pronouncements continues to speak of the "Socialist revolution" in February. The Nazis a year ago "saved" Germany from the "Marxist" danger; the Austrians similarly put all the blame for the February bloodshed on the Socialists. This lie should be spiked once for all. . . . The Austrian Socialists were about as aggressive as the Belgians were in 1914.—JOHN GUNTHER, May 16, 1934.

DURING THE FEVERISH DAYS when leaders of the steel industry were discussing the proposed code of fair competition prior to its submission to the NRA, one of the lesser rulers asked one of the greater ones to explain a certain obscure provision. The latter replied without a moment's hesiatation: "There is no mystery about this code. It just means that the industry is going to be run as it has always been run, only more so." The last three words furnish the key to an understanding of the steel code.—May 23, 1934.

Mexico's War-Time Boom

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

TN TEN years Mexico has changed impressively. The capital has lost nothing of its charm. Mexicans have too profound a sense of fitness to allow material progress to affect the beauty of their cities. The capital has spread outward into new suburbs. The old buildings have not been affronted by the appearance of new, modern structures rising defiantly in their faces. There is no square whose trees confront the stare of wide modern windows. But in the new developments rebuilding can be carried on without hesitation, and it is being carried on very rapidly indeed. New streets are opened from one week to the next. New houses appear practically overnight. Some of them are handsome villas, others homes for workers. Even in the most modest of them either the architect or the tenant has applied a touch of good taste.

The capital grows. It must grow in order to absorb the rapidly increasing population. According to a report issued by the Departamento Central (the office of the Mayor), published while I was there, Mexico City has 2,200,000 inhabitants. It was a surprising figure to me. Since my stay in Mexico in 1931-33 the population has almost doubled. And not only the capital has grown. Acapulco has been transformed from a beach with a ew hotels and a few modest houses into a seaside resort hat can compete with any in the world. Here too a fever of construction is evident. People pay any price for land. Where a square meter of land formerly brought two pesos, it is now sold for fifty. In Cuernavaca and Taxco the hotels cannot handle the influx of visitors. In order o spend a week-end there, reservations must be made wo weeks ahead. As always Americans frequent these places of recreation, but in some of them Mexicans are now more numerous than foreigners.

Americans with their dollars continue to pour into Mexico, but the time when $5 a day would provide the ife of a potentate is over. As the supply of money swells, o do the prices, though they have not hampered trade. In a sticle finds a buyer. French decorators now in Mexico told me that they could not fill the many calls for their ervices. If certain branches of production have been mited, it is only because of a lack of raw materials. ailors complain that recently they have not been able a get English woolens. Certain articles which have praccally disappeared from American markets—nylon stockings, French perfumes, wines of a certain vintage—are ure in Mexico too. But if anyone has any of these goods to offer, he can be certain that people will jump to take them off his hands. He can even advertise in the papers the items he has for sale and ask as high a price as he wishes. Mexico has no rationing system and no price control. Fortunes are made quickly. "The difficulty," said a Mexican friend of mine who is fighting against the evils of this rapid enrichment, "is not in becoming a millionaire in a month. The difficulty is to keep oneself from becoming a millionaire in twenty-four hours."

With all these manifestations of external prosperity, it is natural that people who have not been in Mexico for some years and have visited there in recent months return with fantastic tales about the immense progress of the country. Undoubtedly there is progress, but one must distinguish between solid, lasting prosperity and a war boom.

A certain number of important industrial enterprises have been created. Mexico follows the general trend in Latin America toward increased industrialization. The most important of these new enterprises is the iron and steel company Altos Hornos de México, which has a working capital of sixty million pesos. It will begin to run at full capacity within a year. It is one of the industries that will certainly remain after the war. Fundición de Monterrey, an already existing heavy-industry plant, is being expanded. Certain cement factories are expanding too, and new ones are being built. Sometime in the future Mexico may well be able to export cement. Other factories have been established in connection with heavy industry. There is one, for instance, for the production of tin cans. The chemical industries, particularly the manufacture of drugs, have received great impetus in recent years.

Much more could have been done in this last field. A project was developed at one time to take advantage of the break with the Axis to end forever German control of the chemical industry; it is well known that the German chemical combine was the spearhead of German penetration in Latin America. The authors of the project believed that with the help of North American techniques and machinery a real Mexican chemical industry could be built which would dislodge the Germans entirely and provide a pattern for similar action throughout Latin America. The Mexican group had money to work with. They were even ready to accept American capital so long as it did not attempt to capture a majority of the shares. But there was little understanding of the project in the United States, and the resolute opposition of certain official departments has frustrated the plan.

True, some small drug plants were created, but not on the scale originally conceived.

Negotiations are on the way for building a cellulose industry in Jalisco and a plant for producing artificial silk. In other states similar industrial activity is noticeable. Altos Hornos is promoting the establishment of some small shipyards. A number of industries have been born under the impulse of the boom, as, for instance, a factory to turn out calculating machines. No one expects them to lead an easy life once the war is over.

The tendency toward serious industrialization, toward the creation of actual, positive wealth in Mexico, is offset by a tempest of war-time speculation. This fever is obvious in commercial as well as financial fields. Mexico is selling products to the United States and Central America which no one believed would ever be exported. On a far greater scale than any other is the export of liquora kind of "gin," a kind of "vodka," a kind of "tequila," which resembles the original only in name. To a liter of alcohol a few drops of essence are added, and there is a bottle of gin. So far, the Americans seem to have had little hesitation in drinking the stuff. A single railroad carload of such liquor brings a profit of 80,000 pesos. Great fortunes have been amassed in this trade, and since the mood is to spend, an impression of vast prosperity is created. Obviously, that kind of prosperity is ephemeral.

Curious things have been exported from Mexico in the last years. In 1943, for instance, rosaries were shipped to the value of 2,000,000 pesos, and great quantities of religious ornaments as well. That shows how active the Catholic church has become in recent years. Some of these boom exports have had serious effects on the Mexican population. For a certain time the unrestricted export of guarache made shoe leather very difficult to obtain in Mexico, and the Indian peasants had to go without sandals. In 1943 a quantity of pipas—squash seed—was shipped out of the country in a frenzy of exportation, depriving the Indians of one of their favorite delicacies and an important source of oil and vitamins.

If such exports have injured Mexico, they have not helped the United States. On the other hand, the exportation of metals and man-power has been a great contribution to the American war effort. Nearly 100,000 Mexicans have come into the United States to work.

They would have come in greater numbers if there had not been so many complaints about their treatment here. These complaints have been the subject of heated discussion in Mexico. Only the other day (May 16) the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Mexican Senate heard a vigorous speech by Senator Ramiro Tamez asking for the establishment of a special investigating commission. Tamez described with indignation the way Mexican workers have been exploited in the United States. They have enjoyed none of the social services that American workers enjoy, and they are paid wages far below those of United States citizens. Tamez added that the complaints have come not only from workers in Texas, where discrimination is traditional, but from other states as well. It is a serious affair, and one which gravely affects the relations between the two countries.

The widely circulated weekly Mañana gives us an idea of how Mexicans feel about this subject. "The Nazis in Texas," it said, "are not political partners of the Führer of Germany, but they are slaves of the same prejudices and superstitions. Mexicans have become the victims of the theory that blond hair and blue eyes denote racial superiority."

On the subject of the rise in prices many contradictory figures have been circulated. A high official in the Mexican Department of Finance told me that 180 per cent would be a fair average for the past year. Prices have risen for various reasons. First, monetary inflation. The inflation started in 1936, when General Cárdenas distributed the rich cotton lands in La Laguna. The government found it necessary to make large loans at low rates of interest to the peasants in order that they might work the land they had been given. This new money in circulation forced prices up. But the chief cause of the inflation lies in the tremendous flow of American capital into Mexico. No one knows exactly how much American money fled across the border between December, 1942, and June, 1943, in order to escape taxation. But the monetary reserve of Mexico quadrupled. The inflation became really dangerous.

In order to counteract this process, several measures have recently been taken. Summarizing them briefly:

1. The government of Mexico has begun to import corn, wheat, and butter. That will mean 3,000,000 pesos withdrawn from circulation. Simultaneously with the increased imports, exports are being cut down. While in Mexico I had occasion to see a letter from the Secretary of Finance, Eduardo Suárez, to the governors of the different states outlining this new policy. "No effort," said Secretary Suárez, "must be spared to assure the equilibrium between supply and demand as an essential condition for stabilizing prices, for wiping out the black market, and for ending speculation. To the same end, the government has decided to increase the production of essential articles, especially food, to increase imports, and to restrict exports to the limit, sending out of Mexico only the surplus above what the people need."

- 2. A rise in taxes, especially income taxes. That will force the withdrawal from circulation of some 2,000,000 pesos in 1944.
- 3. A bond sale by the Nacional Financiera, a government-controlled institution, also designed to withdraw money from circulation.

These, of course, are classic methods, and no one pretends that anything new has been invented.

The Nacional Financiera will utilize established commercial techniques, that is to say, it will compete with private business in many fields in an effort to stabilize the economic development of the country and to prevent the concentration of wealth in the hands of a very few private interests. It means a departure from the old policy of holding prices down by decree. In Mexico there is a profound belief that such decrees result in nothing but black markets.

Mexico's double task in the economic field is to prevent its rapid prosperity from running into the same kind of crisis that shook the United States in 1929 and to concentrate upon those enterprises built on solid ground, not for the enrichment of a few but for the benefit of the nation. The trend toward industrialization is already rendering obsolete all the talk about "backward" countries on which big business has relied so comfortably, confounding inter-Americanism with exploitation. Like other Latin American countries Mexico will emerge from the war with its economic structure changed. It will depend very much on the wisdom of the United States whether the friendship of today continues to inspire the trade relations of tomorrow, or whether it is replaced by a sordid kind of economic warfare. I always remember what President Alfonso Lopez of Colombia once told me: "Collaboration between the United States and Latin America means for many of our friends in Washington and New York that we should go on forever hunting through the jungle for materials to make cosmetics for American ladies, but should never dare develop any enterprise that might collide with the interests of American business."

A FRIEND OF OURS reports a distressing sign of intellectual decay among the youth. Chalked on a sidewalk, along with the usual urogenital monosyllables, he saw these words: "Snap, Crackle, Pop."

PUBLISHERS' WEEKLY reports that a reputable New York bookseller has been forbidden to mail out his current catalogue unless he deletes one-line entries of "Candide," "The Well of Loneliness," and Balzac's "Droll Stories." It seems that the Post Office has a list of unprintable titles. We called up the New York Postmaster on that one. The man to whom we were referred was not familiar with any of the books mentioned, but he said yes, there is such a list, and he is in charge of enforcing it. "Candide" has been on the list since 1931, "The Well of Loneliness" since 1933, and "Droll Stories" since 1927. Vincent Miles, Post Office solicitor in Washington, decides what books are unmentionable.

LILLIAN SMITH, author of "Strange Fruit," was recently invited to address the Book Forum of Columbia, South Carolina, but the invitation was withdrawn after a flurry of protests from other organizations. The secretary of the Fortnightly Club, for example, wrote to the chairman of the Forum thus: "The problem of racial adjustment is to us so serious that we are impelled to protest against the discussion of it by Miss Smith. The theme of her book seems to us to be one that better not be tossed about at present. . . . In case she does come may we earnestly ask that she speak on the Orient and not on the Negro problem at all."

OUR GUILELESS CONTEMPORARY, the Saturday Review of Literature, says that Eric Johnston, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, "wants to consolidate the gains of the New Deal." We looked up "consolidate" in the dictionary, and it doesn't mean that at all.

ON APRIL 15 THIS COLUMN reported that Catholics in the diocese of Connecticut were not allowed to have anything to do with Russian War Relief. A few days later Mrs. B. D. Burhoe, secretary of the interfaith committee of Russian War Relief, phoned us and said Connecticut's Catholics had been most generous and cooperative and would we publish an official denial of the item. We said we would be glad to. The denial came last week. Here it is: "Dear Mrs. Burhoe: I am pleased to inform you that there is no truth in the statement which you tell me appeared in The Nation of April 15, 1944. Catholics of the diocese of Hartford are entirely free to participate in Russian War Relief. I have never asked my people to disregard an appeal for charity from any source. With all good wishes, I am sincerely yours, Maurice F. McAuliffe, Bishop of Hartford."

The Tasks Ahead in France

BY JULES MOCH

H

IN A previous article I discussed the two tasks which will be the first responsibility of the government of liberated France—the repatriation of the millions of persons who have been driven from their homes and the provision of food for a large percentage of the population. The next thing to be done will be to find jobs for the returning men, at least for all those who do not live on the land. Where are they going to go to work? In their old factories? In most cases only the walls of the factories will be standing. Or if the buildings have escaped destruction, it will be found that the machinery has been removed, probably to Central Europe. Or if the machinery is intact, there will be no power to turn the wheels, no raw materials to feed it. In former highly industrialized regions large numbers of skilled operatives will be unable to find work. At the same time in other regions there may be a shortage of labor-men will be needed to repair highways and railroads, to build houses, to quarry stone, to make cement and bricks.

Since it would not be right to allow men to remain idle because their special skills cannot be utilized when labor is needed in other fields, it will be necessary for the government to undertake some kind of compulsory allocation of man-power. To many this will seem like an inhuman proposal. They will ask if heavy labor, perhaps in another part of the country, is going to be required of men who are exhausted by privations and have been separated from their families for years. The weight of this argument should not be underestimated. On the other hand, the government will be obligated to restore the industries on which the country's economic life depends—namely, transportation, shipping, power, coal mining, and building.

Its ability to do so will depend in large part on its adoption of a trade-union and wage policy that conforms to the wishes of the workers. I expect the trade unions to offer no obstacles. Purged of their traitors, they will be reconstituted with the same full liberty that was formerly theirs and will play a major role in the republic of the future. As to wages, Vichy and the German conquerors have systematically lowered the purchasing power of wages in order to force workers into the theoretically more productive German industries. Since 1939 wages have risen 50 per cent, while prices on the official market have tripled and on the black market multiplied ten times. Monetary considerations will make it impossible to restore the purchasing power of wages to 1939 levels—such action, moreover, would have no point owing to the scarcity of consumers' goods—but a general, immediate, and substantial rise must be effected. The problem is complicated by the necessity of maintaining a proper relation between buying power and the amount of goods available. To meet this condition two solutions have been suggested. One is to revise wage scales upward as larger amounts of rationed foods become available; the other is to pay wages partly in food or in ration tickets.

What is to be the length of the work week in liberated France? After 1936 many social-welfare measures were introduced in France, among them the law for a forty-hour week. This law was modified to strengthen our war production, but it has never been abrogated. Similarly, the law that entitles every salaried worker in France to two weeks' vacation with pay after one year of service remains on the statutes. Obviously, after the liberation, maximum production will be required in the essential industries. In these industries, therefore, hours must be lengthened. The unions themselves do not dispute it.

But while there is complete agreement about the object to be attained, people are divided about the method to be used. One school of thought holds that the 1936 law must stand; that in the interest of the international working class France must remain the champion of the forty-hour week. It proposes, therefore, that industries be divided into two classes: those essential to reconstruction, in which overtime will be paid automatically, and those not essential, in which overtime will be permitted only under the circumstances specifically cited in the law of 1936 and after careful investigation as to its necessity. A second school of thought would apply the forty-hour law only in non-essential industries and establish a longer work week for essential industries. The two schools are united in insisting that any modification of the forty-hour law must be obtained by legislative procedure.

This debate is relatively unimportant. What is important is the complete unanimity of opinion on the need for a longer work week to speed the reconstruction of the country. Accordingly, both the National Committee and the Assembly are working on a legislative program that will legalize the necessary action.

In Algiers today the government is proceeding on the principle that it has not the right to institute any profound changes in the structure of the French state. Only the French people, it holds, have that right. Only a Constituent Assembly, duly elected by universal suffrage, can set the French house in order. But some political decisions cannot wait on the repatriation of prisoners and deportees, on the preparation of ballots, on the presentation of issues in campaign speeches. And for that reason the following compromise has been reached in Algiers: the present provisional government shall have the right to initiate certain far-reaching reforms if no other solution of the particular problem is immediately possible; such measures to be enacted only with the full consent of the Consultative Assembly, the present representative body of the French people.

The industrial reconstruction of France is one of the problems that cannot await the action of a Constituent Assembly. Factories must start operation at once to supply the things the people need. But under whose ownership and direction? To reestablish the status quo ante would mean in many cases to return the factories to men who collaborated with the enemy. Yet to decide that the nation should run its key industries itself would introduce a profound change in the nature of our regime. So far the government has arrived at no concrete proposal. However, in a speech delivered before the Assembly on March 18, 1944, General De Gaulle said: "The French democracy must insure to everyone the right to work and guarantee the dignity and security of all through an economic system planned with a view to developing our national resources and not to furthering private interests. In this system the great sources of national wealth will belong to the nation, and the direction and control of this wealth by the state will be undertaken with the assistance of workers and entrepreneurs." In other words, De Gaulle plans a French "New Deal" such as was first outlined by Léon Blum in 1936.

It is clear that the head of the government is not in principle opposed to profound changes in the economic structure of the country. Indeed, many men who yesterday defended liberal capitalism admit today the failure of the system and seek economic regeneration through democratic socialism, even though they may not admit to themselves that they are thinking as socialists. The Assembly has been thinking along those lines, and the economic program it has worked out is the result. At the end of last year its Commission of Economic Affairs, composed of men of diverse political convictions, unanimously adopted the following principles, as proposed by a Socialist member:

- 1. The corporate system of craft and professional organization instituted by Vichy must be abolished.
- 2. Complete freedom of operation cannot be granted to all industries on the day of liberation.
- 3. Enemy holdings in French industries must be confiscated by the state.

Last Chance!

Two years of betraying the people on every important issue which has arisen should have ruined the hope of a democratic victory in this war. But the Allies have greater luck than they deserve. In the invasion a tremendous opportunity is still open to them. The great day approaching is, from any point of view, a momentous human event; hundreds of millions of men all over the earth are placing their hope in it. Its success will raise once more the spirits of those who have been disheartened by the dealings with Darlan, by the recognition of Badoglio, by the continued appeasement of Franco. Here is the eleventh hour, when an end can be put to the policy of fighting fascism in alliance with fascists. Here is the last chance to win the political war.

- 4. Certain industries must be operated by the government in the common interest.
- 5. Certain others may be operated by private interests under strict government control.
- 6. The rest may operate free of all government interference.

Some months later "a broad program of government action and national reconstruction" embodying substantially these proposals was submitted to the Assembly by the Socialist delegation—fifteen of the eighty members. A large number of delegates from metropolitan France, after giving it careful study, declared that it represented the aspirations of the Resistance and that they would support it. The final text has been signed by about fifty members of the Assembly and is thus assured of majority support when it comes up for discussion again. The eight Communist members have not yet pledged definite support, though they agree with the plan in principle.

The original text proposed the "nationalization of economic, financial, and commercial enterprises essential to the life of the nation." In the final draft the word "socialization" was substituted for "nationalization" on the demand of the Resistance delegates, who wanted their position clearly defined. The signatories include a Dominican monk, an army officer in active service, half a dozen Radicals, an equal number of men who might be classed as conservative, six or more Social Catholics, and four or five progressives with no party affiliation. The others have never taken any stand on political or economic questions. Not a single Marxist is among them.

These men have seen the moral and material collapse of the old economic structure. They have seen its leaders collaborating with the enemy while the French workers defied the Laval "levy" and took to the maquis to avoid contributing to the German war effort. They recognize that the events of the last few years have demonstrated the bankruptcy of the business high bourgeoisie and the soundness of the working class. The lessons of Russia's national planning have not been lost on them. Too attached to democratic and parliamentary forms of government to be won over to communism, they have chosen the course long ago pointed out to them by democratic Socialists.

De Gaulle once said that France had been shaken to its depths by its recent sufferings. "But," he added, "the deeper the soil is worked, the richer the harvest."

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

N THE first day of war, textile goods of every kind, including clothing, were rationed in Germany. Since then, for four and a half years, no one has been able to buy enough to replace what wore out. Ten months ago, in August, 1943, all ration points for textile goods were canceled, and their sale, except to victims of air raids, was stopped for the duration.

While people's closets were being thinned out by the impossibility of replacing worn articles, the process was hastened by insistent new demands. In the winter of 1941 a murderous cold wave caught the army in Russia unprepared, and Dr. Goebbels, in desperation, cried out for help from private individuals. Every household was put under strong pressure to contribute all the warm bedding, blankets, overcoats, and suits that it could possibly spare. A year later a similar collection, scarcely less urgent, was organized by Dr. Ley for the benefit of the arms workers. After that, private stocks were considered exhausted. Even the traditional annual appeal for the "Winter Aid" was omitted in 1943.

But this May the situation was such that another attempt was made to gather a few leavings from a field already raked clean. The appeal was signed this time by an unknown Franz Heck who called himself "commissioner for the collection and utilization of salvage and Reich delegate of the Nazi Party." After boasting of the government's achievements in providing clothing—"no soldier at the front and no arms worker has to go in rags"—the notice called on people to offer up their last possessions.

The campaign is proceeding under the slogan "The Nation Needs Textiles." Money prizes are offered for good ideas. The radio instructs collectors on how to get results:

Suppose Frau Mayer visits Frau Lehman to ask her to give something for the textile collection. Frau Lehman may refuse, not without some superficial justification, on the ground that she has nothing left to give. Generally it will be enough for Frau Mayer to ask Frau Lehman to look and see. Some discarded garment is sure to be found. Old socks and ties may be discovered in forgotten suitcases. Hunting for them will be fun.

The powerful Schwarze Korps, organ of the powerful Himmler, on April 20 sharply rebuked fathers who forbid their minor sons in uniform to marry because they are too young. On the contrary, said the S. S. paper, German boys should marry some time before they go to the front (as a rule they go when they are eighteen). After the last war 1,500,000 girls remained unmarried and had no children. If they had had a chance to bear two children apiece, 3,000,000 German babies would have been brought into the world, half of whom would have been males. As a result, at the outbreak of the Second World War Germany would have had 1,500,000 more soldiers, 100 divisions. With these it would long ago have brought the war to a victorious close.

This time, the Schwarze Korps declared, there must be no such waste of possible resources. Young men today must discharge their duty before they go to the front, and girls must be made productive.

At this point the paper made an arresting statement: "Then, even if the present war is lost, tomorrow's war can be won by the children of today's soldiers." A great deal of nonsense has been published in this country about Germany's secret preparations for a third world war. The sentence quoted is, so far as this writer knows, the first authoritative utterance on the subject.

A Swiss paper, the Arbeiter Zeitung of Schaffhausen, on May 6 printed a few anecdotes which, in the opinion of the contributor, revealed how people act and feel in the Reich today.

A German living in Switzerland returned to Munich, his former home, and met some old friends in a restaurant. He asked them what they thought of Germany's chances of winning the war. They answered with one voice, "We shall win." Walking home some hours later with one of the company, a former schoolmate, the man asked the same question again. Now the answer was: "What do you mean? We lost the war long ago. Germany is doomed. Not one stone is being left on another in our cities. How can we dream of winning?"

A well-dressed woman stood next to an old workman during an air raid. After a while she said grimly, "You see, the British have no more planes. These are the last ones they have. We alone have great numbers of airplanes left." The workman, after a second's surprise, understood her and joined in the tune.

A foreign worker complained to a German colleague about the constant air attacks, which prevented him from sleeping. "Nobody can stand this long," he said. The German answered, "Man, be hard! Become harder! Eat concrete; then you'll become hard. Germany needs hard men, and concrete is wonderful to make things hard."

Soviet Life—a Close-up

MY LIVES IN RUSSIA. By Markoosha Fischer. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

AT A time when the most wary of us tend, perhaps in self-defense, to think of the people of the world not as minute particulars of flesh and blood but as units in the round numbers of populations, army divisions, and casualty lists, it is good to read such a book as "My Lives in Russia," which takes us behind the giant scenes of the world's most imposing dictatorship and acquaints us intimately with the men, women, and children who live in it.

Mrs. Fischer is herself a Russian and was committed early to the revolution. She left her native land in 1915 vowing never to set foot on Russian soil as long as carrism ruled. She did not return until 1922, but from 1917 on she was associated, as secretary and translator in the several languages she had acquired, with representatives of the Soviet regime in various countries. After 1922 she lived and worked abroad for another period of years, but from 1927 to 1939 she lived steadily in Russia. She was the wife of a foreign correspondent, but as a Russian and an enthusiastic supporter of the Bolshevik regime she participated fully in Soviet life. The fact that she had two children growing up made her involvement all the more complete.

We see the mighty events of those twelve years—collectivization, the drive on the kulak, the five-year plans, the great purge, the preparations for war—not merely as historical facts and political issues but as the day-by-day and year-by-year experience of a Russian mother, of her neighbors and friends, of her children and their companions.

When Mrs. Fischer returned to Russia in 1927 she was conscious of a pressure toward conformity in every phase of life which had not existed in 1922. As late as 1928, however, Pravda often printed a supplement called The Oppositionists' Page, and the Russian passion for discussion still had scope. But the pressure grew. With the drive on the kulak the government loosed a new class war, and with the First Five-Year Plan came the prohibition of all criticism. Living conditions were difficult, but life was exciting nevertheless. Mrs. Fischer pictures very vividly the energy and pride of the Russians and their faith in the future, which made all present hardships bearable. She also makes us aware of the strains imposed by industrialization in a backward country where, so to speak, the skills for building the house had to be learned in the course of building it. The tendency to rely more and more on arbitrary methods must be seen in this context, just as the excesses of informing cannot be separated from the weariness and tension of a population hard driven and competing for the bare necessities of life.

Her account is simple and direct, and because it is devoid of both art and artlessness it has the impact of unvarnished truth. It is also a dramatic story, of which the inner tension is supplied by the interplay between the author's deep commitment to the Soviet revolution and her gradual, unwilling disillusionment with the government which ruled, ever more absolutely, in its name. She approved of collectivization; she could not justify the stupidities and cruelty—they are connected—with which it was accompanied. She shared the people's pride in the Five-Year Plan: she could not reconcile herself to the tragedy and corruption that flowed from the prohibition of criticism and the license conferred on all and sundry to become informers. She was thrilled by the promise of the Soviet constitution; she was horrified by the anti-abortion law which was decreed almost simultaneously despite universal opposition, and brutally enforced. She loathed fascism and fascists; but she knew that the friends and neighbors who were taken away in the night were not fascists, and the regime provided her with no real evidence that the Old Bolsheviks were fascists either.

Mrs. Fischer left Russia in 1939 when she finally became convinced that the revolution had been taken over by a dictator who had set his course toward absolute power, nationalism, and even empire. But she is frank to say that the developments which led to her own disillusionment did not shake the loyalty of the Russian masses, that the purge, though it affected thousands, disturbed only a small minority of the population. And reading her book, one understands the reasons. They would be even clearer, I think, if Mrs. Fischer had included here another of her lives—her early years in the Russia of the czars.

Soviet loyalty was, in the first place, motivated not merely by demagogic promises but by very solid and elementary benefits received as the result of a genuine social revolution. To the peasant woman who had lost six children because she had not known how to take care of them, the regime, whatever its faults, was no less perfect than the seventh child which it had saved with its hospitals and clinics and was now educating. To the Jewish mother nothing the Soviet government did could be wrong because it had put an end to pogroms and made her children "as good as anyone else." Such loyalty is made of vital and enduring stuff. The Soviet people today, says Mrs. Fischer, are convinced that there are only two possibilities—the rule of the Soviet government, that is, Stalin, or that of landlords, factory owners, capitalist exploiters, German fascists, and Japanese generals. And their choice is unhesitating.

However unreal the alternatives may seem, one cannot condemn the choice. For it indicates that the loyalty of the Russian people is still to a large extent loyalty to a set of ideas rather than to any leader. If that is so, it holds at least the promise of a healthy future development.

"My Lives in Russia" will be called anti-Soviet by the professional Stalinists. It will be deplored by those who think that truth should have its closed seasons. But it is hardly a secret that Russia is a dictatorship—and in a sense Mrs. Fischer merely documents what we already knew. Certainly her account of the purge and its shattering effect on human lives and character will win no converts for dictatorship and police rule-which is epitomized for me in the senseless confrontation of a child who must be told that his father is a traitor and the mother who must make him believe it. But just as certainly Mrs. Fischer's book, because it is pro-human, will generate understanding and affection for the Russian people. And it is they, after all, who are our allies. Her book dispels the condescending view that "those poor devils" the Russians have neither the desire nor the capacity for the democratic way of life. Because she does not gloss over the bad aspects of Soviet life we believe her as witness of the good-"human equality, economic progress without exploitation, education of the masses, social security, lack of racial discrimination." In this sense her book provides, I think, a basis for communication with the Russian people. And one cannot read Mrs. Fischer's account of their sealed existence without feeling that one hope of democratic development in Soviet Russia lies in free association and exchange with the outside world.

Portrait of a King

CONTEMPORARY ITALY: ITS INTELLECTUAL AND MORAL ORIGINS. By Count Carlo Sforza. Translated by Drake and Denise De Kay, E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

THIS book is no formal analysis of the forces that have shaped the Italy of today. Rather, it picks out one or another element in the story that appeals to the author, without pretense of proportion. Its chapters are small essays, sometimes prose poems, on episodes in Italian history since the sixteenth century which the author has deeply studied or in which he has intimately participated. The earlier part of this study is stimulating reading for one who already knows his Italian history pretty well. But it is the latter portion, covering the past four decades, that packs a punch through the first-hand, sometimes gossipy contributions from the author's personal experience.

Count Sforza is today a member of the government—albeit with some formal reservations—of King Victor Emmanuel III. When he went from America to Italy a few months ago, he left with his publisher this manuscript, which amply explains his reported pledge of that time never to join a Cabinet under the present king or his son. The motive for his subsequent reversal of conviction is not implicit anywhere in this book.

Sforza is firmly convinced that Fascism would have been destroyed, virtually by a whiff of grapeshot, at the time of the "March on Rome" if Victor Emmanuel had signed the decree for martial law which Premier Facta twice timorously presented to him on instructions from his Cabinet. He says, "I am convinced that [the King] would have signed if an energetic Prime Minister had instructed him that it was his duty, and constitutional king, to sign." He quotes Margherita, the Queen Mother, to the effect that "Victor believes and obeys Elena and the Prime Minister in office, whoever he happens to be."

In support of this assertion Sforza mentions one occasion on which the King did obey a minister of his—Foreign Minister Sforza. Admiral Millo was believed to be hesitating as to whether to side with d'Annunzio in Fiume. Sforza sketched a letter for the King's signature reminding the Admiral of his soldier's oath of loyalty. "The King hesitated, quibbled: 'I'm willing to do anything you ask me, but if I am not listened to, if I am scoffed at, won't it be still worse?" (P.S. He signed.)

Victor's cousin, the Duke of Aosta, was willing to become a pawn in Mussolini's intrigue because he "had contracted a bad attack of thronitis: for two years he did not leave me a moment's peace, trying to persuade me to have him appointed King of Poland, King of Hungary. . . . When I mentioned it to the King he used to mutter: "If it were only that. . . ."

When the documents which clearly implicated Mussolini as organizer of the assassination of Matteotti were presented to the King, he "stammered: 'I am not a judge; these things ought not to be told to me. . . .' He did not realize that at that precise moment, despite himself, he became an accomplice."

But there were other accomplices in the crimes of Fascism—some blind and well-intentioned, some alert and crafty. Immediately after the Matteotti murder "only in the embassies of the United States, France, and Great Britain was there any sympathy for Mussolini." As the "undeclared war" of the thirties approached the explosion point, "everyone in Europe was guilty of slackness and of lack of the moral courage to face reality. Everyone was guilty, the right as well as the left—the Tories, the Socialists, and the Communists. . . . But the main guilt in this situation of falsehood, of false prudence, of hypocrisy, of lies, in brave nations like France and England, is the guilt of the French Conservatives and the British Tories," especially because "they let themselves be hynotized by the so-called Bolshevik danger."

There is an acid picture of Sforza's interview with Blum, paralyzed in his policy toward Republican Spain by his fear of the reactionary "half of France." There is the episode of Sforza's interview with Premier Reynaud, a few days before the French collapse in 1940, interrupted by repeated private calls from "his mistress, Countess Hélène de Portes," and "Reynaud's frightened look and lavish excuses." There is Weygand's statement: "This collapse [the defeat of 1940] is sent by God." And here is recorded the offer of the French General Hunzinger, Pétain's emissary to secure armistice terms from Mussolini, to supply to the Fascists a list of the fifty thousand Italian "traitors," Italians resident in France who had volunteered as soldiers in the French army to fight the Germans. Even Mussolini's generals pretended not to understand the infamous offer.

Sforza's book is no connected narrative but rather a series of pin-point spotlights on Italian and European history. It is a panorama of futility. Perhaps its sad moral may be summed up in the author's assertion that "if, during the long Fascist period, there had been one man with even one-quarter of Benes's vision and strength of will in power in London or Paris, the Fascist bluff would have collapsed and peace would have been saved."

A Case of Heart Failure

HEART OF EUROPE! AN ANTHOLOGY OF CREA-TIVE WRITING IN EUROPE, 1920-1940. Edited by Klaus Mann and Hermann Kesten. With an Introduction by Dorothy Canfield Fisher. L. B. Fisher. $5.

THIS anthology has already been criticized for its omissions. But the reviewer of anthologies who merely lists the authors who ought not to have been excluded is performing a rather dubious service. Since selection is a highly personal matter, no anthology can please everyone. To refuse to criticize an anthology on its own terms, to refuse to judge it for what it contains rather than for what it omits, is only to raise anew the question whether anthologies are desirable. The question is reasonable but irrelevant.

Moreover, this is a large anthology, studded with important names. There are twenty-one national sections, each with an introduction by an authority on the subject. The work of 141 chosen authors runs to close on a thousand pages.

If one cannot condemn an anthology purely for its omissions, one must look for the theme which runs through it and holds it together. This is where our difficulties begin with "Heart of Europe." The title is clear. So is Sergeant Mann's intention: "Wherever I may be when this anthology is published, I shall try to serve the very ideas and values discussed and dramatized in its pages." But what are these ideas and values? Mrs. Fisher avers that the "heaped-up treasures" of "Heart of Europe" are rich in remedies for our modern problems. "What better fellow-workers could there be than Maritain, than Croce, than Gorki, than Silone, than Hugo von Hofmannsthal, than Hasek?" In all its appalling unanswerability, the question points to the fallacy on which "Heart of Europe" is based.

The argument is this. The Nazis are barbarians; Maritain, Croce, Gorki, Silone, von Hofmannsthal, and Hasek are not; therefore the latter represent a system of values which we can serve. "Read Ortega y Gasset's shrewd and humane reflections!" writes Mr. Mann—and the exclamation marks are all his own; "Be moved by André Gide's fervent appeal for Joy and Progress. ...!" All distinctions are obliterated in a highbrow version of gay Paree and Congress dances. And highbrow uplift is always the most disgusting kind of uplift. Someone should have warned Messrs. Mann and Kesten: "Be moved by Nietzsche's shrewd and fervent exposure of the cultured Philistine!"

"Heart of Europe" is no heart, only scattered limbs. The material is divided according to nations, but since few national characteristics are ever alleged or even revealed, the categories are entirely arbitrary. The prospect of reading some literature of Balkan and Central European countries is in itself attractive, but the attraction fades after one has read the selections of the present anthology. One turns to Russia with a certain expectancy, for at least since Tolstoy, Chekhov, and Gorki, Russian literature has been redolent of the Russian soil and the Russian people. But "Heart of Europe" reveals neither the old Russia nor the new. White Russia is represented by a nice story by Ivan Bunin, and in a short piece by Remisov we are told that "Dostoevski is Russia." The selection from Soviet literature is much worse than discreet. The only revolutionary piece is a short and trivial poem by Mayakowski. The Gorki excerpt is another nice story. Brief passages from Ehrenburg, Sholokhov, and Alexei Tolstoy do more to disguise than to reveal the character of Soviet literature.

The German section is a strange hodge-podge. Most extraordinary is the choice of German poetry. Three stanzas of a poem by Stefan George, perfunctorily translated, are given with no indication that they are only the second half of a six-stanza poem. There are two short poems by Bert Brecht in translations of which the author disapproves and which were apparently chosen because they appeared in Mr. Mann's magazine, Decision. Aside from George and Brecht, German poetry is represented by Carl Zuckmayer and Else Lasker-Schüler. By way of compensation, Rilke's Second Duino Elegy, superb but unintelligible in translation and out of context, finds its place under the heading Czechoslovakia.

The best section is the French, to which Yvan Goll has written one of the few good introductions among the twenty-three of this weighty tome. But even here, after glancing over the impressive array of names, we are disappointed by the actual content. Six pages of Gide, three of Malraux, and one of Aragon are not much in a book where Thomas Mann goes on about Goethe for thirty, where Ivan Bunin speaks of "Natalie" for twenty-eight, and where Mr. Kesten speaks of "Colonel Kock" for sixteen.

"Heart of Europe," therefore, has much more to be said against it than that it omits important authors. Yet, having found a lack of unity in the book as it stands, a lack of critical sense, and a lack of proportion, we are bound to suggest choices which the editors might have made. They might have made a more historical selection which would have included Berthold Viertel, whose book of poems "Fürchte Dich Nicht!" is almost the only real "literature of exile" which the great exodus of refugees has produced, and Johannes R. Becher, chief of the Moscow group of German exiles, whose poems have been inflammatory propaganda among the invaders. Or they might have had an eye only to literary merit. In that case they would have eliminated most of the poetry, since poetry is largely untranslatable, and have included some dramatic pieces; for drama, despite Klaus Mann, did not "lose its spiritual significance during the period covered in this book," at least not in Germany and Russia. The present anthology is too often invidious or haphazard, and one is never quite sure which. One sometimes has the impression that it gives preference to authors who happened to be in New York or to have friends in New York at the time.

With its fragments of unidentified novels, its limping translations of poems, its scraps of historiography and criticism, its bundles of short stories, its uneven introductions often barely related to the selections that follow, "Heart of Europe" is not a "treasury" but a junk shop; for even valuables become junk when left lying around. This book is not a collection of democratic documents, though it contains Heinrich Mann's splendid Supernational Manifesto. It is not collection of political writing, though it contains some of the literature of war and anti-fascism. It is not a collection of the best writing, though it includes most of the great names of recent European literature. Indeed, if it tells us anything at all about Europe, it is to remind us what a mess European culture will be in even after Hitler is defeated.

Anatomy of Nationalism

THE IDEA OF NATIONALISM: A STUDY OF ITS ORIGINS AND BACKGROUND. By Hans Kohn. The Macmillan Company. $7.50.

A SPRING cleaning of political terminology is in order. It ought to be less easy, for instance, to call anyone we dislike a Communist or a fascist; and it ought to be impossible to use the term "nationalism" anachronistically. It is generally agreed that nationalism as a state of mind does not exist before it becomes consciously manifest and is "unthinkable before the emergence of the modern state." But historians are seemingly as eager to build up the pedigree of successful ideas as genealogists are ready to invent a family tree for a successful business man.

By virtue of several previous works written over a period of more than twenty years Hans Kohn may claim to be an authority on the subject. Indeed, his introduction to the present volume is a reprint of the second chapter of his "World Order" with slight but significant differences: he has shortened a quotation from Sidney Herbert, and he has substituted a motto from Nietzsche for one from Gooch. According to Professor Kohn's competent view, "nationalism is inconceivable without the ideas of popular sovereignty preceding," and none of its attributes is more essential than "the decision to form a nationality," which becomes manifest in a mass consciousness when it recognizes "the nation-state as the ideal form of political organization." Is it not inconsistent, then, to trace nationalism back to the tribal consciousness of Israel and to call the Messianic aspect nationalistic? And to term the English Puritan Revolution "religious nationalism experienced by the English people as a revival of Old Testament nationalism" is no more clarifying than to describe a Roman triga as an automobile drawn by three horses.

"If we designate the tribe by the word 'nation,' as many ancient writers did," wrote Carlton J. Hayes more than ten years ago, "we can readily perceive that 'nationalism' is an attribute of primitive society." However, if we do so we deprive the term of its discriminative value. Some "unconscious and inarticulate" national feeling may have existed before nationalism was born, but if nationalism is consciousness of nationality and of the nation-state, the clarity of the conception is blurred if we assume, as Professor Kohn does, hat "both the idea and the form of nationalism were developed before the age of nationalism." One would hardly call a foetus a child in order to explain what an embryo is.

No one will question Professor Kohn's statement that "German national movement did not arise until the nine-teenth century" and that Herder "was the first representative of German nationalism," of which only Klopstock, Justus Moeser, and Herder "may be regarded as forerunners." But if that is so, why does the author discuss, among the forerunners of nationalism, Frederick II of Prussia, whom Hitler may claim as the "first National Socialist" but who as a matter of fact regarded his subjects as strangers and, accord-

And why discuss Grimmelshausen. who "does not reveal any trace of national feeling," or treat as forerunners of German nationalism Lessing, Kant, and Goethe, who as cosmopolitans were "not concerned with the German nation" and did not have "a German ideal"?

There is no question that Professor Kohn possesses an amazing knowledge of the literature and history of bygone centuries, but I would say, following his example of quoting untranslated German poetry: "In der Beschränkung zeigt sich erst der Meister." His book is scholarly in the German sense of the term: one-fifth of this voluminous study is devoted to footnotes. But fewer quotations and footnotes would have rendered his elaborate work more readable. And though his erudition commands respect, he, no more than Hayes, gives a satisfactory answer to the most intriguing question of our age: Why did evolution reverse itself and change the lovely butterfly of national spirit into the revolting caterpillar of murderous nationalism? Why, indeed, do all ideas degenerate as soon as they become instruments of political power? We hope that Professor Kohn will satisfy our curiosity in his promised volume on the rise and growth of nationalism. RUSTEM VAMBERY

Sharp as Salt

THE SUN AT NOON. By James Hearst. Muscatine, Iowa: The Prairie Press. $1.

TAMES HEARST has collected twenty-six sensitive poems written over the past twelve years or so for this small volume. They are not mere observations of rural life as seen from Pullman window but the product of genuine understanding of farm people and the land on which they live. Here are the hired man, the wife with good straight legs, the old dog; and here too are the hardware merchant and the girl who took a course in Commercial and wound up candling eggs in Chicago. It is a good thing in these days of man-power shortages to reflect on our days of lesser plenty, and Mr. Hearst helps a lot with such evocative poems as On Relief.

> Our glances met as glances always meet and sharp as salt was my surprise. I saw I went down the street A man with want-ads in his eyes. For sale he offered to my sight Without the usual signboard's flash A man bewilderment and fright

Mr. Hearst's thoughts on fence rows might well be given a presentation emblazonment and sent posthaste to sundry tories. This particular row was a ripple of ground where a fence once divided a field in two. But, he points out, "the habit of being divided fades slowly and may not be smoothed out in one growing season."

Can mark down cheap when prices crash . . .

MUSIC

OST of the teaching of the tech-I nique of piano-playing and singing is bad; but the consequences are much worse for the singer than for the pianist. If someone starts with the agile and sensitive fingers that produce facility and beautiful tone he is likely to retain them no matter what he is taught, and to develop them in the mere process of continuing to play now in accordance with the rules of one "method" and now in accordance with the rules of another. But a person who starts with a beautiful voice and who doesn't learn a way of producing the beautiful tones correctly, efficiently, without strain, is likely to lose the ability to produce them at all.

Let it be understood that I make no claim to knowledge of the technique of singing. But some things are obvious to a person with nothing but eyes and ears. To such a person there seems to be a connection between the easy flow of sound that Jennie Tourel produces and the appearance of her face-the rounded open mouth, the relaxed jawas she sings. And conversely he can see that Dorothy Maynor's tremolo is geared exactly with the vibration of her jaw under a mouth that is contracted to a mere slit, and a face that gives other indications of tightened, straining muscles. And he feels like rushing up to her and saying: "Stop doing that to your voice. Already the luscious beauty it had only a few years ago is gone; and the rest will go if you don't stop and find the right way of using it."

The deterioration of Miss Maynor's voice since her New York debut is painful to experience and report; but there is pleasure to be had from her growth as a musician. She sings German Lieder now not with the uncertainty of a person who has been coached but with the assurance of one who has achieved her own understanding of them; she has the power of dramatic projection that can put over one of Mussorgsky's Nursery Songs in an embarrassing English translation. But her assurance and understanding and dramatic power are greatest in Negro spirituals-though a friend told me that colored persons in the audience found her singing of them undignified.

Unfortunately, Virgil Thomson pointed out recently, not even "a correct method of vocal production will prevent premature exhaustion of the vocal powers." Here, for example, was Elisabeth Rethberg, who "during the 1920's and the early 1930's was known far and wide and justly celebrated not only for her beautiful voice but for the impeccable form of her emission," and who the night before had sung "with no certainty about pitch, no control of coloration, no power of sustained line, literally no technical security of any sort." To Mr. Thomson this meant "that factors of physical health, the vitality of the respiratory organs, the stability of the nervous system, all the elements that go in an athlete to make up what is known as muscular tone, are as much involved in the preservation of muscular skills (and singing well is certainly a muscular skill) as method is." And he concluded that "Miss Rethberg's once masterly and very beautiful singing must be accounted henceforth, I am afraid, a memory. Last night's massive gathering of musical celebrities and of warm personal admirers and the somewhat terrifying display of floral set pieces on the stage were merited tribute to one of the great vocal artists of our time."

I have quoted from Mr. Thomson's review not because of laziness but because of admiration of a difficult task well done. I am not sure he was right about the cause of Rethberg's present singing: the fact that her method of production was perfect once does not preclude its being faulty now; for just as a singer who starts with technical difficulties sometimes gets out of them, one who starts without difficulties can get into them; and Rethberg's face as she sang gave me the impression of muscular constriction in place of the proper relaxation. But the singing itself he described correctly; and what I admire is not only the justice of this description but the humanity, tact, and skill of the context in which he placed the heartbreaking facts that had to be told. One detail of the occasion I will add: the remarkable way in which Helmut Baerwald worked ahead of Rethberg to lay out every possible support for her voice with his piano accompaniments.

For May Victor has issued a mere handful of single discs concerned with matters of which the weightiest is the engaging Dance from Falla's "La Vida breve," well performed by Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony and excellently recorded (11-8592; $1). On the reverse side are the Polka and Dance from Shostakovitch's "Golden Age," which I find worse at each rehearing; and on another disc (11-8591; $1) is Samuel Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal," another product of mere facility-this time in modern comedy-overture style-that is well performed by Janssen with his Janssen Symphony of Los Angeles and excellently recorded. On still another (11-8579: $1) is Mein Herr Marquis from Johann Strauss's "Fledermaus," sung in Spanish with a Mexican orchestra under Ernest Roemer by Miliza Korjus, whose voice sounds curiously altered and occasionally somewhat shrill. On the reverse side is some rubbish from a film "Caballería del Imperio." The rest is too inconsequential for comment; and again I must wonder how these things ever came to be re-

ART

EGGY GUGGENHEIM'S spring salon for abstract and surrealist artists under forty (at Art of This Century, through June 3) is a much-needed project. Nothing of very high order is shown, but enough that manifests promise. It is true that these young painters and sculptors lack force and erudition, lack profound obsessions, and aim at felicity more often than complete expression; but most of them have discovered at least the direction in which art must go today in order to be important. Fannie Hillsmith's oil is evidence-it is perhaps the best thing shown-also David Hare's large plaster construction, which needs only a more dominant and insistent rhythm. Ouite a few other items give pause to the observer. In Phyllis Goldstein's brownish painting felicity almost makes up for the absence of strength. Robert Motherwell's large collage is perhaps the most interesting work present, but it lacks a certain forthright emphasis which collage usually requires. Perle Fine's Miró-

Aaron Ehrlich's retarded cubism, Virginia Admiral's dispersed version of Miró, and Jackson Pollock's inflated pastel and gouache-for all their shortcomings, their lack of pressure, these deserve attention. The salon serves its function by arousing curiosity.

The cire-perdue bronze groups of the Brazilian sculptress, Maria Martins (at the Valentine Gallery, through June 3), are perhaps the last completely living manifestation of academic sculpture. The nature of metal almost denies itself in this monstrous and happy proliferation of plant and animal forms. The impulse is baroque, not modern, and is given by Latin colonial décor and tropical luxuriance. This sculpture expresses conceptions which Western European industry imposed on metal in the first excitement of the discovery that it could be poured into the most pliant and complicated shapes. Mme Martins's subject matter-the exhibited fertility of the open-bellied female figures, the different varieties of life growing out of and into each other in the chaos of an un-Biblical creation-animates the form, but is not quite strongly enough felt to produce more than decorative effects. Design is symmetrical; the formal relations are transparent and predictable. This is the crux of the sculptress's problem. But none of this contradicts the fact that she has immense talent. Look carefully at the piece in metal leaf called "Le Couple," and at the "Macumba" group; also the sculptured jewels, which are the best contemporary examples I have seen.

Luis Quintanilla's temperament seems unsuited to the theme—"Totalitarian Europe"—around which a showing of his latest work in water color and crayon is grouped (at the Knoedler Galleries, through June 2). Line is too graceful color too limpid and singing. The formal combinations are delicate but irrelevant to their motifs. Color is the chief trouble. Even Goya and Picasso felt compelled to restrict themselves to black and white when confronting the horrors of war.

FILMS

ATCHING "The White Cliffs of Dover" is like drinking cup after cup of tepid orange pekoe at a rained-out garden party staged by some deep-provincial local of the Englishspeaking Union. Like the Alice Duer Miller "poem" from which it derives, it is a natural for our better Bovaries and their male equivalents. As the whalebone-collar "Tender Comrade," and a lot besides, it may also be unequivocally urged upon anyone who has sufficient appetite for suffering, hatred, and a study of the devout exposition of unqualified snob dream-life. One of the movie trade papers has observed that some well-known Englishman-who apparently did not dare to give his name -thought the film unfortunate, even as an effort to foster Anglo-American amity, but that Lord Halifax liked it very much. This seems adequate check on a story Curt Riess once printed: that on the night before the Anschluss, Halifax kept an Austrian diplomat (I forget the name) who was trying to beg him to avert it waiting for hours on the ground that he was detained with a friend. The diplomat heard their gay laughter, and never saw Halifax. The friend, according to Mr. Riess's story, was von Ribbentrop.

"And the Angels Sing" is a Paramount shy at comedy, involving four small-town sisters (Dorothy Lamour, Betty Hutton, Diana Lynn, and Mimi Chandler) who pursue a dishonest jazzband leader (Fred MacMurray) to Brooklyn. A lot of it-cruel, soggily professional, over-elaborate, and inclined toward snobbish whimsy-makes me tired, and I am especially sorry to watch the exciting potentialities of Diana Lynn turning, more and more, into mere narcissistic chilly cuteness. But Betty Hutton is almost beyond good and evil, so far as I am concerned, and I like a good many bits about the jazz musicians-the vulpine performance of Eddie Foy, Jr. (until he horses it); the jammed, harsh-lighted, pitiful Brooklyn dance hall; the faces of the musicians as they background silly songs; the moment when the band leader leaves the gasping jitterbugs to the mercy of a Hawaiian "prince" "and his Schultz Island Serenaders"; and the show's funniest, most authentic line, warning yapped into the middle of mass attack on the leader-trumpeter, the band's meal-ticket: "Don't hit him on the lip!" #### Mr. Barzun Detects

Dear Sirs: Grateful as I am for the spirit of Miss Bogan's article on the detective story in The Nation for April 22, I find it based on a "crime" against history so serious that I hope I may be permitted to "detect" it.

Miss Bogan states that the rise of the detective story in the nineteenth century represents a return to "form" and logic while the contemporary literature was abandoning rules and waxing anarchical. This seems to me wrong in both parts: nineteenth-century crime stories are anything but remarkable for tight construction, and the standard novels of the period are anything but deficient in form. Miss Bogan cites Poe's "Murders in the Rue Morgue" as establishing the strictest of all rules through the convention of the locked-and-barred room. This is to confuse theme and treatment. It so happens that the literary form of that particular story is not more but less rigorous than that of Poe's fantastic tales, where purposely indefinite atmosphere is bounded by clear and solid form.

And when Poe was creating the models of all future detection, Balzac had certainly achieved technical mastery. So had Dickens, Hugo, Gogol, Hawthorne, and their peers. We may not like their devices, we may scorn their plots and think all their painstaking misapplied, but to accuse them indirectly of slovenliness and anarchy is to echo an old error in defiance of criticism and scholarship.

Even leaving "literature" out of ac-count, the fact remains that any hypothesis like Miss Bogan's which lumps together as "detection" everything from "The Mysteries of Paris" to Sherlock Holmes, is bound for shipwreck. Miss Bogan gives as one of her sources a book on le roman policier by Roger Caillois. I do not know the work, but through her use of it I suspect a treatment that fails to differentiate the French police novel from the detective story. The former is a kind of modernization of the historical novel of adventure: D'Artagnan becomes Lecoq, with no diminution of sensationalism. Similarly, Wilkie Collins, Dickens, and later Dostoevski dabbled in murder and mystery, but all of them belong to the school of adventure; they feed an interest in surprise, suspense, and ultimate justice, not an interest in the process of detection.

The true detective story is something else, much more recent. Though fully formed by the prescient genius of Poe, it had to wait for the popularization of science to become itself popular. Sherlock Holmes, we must not forget, made his first bow in 1887, and if Poe was his remote ancestor, T. H. Huxley and Bertillon were his foster-parents. Miss Bogan would be correct if she said that the true detective story resembles the psuedo-classic drama and the debased opera seria in that it presents endless minute variations of one plot for the pleasure of trained dilettanti. This in itself would help clear up her confusion of genres, as well as destroy her false inferences concerning form and filiation in nineteenth-century literature. JACQUES BARZUN

Miss Bogan Gives Evidence

Dear Sirs: I quote the first paragraph of M. Caillois's essay. I think that Mr. Barzun will agree that there is no tone of denigration here; and that the author is evidently on the side of that romantic revolution in the arts that produced the nineteenth-century novel.

Being, as it were, the domain of license, the novel knows neither limit nor law. Its nature consists in transgressing all rules and in yielding to every temptation that solicits its fancy. Perhaps it is not fortuitous that the remarkable development of the novel in the nineteenth century coincides with the progressive rejection of the rules that once determined the form and content of literary genres. The theater emancipated itself, becoming disengaged from the classic conventions and abandoning the unities of time and place. Poetry at first permits itself all sorts of minor lapses, and finally the most grave liberties; without rhyme and indifferent to meter, verse is hardly to be distinguished from prose except by its typographical arrangement. The whole of literature seems to evade regular frames and traditional norms. Henceforth talent alone is held as the single obligation. Only one restriction is imposed upon the arbitrary will of the author: that he compose his work in his own particular manner. It is not demanded that he conform to preestablished canons, and one judges him on his genius alone. It is for him to chose what new exploits he wishes to attempt and how they are to succeed, if they reach the point of suc-

And Caillois is careful to treat not only the "police novel" as it exists in France but English and American detective stories as well. He even brings out the element of "detection" in "Oedipus Rex": the tracing down of guilt by the "detective" who is himself the assassin, the use of irony in that the audience knows the solution and the characters do not. Then there is "Zadig," and "Caleb Williams"; but several writers other than M. Caillois have recently given the name of "first detective" to Vidoqc. And D. W. Brogan has stated that Wilkie Collins's 'detective novels' were in a way written in order to popularize the idea of an English police force! Albert Thibaudet traces the interesting connection between Hugo's early "Notre Dame de Paris" and Sue's "Les Mystères de Paris." Later Hugo takes his own back by being influenced by "Les Mystères" when writing "Les Misérables."

My article used only a portion of the material I have at hand on the crime novel; I hope to write a more solid essay soon. But I cannot see how the detective story can resemble any genre that is based on "the pleasure of trained dilettanti." Surely the modern public of the subway newsstand and the corner lending library are not dilettantes; nor are they in any formal literary sense, as a whole, trained.

The Shape of Things

WE MUST BE ON GUARD AGAINST SEEING THE Allied successes in Italy in the wrong prospective. With the eastern front momentarily quiescent, with the tale of mounting fury in the western air war as monotonous as it is impressive, the battle for Rome tends to loom larger in the headlines than it will in the history books. Even though the Italian campaign has a definite part in this summer's combined United Nations offensive, it is in a supporting rather than a major role. But while we must not attach undue importance to the effects of the three weeks' offensive, at least until its place in the grand design is clearer, we can view the successes gained so far as a hopeful augury. A skilful and stubborn enemy has been driven from two naturally strong lines, and his flank has been turned by the well-timed exploitation of the Anzio beach-head position. As a result the Germans have been deprived of one of their two main lines of communications, while the second—the Via Cassilina is under fire and likely to be out before this comment is read. If this occurs, Marshal von Kesselring's command will be shattered and what remains south of Rome will only be able to escape by infiltration across the rugged Appenine chain to the Adriatic. The destruction of a small but troublesome German army is in sight, and a rapid Allied advance to the Po line is not too much to hope for; this will bring our forces some 200 miles nearer to Berlin and still closer to southern France.

BULGARIA IS A SENSITIVE SPOT FOR THE Germans; they remember bitterly that it was the first of the Central European powers to break in 1918. It is not surprising, therefore, that they should have reacted energetically to counter Allied, and particularly Russian, pressure on the Bulgars to get out of the war before it is too late. Turkish reports of a Moscow ultimatum calling on the Bulgarian government to break with the Germans or face war with Russia have not been confirmed, but the Soviet press and radio have been issuing strong warnings of the ruinous consequences which continuance in the Nazi camp will entail. Meanwhile the country is in the throes of a prolonged Cabinet crisis following the ousting of Premier Dobri Boshilov, who is said to have been carrying on secret negotiations with Moscow; and the Germans are reported to have reinforced their garrisons in Bulgaria and to have occupied all key positions on the Black Sea coast. In a very confused situation one thing seems tolerably clear: the Bulgarians would be happy to abandon the Axis, and even to lend a hand in expelling the Germans, if they could be sure of retaining their loot, particularly Thrace and Macedonia. But, it is said, Moscow has sternly rejected a bargain along these lines, holding that the disposition of these territories is a matter for the United Nations after the war. So the Bulgars are being forced to choose between fighting Russia and losing the fruits of their German alliance. Both alternatives are unpopular, but if there could be a free choice it is probable that the majority would decide to risk a break with Germany. From the Allied point of view, the crisis is helpful, whatever its outcome, for it preoccupies German forces which Hitler could profitably use elsewhere.

THE TEXAS OF DIES, GARNER, AND O'DANIEL has taken action tantamount to bolting the Democratic Party while seeking to retain all of the symbols and prestige of that party. Under the leadership of the O'Daniel forces, including members of such groups as the Christian American Front and the Southern Anti-Labor Crusade, the state convention voted not to support the Democratic Party nominees for President and Vice-President unless the National Convention restores the twothirds majority nomination rule, comes out in opposition to the recent Supreme Court decision voiding the white primary, and expresses disapproval of efforts to eliminate racial discrimination in the schools. Supporters of the Administration, under the leadership of Jesse Jones and House Leader Sam Rayburn, bolted the convention and held a rump session of their own at which a slate of delegates favorable to President Roosevelt was chosen. The spectacle of a state holding two conventions and naming rival slates to the National Convention is not an uncommon one. Election rules are so lax in many states that nearly every national party convention is faced with the necessity of deciding between rival delegations from one or more states. In this instance, however, there seems little doubt that the anti-New Deal clique controls the party machinery and is in a position to make it difficult for the President to be entered in the Texas election on the Democratic ticket. We suspect, however, that regardless of party labels, the people of Texas will vote overwhelmingly for Mr. Roosevelt in November.

REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN, NOT SATISFIED with having prevented most soldiers from casting their votes this fall, seems determined to gain the further distinction of denying the soldiers their just reward upon demobilization. The GI Bill of Rights, as passed by the House after Rankin had personally blue-penciled many of its provisions, has been well described by Senator Wagner as so discriminatory that "it reads like a bill to deny veterans unemployment benefits." By making unemployment benefits dependent on the length of the veteran's service, some veterans will find themselves entitled to as little as nine weeks' benefits, or much less than if they were unemployed industrial workers. In a crude effort to discourage veterans from joining unions a provision would deny benefits entirely to veterans who are members of a union "which is interested in or participating in a strike." Faced by a Senate demand that some modification be made in these absurd and tightfisted restrictions, Rankin has followed the tactics he used with such devastating success in the soldier-vote bill and refused to budge. Thus one little man, who has fought this war in the committee rooms of Congress. may yet succeed not only in denying the millions of men who risk their lives on the battlefield the right to vote but the protection which a grateful country is anxious to give them.

THE EXCELLENT WAR RECORD OF AMERICAN labor has been marred too often by wildcat strikes, the irresponsibility of local union factions. The strong and courageous statement of R. J. Thomas, president of the United Automobile Workers, places such action in its proper setting. Reminding union members of the terrible cost of victory, he insisted that they see to it that "the acts of isolated handfuls are not permitted to continue, to the detriment of us all. . . . Our union cannot survive if the nation and our soldiers believe that we are obstructing the war effort." Government agencies may be slow, management may be recalcitrant, but the unions must keep their record clean. The streak of anarchism in the American labor movement has left it open to attack: Mr. Thomas correctly emphasizes the fact that labor's influence and standing depend upon the unqualified fulfilment of its pledges.

A SENATE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE HAS issued a sweeping indictment of every government agency involved in the Montgomery Ward seizure, but the worth of its findings is totally invalidated by the Dies-like methods to which it resorted. According to Senator McFarland, a member of the subcommittee who refused to sign the report, no opportunity was afforded for interested parties to give evidence, and the report was based solely on documentary evidence, which might not be complete, and the "conclusions of investigators whose testimony is necessarily hearsay and second or third hand." Fortunately the House committee studying the same case is proceeding with less regard for politics. Although many of its members seem to have made up their minds in advance, it is at least holding open hearings in which the facts are being put on record. Thus Chairman William H. Davis of the WLB was able to point out that the contention that Wards should be exempted from WLB jurisdiction because not primarily engaged in war work would have applied equally to 15,500,000 workers in the distribution, transportation, and service trades. Again, Gerald Reilly of the National Labor Realations Board was able to set forth Sewell Avery's long history of unfair labor practices. If the committee uses these facts in its cross-examination, Mr. Avery's appearance as a witness may be less of a triumph than his publicity men expect.

GERALD L, K. SMITH HELD A PRESS CONFERence at a New York hotel last week. The old rabblerouser was smooth, smiling, poised, and grammatical. Obviously one does not put on the same act for a small gathering of metropolitan newspapermen that one stages for a rally of America Firsters. The only crude thing about the gentleman was his ideas. He and Bob Reynolds are going to tour the country this summer working for the reelection of men like Wheeler, Hoffman, Vandenberg, and Fish; and if the Republicans don't nominate an avowed isolationist for President, Smith intends to run himself as the candidate of the America First Party. He is somewhat upset by Dewey's vague "internationalism." Somebody asked, "If you and Dewey and Roosevelt all run for President, who will be elected?" He pondered for a moment and then said, "It will be between Roosevelt and myself. An internationalist Republican won't have a chance." That was the only time he seemed ill at ease. He laughed shyly, as if he didn't quite believe what he was saying. We wonder what he tells himself when he's alone.

ALL HOPE THAT THE SEDITION TRIAL MIGHT be brought under control by a few stiff fines for contempt of court has vanished in the face of the new filibustering technique developed by the defendants. The government's case is a complex one involving the submission of many hundreds of documents and the calling of scores of witnesses. Under the law each of the twenty-nine defendants may demand the right to read each document before it is submitted as evidence and each has the right to cross-examine every witness. By exercising these traditional rights to the fullest, the defendants would seem to have the power to prolong the trial indefinitely, thus making a farce of democratic justice. It will be noted that the courtroom tactics employed by the defendants closely parallel those used by the Nazis in their bid for national and international power. Like the Nazis, the defendants are bound by no rules of civilized conduct; they violate all canons of taste and decency in order to keep themselves in the public eye; they use the law as a shield when it benefits them, and ride rough-shod over it when it limits their activities; they are contemptuous of all principles of morality as evidence of democratic weakness, yet they are constantly appealing to these same principles to save their skins. The Nazis went far with these tactics but ultimately the "weak" democracies were goaded into meeting fire with fire. If the defendants in the sedition trial continue to make a travesty of the traditional courtroom procedures, they, too, may find that democratic patience is not unlimited.

IN THE TWENTY-FIVE YEARS SINCE IT WAS founded in an era of academic heresy-hunting, the New School for Social Research has created a remarkable place for itself in the whole field of American scholarship. Its purpose, in the words of Alvin Johnson, its director since 1923, has been to provide "a liberal education for mature men and women." And its dominant principleto quote Dr. Johnson again-has been freedom: "freedom of opinion, of teaching, of research, of publication." Dictation to teachers has been barred: "every teacher in the school is under the obligation to follow the truth wherever it may lead." It was only natural that an educational institution with these beliefs should lend a hand to the persecuted scholars of Hitler's Europe; only natural that under the leadership of Dr. Johnson, whose idealism is infused with a strong dose of practical sense, it should have seized the opportunity to make use of the wealth of learning which the Nazis had so recklessly discarded. In 1933 a permanent Graduate Faculty, often referred to as the University in Exile, was added to the school and manned by scholars from central Europe. When France fell, French and Belgian professors were made welcome and helped to start the Ecole Libre, which functions as a French university. The latest addition to the graduate work of the school is an Institute of World Affairs, in which American and foreign experts can cooperate in an extensive and systematic study of international problems. Thus in many different ways the school is contributing to American life and learning. And when the war is over it sees new work to be done providing returned soldiers, too mature for conventional academic programs, with a chance to complete a liberal education.

EVERY NATION READER WILL APPRECIATE the importance of the political problem set forth by J. Alvarez del Vayo in his article, No Unity with Fascists, published in this issue. The question of how far democratic elements, in their undeniable duty to support the war effort, can go in aligning themselves with the right has become particularly acute since Mr. Churchill's address to the House of Commons. We believe that the question must be widely discussed, and consequently we have asked for the opinions of representative political and labor leaders. They will be printed as we receive them.

Churchill's Blunderbuss

NE clue to Mr. Churchill's speech in the House of Commons last week—a speech as puzzling as it was shocking-may be found in his remark: "As this war has progressed, it has become less ideological in its character in my opinion." If we may be blunt, the Prime Minister's opinion in this matter is worth very little, for he has never grasped the ideas that are at stake in the conflict. As Harold Laski has written, in an article which deserves rereading in the light of this speech: "The war he [Mr. Churchill] is waging is not the war history has staged. . . . The immense social forces that have gone to make this war are as outside his consciousness as the principles of the Russian Revolution are outside his understanding." *

Mr. Churchill, indeed, has never understood that Nazism was part of a counter-revolution, transcending the boundaries of Germany, designed to crush government for the people. He could only see the secondary effect—a new attempt to impose German hegemony over Europe and eventually the world. Against that danger he warned his countrymen with all his eloquence. Yet at the same time, since it offered no immediate menace to Britain, he was able to view the fascism of Mussolini and Franco with a large amount of tolerance. He did not realize that these dictatorships were part of a world-wide conspiracy against democracy.

In Churchill's finest hour, when Britain's back was against the wall, when the struggle was one for sheer survival, there would, perhaps, have been some excuse for neglecting ideologies. But now that we are looking forward to framing the peace it is essential that we should learn to recognize the roots of fascism. For if we do not destroy the weed everywhere, if we do not inoculate the political soil against it, we shall find it springing up again to strangle the flowers of peace.

Weeds, unfortunately, seem beneath Mr. Churchill's notice. In his political horticulture he harks back to the formal landscapes of the eighteenth century, and his design for peace is one which Metternich would not disown. He visualizes a world organization controlled by three or four great powers on whom would fall the fask of maintaining a stable order. Twice in his speech he referred to the Anglo-Soviet treaty as a cornerstone of British policy, but he appears to regard it primarily as a mutual agreement not to step on each other's toes. He is prepared to let Stalin have the final word in Eastern Europe, but he seems to regard Western Europe and the Mediterranean as a British sphere of influence.

His plans for this sphere, insofar as he has outlined them, take little account of the popular movements that are so manifest in Nazi-held Europe. Italy, truly, is promised an eventual opportunity to choose any system • The Nation, December 18, 1943.

other than fascism. Meanwhile, Mr. Churchill supports the monarchy and, clearly, hopes to see it survive. For, in general, he clings to constituted authority, however tainted. Even so, it is difficult to understand why, after scolding Turkey for refusing to come into the war on our side, he should positively hug Franco for being so good as not to fight us actively.

Declaring he was "here today to speak kindly words about Spain," Mr. Churchill told the Commons that Spain's internal affairs were solely a matter for the Spaniards. Admitting that the Franco government had been a trifle unneutral on occasion (there was no mention of the Blue Division sent to fight in Russia), he suggested it had made amends by not interfering with our concentration of planes and ships at Gibraltar prior to the North African invasion. The attitude of the Spanish government in the face of this huge display of strength seems to us proof of caution rather than benevolence.

No one in Britain has yet been able to find an adequate explanation for Mr. Churchill's fulsome and uncalledfor eulogy of Franco's Spain. But one result is clear: it has provided some much-needed underpinning for the Spanish dictator, whose throne was beginning to rock as its Nazi foundations crumbled. It has also clarified the State Department's hint that the recent agreement with Spain was softened in deference to British wishes. In appeasing Franco London has taken the lead.

Presumably one bad policy deserves another. When he turned to France, Mr. Churchill obviously spoke from a Washington brief, although making interpolations of his own designed to diminish French anger. The result was that this section of his speech gave a curious effect of blowing hot and cold. He began by paying a tribute to the military and material contributions of the French under the National Committee of Liberation, which he described as "a political entity" providing and directing forces which "give it fourth place in the Grand Alliance." But, he went on, we cannot recognize it even as a provisional government "because we are not sure it represents the French nation." The committee will, he agreed, exercise leadership in the liberated areas, but "we do not wish to commit ourselves at this stage to imposing a government on any part of France."

Mr. Churchill's speeches have been among the most potent weapons of the war. But this one was a blunderbuss fired into his own lines, and it has shaken democratic morale. British liberal and labor forces are outraged, particularly by the reference to Spain, and Edward Murrow of C.B.S. reports that for the first time since 1940 national unity has been impaired. The sight of one of the chief architects of victory undermining the foundations of peace is truly a melancholy one. But we still have faith that the forces and ideas to which Mr. Churchill is blind and deaf will, in the end, prove too strong for him to resist.

Parties on the Left

THE formation of the new Liberal Party provides the occasion for a quick survey of the political labor scene.

In New York State the two factions of the old American Labor Party are now in separate establishments. When they were lodged under one roof, their internecine squabbling occupied so much of their energy that their impact on the total political situation grew steadily less. Now it is possible that, apart from the occasional interchange of pleasantries across the party line, they will get about their own business. Oddly enough, that looks to us to be pretty much the same sort of business, to wit, the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt and the return of a liberal slate of Congressmen next November.

We had hoped that after the left-wing victory in the primaries the sectarian scrap would end and that those who could accept the new leadership would carry on inside the American Labor Party and the others vote for the same candidates on the Democratic ticket. We opposed the launching of a new party as untimely and useless. But now that the Liberal Party has been formed, with what appears to be an excellent political program, we believe that it should be given a fair chance. Its realistic program avoids over-friendly gestures in the direction of the free-enterprise boys, steers a straight pro-democratic course in foreign policy, and is pleasantly free from the taint of high-purposed expediency. The new party, therefore, may prove a rallying point for many who in the past have not been drawn into labor politics but have been waiting for the sounding of a new political note in keeping with the gigantic post-war tasks ahead. If the Liberal Party appears today simply as an auxiliary of the Democratic Party, and in that respect in a position similar to the A. L. P. and the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, its independent role may well be established after the November decision.

Two things are to be hoped for. First, that the former members of the A. L. P. who are now active in the Liberal Party will call off their sniping at their erstwhile buddies who now control the A. L. P. And that goes for the A. L. P. as well. If both do their jobs in working for the election of Roosevelt, Wallace, and liberal Congressmen, there won't be much time left for namecalling. Second, just as in an earlier editorial we regretted that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee had become involved in the A. L. P. fight, so now we say that it would be deplorable if the new Liberal Party did anything to embarrass the Political Action Committee in the national field. After all, the objectives of both the A. L. P. and the Liberal Party in New York State correspond to the objectives of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee in the country as a whole. These three groups, once they get over their backward-looking grudges, should regard one another not as foes but as allies. The job ahead is too important to have any other thought in mind.

Nationally, it would appear that the C. I. O. Political Action Committee is going to be even more effective than was at first supposed. For the first time an important section of American labor has seen itself as having a positive political role. Already its enemies as well as its friends are claiming that it has exercised a measurable influence in some of the early primaries. Its significance will become even more evident as the campaign develops. The danger is that after November American labor will sink back once more into its chronic slumber. But that is not inevitable. History is cutting new grooves these days. Experience in the depression and the war years is perhaps convincing American labor that it has an independent political responsibility. We should like to see a Political Action Committee formed among the farmers of the Midwest. In fact, if the social and economic gains the farmers have enjoyed under the New Deal are to be conserved and built upon, there should be such a committee in the field right now. Perhaps the Farmers' Union might provide the nucleus.

If we view the picture broadly, there are many signs that the old parties are breaking up and have long since ceased to represent any basic political differences. The emergence of political movements of dynamic proportions among organized labor, urban middle-class liberals, and farmers points in the direction of a new political alignment. The similarity of the economic and political objectives of these groups suggests that in some not too remote future they may become the basis of a great national party. This new party on the left will be directed at the realization of a socially planned economy and pledged to the maintenance of an international order that will guarantee world peace. That such a speculation is not mere wishful thinking is proved by the remarkable growth of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Canada. Twelve years ago there were struggling regional labor and farmer groups scattered across the country. Today the C. C. F., organized as a unified people's movement, stands in a position to challenge the government in power. Making full allowance for electoral and constitutional differences, there is no reason why such a party should not develop here. In fact, unless either or both of the old parties shake themselves clear of outworn ways of political thinking, the future security and prosperity of this country may well depend upon the emergence of such a party.

This is looking far ahead. Meanwhile, the fight is on and we can only hope that the battalions already in the field and carrying the same flag will not waste their limited forces in guerrilla warfare among themselves but will direct their fire at the enemy.

A Catholic Looks at the Dies Committee

BY I. F. STONE

П

Washington, May 26 ROTHER AUGUST RAYMOND OGDEN notes that when the Dies committee was first established in 1938 "most assumed that the emphasis would be placed on Nazi activities." This assumption may explain the coolness at first shown toward the Dies committee by Father Charles E. Coughlin's Social Justice. Though written and accepted as a doctor's thesis by the Catholic University of America and published with the permission of Brother August Raymond's Provincial, the Ogden book on the Dies committee frankly reports at least the basic facts on the attitude of the Catholic press toward Dies. In its issue of June 20, 1938, a few weeks after the establishment of the Dies committee, Social Justice "noted that Dies's particular peeve was the Nazis." This was a misapprehension on Father Coughlin's part and it was soon corrected. Brother August Raymond reports that by August of that year "a decided change can be noted in the columns of Social Justice." * It carried very little about the committee at first, but in the issue of August 29 Social Justice "declared that the nation was at last getting a knowledge of what was going on, although it did not think that Congress would do anything to follow up the disclosures." Father Coughlin soon became a warm convert, and in Social Justice of September 5 Brother August Raymond reports, "We find Dies glorified as the 'Man of the Week' worthy of the applause of every 'honest, America-loving, red-hating United States citizen.' " By October "a large part of the Catholic press came out for the committee, although there were exceptions to the prevailing trend." One exception was the Commonweal, which "blamed the committee for the 'ineffectual and barbarous' way in which it encouraged the country to solve the Communist question." The other was the New World, organ of the Chicago archdiocese, which "also protested against the methods and procedure of the committee."

It was as a foe of the Nazis that Dies first hit the front pages, though the denouement of his debut as an anti-Nazi was both ludicrous and significant. Dies informed reporters on August 3, 1938, that George Sylvester Viereck, "publicist and admitted propagandist for Nazi interests" (the words are those of Dies), had been served with a subpoena by the committee after it had been informed that he was going to visit Hitler. A sham battle ensued between Dies and Viereck. Viereck sent Dies a telegram saying that he was going abroad to visit "The Chicago Tribune was litewise "lutewarm at the beginning" but "became one of the most ardent supporters of the committee."

leading personages, including the Kaiser, and was willing to appear before the committee on his return. Dies declared that Viereck could be barred from returning to the country if he refused to heed the subpoena. Viereck denied that he was an alien, and said that he could not be prevented from returning. Dies thereupon "denied that he had wanted to inconvenience anyone" and said he had issued the subpoena only to save time, since Viereck had said that he would not be back until October, "which would be too late for the committee." The affair provided Dies with a good deal of publicity, but "Viereck never appeared before the committee in 1938 and was allowed to depart a short time later. He sailed on the night of August 12, saying that he would not regret the inconvenience if the committee 'succeeded in uprooting the myriad subversive activities . . . which threaten the peace and security of our country." This was the first of many tributes to Dies from Nazi and fascist sources.

Brother August Raymond has uncovered an early Dies bill which should have provided a clue at the time to the Texan's real interest. In 1935, three years before the Dies committee was set up, he introduced a resolution providing for a special committee to investigate the possibility of the shackling of the press by the Administration. "Nothing ever came of it," Brother August Raymond reports, "but it did, perhaps, indicate a trend." The trend was soon visible. J. Parnell Thomas of New Jersey, the ranking Republican member of the committee, first struck what was to become one of the dominant themes of the Dies inquiry. In July, 1938, he declared the Federal Theater Project was not only "serving as a branch of the Communistic organization but is also one more link in the vast and unparalleled New Deal propaganda machine." And in a radio speech on October 14 of that year Thomas cited evidence before the Dies committee as proof of the links between the New Deal and communism. "The plan," Thomas declared, "is to sabotage the capitalistic system by placing upon that system burdens of restrictive legislation and staggering taxation." In the 1938 elections the Dies committee first showed that it was out to "get" the New Deal.

"At the outset of the hearings," Brother August Raymond reports, "Dies had reiterated his desire to get the data on communism and to avoid any political or labor dispute." The statement was made in October, 1938, and Dies at once proceeded to use the committee to smear three progressive gubernatorial candidates in the pending elections—Benson in Minnesota, Murphy in Michigan, and Olson in California. The tactics used against Murphy were typical. On October 20, 21, and 22 the committee heard witnesses who linked Murphy with Communists and the sitdown strikes, and at the end of the last day of hearings "Dies casually dismissed telegrams denying the charges by saying that 'those telegrams are available to any member of the press who wants them." On this occasion the President attacked the Dies committee for "a flagrantly unfair and un-American attempt to influence an election" and for making "no effort to get at the truth, either by calling for facts or by allowing facts and personal opinion on the other side." But the Administration's losses in the 1938 elections strengthened Dies, and the President never again attacked the Texan so openly or so vigorously.

In these first hearings there appeared another characteristic of the Dies committee—the undemocratic and high-handed procedure followed by the chairman in dealing with the dissident members of the committee. Congressmen Healey and Dempsey, after the President's defense of Murphy, asked Dies to recess the hearings until after the elections, when all members could be present. Their protest had no effect. Hearings were held without consultation with the full committee, and statements were issued in its name without the knowledge of other committee members. "Somewhere between the fall of France and December 7, 1941," Brother August Raymond writes, "the committee, as far as the public record indicates, had disappeared. Its place had been taken by a one-man agency which could not properly be called administrative and yet could not be called legislative. The information gathered by the investigators was utilized by the chairman, who, to all intents and purposes, had become the committee." This irresponsible method of conducting a committee reached its climax in the apology Dies was forced to make to David Vaughn in 1942. Dies "explained the error by saying that the statement had been released while he was in Texas, but that a careful check made on his return to the Capitol convinced him that the statement was erroneous." The committee, according to Voorhis, knew nothing of the statement until members saw it in the press. Dies had become the committee, and apparently J. B. Matthews, its pet stool pigeon and chief investigator, had become Dies. Of this final stage in the committee's development and of Matthews, Brother August Raymond writes as follows:

... the committee had become, more than anything else, a denunciatory agency. Dies seemed to be attempting to inaugurate a system whereby a federal employee could be dismissed without the least opportunity to defend himself. In the process of denunciation it seemed that no account was to be taken of the person's actual sentiments or actual record. The least connection with front organizations, even years ago, was considered to have worked permanent corruption for such federal employees. It would seem that change of heart was reserved exclusively for J. B. Matthews and the others who had volunteered information before the committee.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE EVENTS OF 1864 AND 1866 have to a large extent revolutionized German modes of thinking on political matters. Principles are now recognized sa good which a few years ago would have been indignantly repudiated as unworthy and revolutionary. . . . Varnhagen von Ense . . . says about Hegel: "Our ministers think they have in his philosophy one that is thoroughly legitimistic, suited to serve the state, and Prussian."—June 3, 1869.

THE CHARLESTON COURIER, in a voice that has an undertone of lament in it, says that of course South Carolina has always been a barbarous state, but hopes that it will gratify our "Down East friends" to hear that "we are rapidly assimilating ourselves and our laws to Down East ern ideas." The particular act of assimilation that called out these ideas was the hearing before Judge Orr of three petitions for divorce, of which two were granted.—June 3, 1869.

IT IS A LONG WHILE since there was a prospect of so dull a summer, in all that relates to politics, as the one which we are entering.—June 10, 1869.

THE UNIVERSITIES OF THE COUNTRY have been for some time past evidently a good deal puzzled with regard to the course they should pursue touching the rival claims of the old and the new education, as they are called.—

June 10, 1869.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO. announce as in press... a revised (the sixth) edition of "The Stomach and its Difficulties," by Sir James Eyre, M.D.—June 10, 1869.

IN TENNESSEE, the political contest becomes more exciting, as the rival candidates are stumping the state togethet—shaking hands on the platform before each speech, and then in turn covering each other with mud of all description.—June 17, 1869.

CONSIDERING THAT SO MUCH SHOOTING by women is going on in the country, and that the feminine world no less than the masculine is liable to moral epidemics, and that women who edit papers are urging other women to carry fire-arms for their defense, perhaps our male legislators may look about them and see if anything can be done to hedge about the virtue of women with legal terrors.—June 17, 1869.

The Rebirth of Europe

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

AST week I discussed those governments in exile which a modern Dante would expect to find in Purgatory awaiting their rewards and those which would be kept in Limbo, being guilty of no sin except that "baptism was not theirs." We now descend into the lower depths of Hell.

As the day of invasion approaches, the three governments in this circle grow increasingly conscious of their difficult position. The governments of Greece and Yugoslavia, after three years of futile intrigue, are attempting to resolve the conflict between them and the people by making belated concessions. The situation of the Polish government, complicated by hostile relations with Russia and by the anti-democratic attitude of certain elements in exile, is in flux. Comrades in their unhappiness, the three compliment one another through their diplomatic representatives and the press. Two of them have even cemented their bonds by a marriage joining the Greek and Yugoslav royal families.

The Polish government in exile cannot be called wholly reactionary. Many of its members are democrats, Socialists, or trade unionists. The Prime Minister himself, Mikolajczyk, is a leader of the Peasant Party, which has always been democratic. But the influence of the chief of staff, General Sosnkowski, and the military clique, disciples of Pilsudski, Smigly-Rydz, and Joseph Beck, has been overpowering.

Recently an effort has been made by Socialists on the National Council, the government's war-time parliament, to divest General Sosnkowski of his political functions. Underground leaders now in London have said that the Polish people desire a separation of General Sosnkowski's functions. The success or failure of this effort will be an important factor in determining Poland's future foreign policy and, consequently, Poland's future welfare. A sensible policy must decide how the best interests of the Polish people may be furthered. Certainly they are not bound up with the chauvinistic aspirations of the Polish ruling class.

Many Americans and British believe that in the seething Balkan peninsula only the kings can rally their people to a united effort for freedom and unification. Actually, the kings, their courts, and the governments they have chosen have always created internal divisions. As long as kings rule in the Balkans, there can be no federated union of Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, much less a Balkan confederation.

In Greece, ethnically a homogeneous nation, the dynasty has caused an unhappy cleavage in the forces of resistance. Recent events inside and outside Greece have forced the King to declare that he will not resume his throne until the people, by a free vote, decide what they want. George II, however, has made promises before and then broken them.

The E. A. M., which is patterned after Marshal Tito's movement and is one of the most powerful underground organizations in the Balkans, has demanded again and again of the various Prime Ministers that a national coalition government be formed in which the underground would participate. King George has now finally authorized Prime Minister Papandreou to form a government of national union conforming to a blueprint drawn up by representatives of all the Greek political and fighting groups meeting in Beirut.

King Peter of Yugoslavia has also at long last dismissed the fascist Purich ministry, which has repeatedly been in open conflict with the people of Yugoslavia, and has dropped General Mihailovich as War Minister. It has been announced that a "coalition" government will be formed. Whether or not King Peter will be able to nullify the damage done by five consecutive governments in exile to the unity of the Yugoslav nation will depend upon Marshal Tito. In an interview released on May 21 by the Associated Press, Tito stated clearly that he considers his government, which was formed in November, 1943, the true people's government of Yugoslavia. He has asked for funds from the Yugoslav National Bank and for the Yugoslav warships now in the possession of King Peter's government, which he accuses of "squandering for its personal ends" money raised to support these ships. Tito also requests representation on the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. When he was asked whether Yugoslavia was likely to fall within the sphere of any major power or combination of powers after the war, he replied that Yugoslavia's effort in the war would give the Yugoslavs the right to "arrange for themselves their internal organization and their foreign relations-a right guaranteed by the Atlantic Charter and the Moscow and Teheran conferences."

THE FREE MOVEMENTS

Most of the "free movements" are bound much more closely to the people at home than are many of the governments in exile. They base their authority on the aspirations of the people, while the governments base theirs upon "legitimacy." The ambassadors of the governments in exile are consulted by Allied chancelleries on all matters pertaining to their nations. The leaders of the free movements stand hat in hand before a third- or fourth-ranking official in the foreign offices and are lucky to be allowed to express their views.

Of all the emigrations, the Spanish has been the largest and politically the most diverse. Within its ranks political controversy has been sharp. Generally, two tendencies have been manifest—loyalty to the last constitutional government headed by Dr. Juan Negrín, and loyalty to Indalecio Prieto.

The followers of Negrin hold that the last constitutional government is still in existence. They maintain that it is a truly representative body, since it includes the most important political parties and workers' organizations in Spain. When the republic is restored, they believe that the Negrin government must be reinstated to preserve order until general elections can be held, when the Spanish people will choose the government they want.

Indalecio Prieto has been in open opposition to the legitimacy of the Negrin government since the beginning of its exile. Some months ago he created a Junta Española de Liberación which claims to represent a half-dozen political parties but not the trade unions, since Prieto has always maintained that they cannot participate in the government. The original national committees of most of the parties which the new organism assumes to represent have issued from Mexico a joint statement repudiating the Junta and reaffirming their support of the government.

More recently another development has agitated the Spanish emigration. With the particular indorsement of the Communists, a Junta Nacional Suprema. de Liberación has been created in Madrid and has been hailed in the Communist Spanish press as the real embodiment of the resistance movement in Spani and therefore as the true representative of the nation.

Though the Spanish Republicans seem divided, they are one in purpose: they oppose Franco and they oppose the restoration of the monarchy.

The Italian anti-Fascist forces are morally close to the Spanish. They were the first to experience fascism, the first to resist it, and the first to go into exile, where they have been waging an unceasing battle for democracy. Their writings constitute a permanent contribution to the political literature of our time. At one time they were looked upon with suspicion as "premature antifascists" who were complicating the relations of the Paris, London, and Washington governments with Mussolini's Italy.

The first post-Fascist government of the King and Marshal Badoglio, formed in collaboration with liberals, Catholics, democrats, Socialists, and Communists, has disappointed many Italian liberals—Gaetano Salvemini, Randolfo Pacciardi, G. A. Borgese, and Pietro Nenni, among others. It is not what thousands of Italian anti-Fascists have fought and died for in Italy, Spain, and elsewhere. On the contrary, many feel that the longing of the Italian masses for a democratic Italian republic has been betrayed and that the rising revolutionary spirit of the Italians has been smothered by compromise and expediency.

A thorough analysis of the political principles of the German emigration would demand more space than is available here. Free German committees have been formed in most of the United Nations. There is one in London, another in Moscow, a third in New York, a fourth in Mexico. They are unrelated, though there seems to be contact between the committees in Moscow and London.

A "Council for a Democratic Germany" formed recently in New York brings together German liberals, democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Center Catholics, Christian Moderates, Communists, for the purpose of clarifying their views and formulating a consistent program. The founders of the council do not claim to have a formal mandate from the German people, but they ask for "the creation of a new Germany within the framework of a free world." They are trying, one of the members told me, to further the establishment of a "European Germany" as opposed to "a German Europe." Like all German movements, the council has been regarded skeptically by other European exiles. Many of the German groups have a good anti-Nazi record and have expressed a clear desire for the democratic reconstruction of Germany, but they have to contend with certain emotional and political reservations which are applied against all Germans.

Many leading Austrian democrats are in exile. Julius Deutsch and Ferdinand Czernin, together with other Europeans who fear the reconstitution of the old Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, have been fighting untiringly against Otto von Hapsburg and seem to have won their battle. Unfortunately, attempts are still being made to bring Otto out of the realm of drawing-rooms, where he has been spouting the language of democracy, into a wider sphere of political activity. Recently we have had reliable information that Regent Horthy of Hungary has instructed his envoys in neutral countries to act independently if necessary but to support Otto as far as possible.

The Hungarians are represented by Count Karolyi in London and Rustem Vambery in New York. A National Hungarian Council headed by Count Karolyi works harmoniously with the democratic forces of Rumania, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia. Rumania has Charles Davila and others who follow the democratic line laid down by the great Rumanian leader Maniu. Men like Momchilov, Padev, Matsankijev represent what there is of Bulgaria in exile; they are supporting with all the means they possess the growing spirit of collaboration between the Bulgarian and Yugoslav peoples. Various reactionary figures, like Tibor Eckhardt of Hungary and Kosta Todorov of Bulgaria, have tried in vain to paralyze the exiled democratic forces of their countries.

And so a "miniature Europe" in exile has dreamed and waited while the people have fought, suffered, and matured. The expulsion of the Nazis will leave Europe physically exhausted but politically rejuvenated and morally strong. When the exiles return they will find new values, new attitudes, new leaders.

In the period between the two wars Europe witnessed a struggle between monarchy and democracy. As Guglielmo Ferrero has said, the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and of the German and Czarist empires in 1918 left three-quarters of Europe with governments incapable of ruling their countries or of keeping the peace. Some monarchies, Ferrero said, emerged as rocks in a flood, but the occupants of their thrones were more like shadows than kings. Against their shadowy "legitimacy" a democratic "legitimacy" pitted its strength. Fascism tried to thwart both sides by its use of totalitarian force. It did not succeed. The revolutionary process has continued, and the oppressed people, working underground and in exile, have forged a new democratic plan for the regeneration of Burope.

In the democratic monarchies the principle of constitutional monarchy will survive. Elsewhere in the West republics will be formed under France's leadership. In Southeastern Europe and the Balkans monarchy will be supplanted by the new democratic legitimacy of popular governments that will look to Russia for inspiration.

The birth of a new Europe depends to a great extent upon the agreement of the three great powers. Should one of them oppose the revolutionary aims of a people while another encourages them, a peaceful settlement will be tragically postponed. The peoples of Europe are tired of compromises and counter-revolutions. They are determined to express their will, once and for all.

Stassen of Minnesota

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

TAROLD E. STASSEN, who has very little chance of becoming Republican candidate for President but a very good chance of being named for Vice-President, is easily the most impressive of the men whose names will be placed before the Chicago convention. He is brighter than Bricker, more personable than Dewey, and less reactionary than Warren. He has some distinguished supporters, including men like Sinclair Lewis and Dr. Walter Judd, one of the best liberals in the Congress. What is more, he has a program. It could be more inspiring program, but this year even a firm stand on widows' pensions makes a Republican sound forthright. Stassen is, he tells us, in favor of world organization and of abandoning most, though not quite all, New Deal controls on the economy. He is fairly specific in saying what he means by world organization and in telling which controls he would relax, which he would abandon. His plan for world government is a modified version of Clarence Streit's Union Now, and many perceive Streit's hand in his Saturday Evening Post articles and in many speeches. He is against New Deal taxation and labor laws, but he insists that he would maintain, even broaden, the social-security program and, in time of need, the public-works program.

Stassen has broken the silence with more than double-talk. His words are pretty good. But what of the record? Fine words have been spoken by more politicians than ever lived up to them, and Stassen has given no assurances that his internationalism can be taken any more seriously than, for example, the sucker bait offered by Warren Gamaliel Harding in 1920. Unlike Wendell Willkie, he has made no sacrifice for his views.

Stassen had one excellent opportunity to show that his internationalism went beyond his ghost-written magazine articles. He muffed it. That was in December, 1942, at the St. Louis meeting of the Republican National Committee, when Wendell Willkie and other internationalist Republicans were trying to keep their party out of isolationist control. Colonel Robert R. McCormick was moving the constellations in order to have Werner W. Schroeder, committeeman from Illinois, elected national chairman. Stassen and his representative, Mrs. Chris Carlson, Minnesota committeewoman, were implored to join the movement to stop Schroeder. But while Roy Dunn, the other Minnesota delegate and no Stassen enthusiast, voted against Schroeder, Mrs. Carlson voted for him. Harrison Spangler, the bungling mugwump from Iowa, finally won out as a kind of compromise candidate, but the early balloting was so close that Stassen, if his publicized idealism had exceeded his practicality, might have turned the tide the other way. That, however, would have meant sharing honors—and enemies—with Wendell Willkie, and Stassen was unwilling to go that far. Ever since then the Chicago Tribune has overlooked Stassen's published heresies. Many observers believe that by entering the Wisconsin primaries Stassen deliberately sabotaged Willkie to kill off internationalist competition within the party.

If Stassen is in fact a liberal, his record as Governor of Minnesota offers no more proof than his record in party politics. For five years he gave the state an honest and efficient administration. Bricker, Dewey, and Warren have done no less. He balanced the budget and piled up a surplus, but it is high time someone pointed out that a state surplus these days is about as impressive as black ink in the ledgers of an aircraft manufacturer. Stassen met one of the few serious issues of policy to arise—that of strikes—by putting through a law, which he fondly calls the "count-ten plan," that effectively hampers union strategy by forcing workers to give employers ten days' notice before a walkout. "One day for each count," Stassen says. He advocates this law for the nation. He also advocates for the nation a general sales tax, which he prefers to call a "progress tax" in lieu of "levies on initiative," and a sixty-hour work week with time and one-tenth for overtime. He was sued three years ago by Kenneth Lee Turpin, a St. Paul Negro, because of race discrimination in the Defense Bureau, home guard of Minnesota. Turpin tried to join the organization and was told that Negroes were not wanted. He appealed to Stassen, and Stassen said that he was powerless to change the decision. Turpin opened suit against Stassen and two officers of the Defense Bureau. Then the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People moved in with all its machinery for litigation and publicity. A few days later Turpin got a registered letter from Stassen, who had discovered that he was commander-in-chief of the state military, welcoming Turpin to the Defense Bureau. Somewhat later Walter White, president of the N. A. A. C. P., wrote Stassen to ask why he never mentioned the race question in his articles on world affairs. Stassen replied that he was "on record many times in word and in deed against discrimination for race, color, or creed." Perhaps he is, but Walter White is still trying to find the record.

Stassen has risen fast, faster in fact than Dewey, and by means of much the same sort of political dexterity. He was born just thirty-seven years ago to poor Scandinavian parents on a truck farm near St. Paul. Inheritance and farm life gave him a bluff, friendly nature and an imposing physique—"silo-tall" is the way Time describes him every week or so. A quick mind got him through high school at fourteen. At sixteen he entered the state university and went on through the law school, finishing up at twenty-two.

After leaving law school Stassen set up offices in a packing-house suburb of St. Paul with another young man named Elmer Ryan. They made a slick team. Stassen worked the Republican side of the street, Ryan the Democratic. With Ryan's Democratic support, Stassen became a Republican district attorney; Ryan, with Stassen's Republican support, became a Democratic Congressman. At that time Floyd Olson, a great liberal leader, was Farmer-Labor Governor of Minnesota, Olson had inspired many young men to join his reform movement, but Stassen was unmoved. Stassen did, however, learn a great many tricks from Olson, a big, crafty Svenska and a master campaigner. Knowing that the Farmer-Labor Party had less than a majority of the voters, Olson had organized "all-party committees" through which he reached into the regular organizations for many votes. Stassen adapted the idea to his own campaigns.

In 1936 Stassen did not seek office, but he did watch the campaign closely. Olson, after six years as Governor, became a candidate for the Senate, and Elmer A. Benson, who had served a few months in the Senate after the death of blind Tom Schall, ran for Governor. Against this combination, in a great year for liberals, the Republicans put up their regular line of old faithfuls. Olson died before the election, and Ernest Lundeen took his place on the ticket. Despite the loss of their leaders, the Farmer-Laborites came in ahead by many lengths.

Stassen had seen the ineffectiveness of the older Republicans, and he set himself up as a kind of one-man youth movement. His liberalism dates from that time. He joined all the young men's clubs that he could and toured the state telling them that, since age had failed, youth must save Minnesota from the Farmer-Labor menace. A measure of Republican liberalism, he said, was needed to head off Farmer-Labor radicalism. Among the many young men whom he impressed was Joseph Ball, then a political reporter for the St. Paul Pioneer Press. In 1938 Stassen entered the primaries heading a slate of his own, a kind of Junior Executive ticket, and easily defeated the Old Guard machine.

For the general election of 1938 Stassen used all the tricks in the book. Certain that the conservative vote was in the bag, he wooed liberals by announcing that he stood "for the true principles of Floyd Olson." He kept Old Guard Republicans out of sight and consorted with few Republicans of any kind. Most of the men around him were members of the other parties who, generally because of disappointment over jobs, had broken their old ties. A group of Stassen's supporters, whom he later disowned, made ugly but effective use of anti-Semitism to the delight of the extreme reactionaries.

Stassen's first campaign for the governorship was a very tidy piece of rigging for so young a politician. His subsequent campaigns have shown equal ability. He has known how to deal in personalities and how to change the issues to please the group to which he is at the moment appealing. Political feeling runs high in Minnesota, and many factions rend the air with their oratory. Stassen has offered something to each, and he has picked up votes from all. The national and international issues on which he has spoken so well in other parts of the country yield to strictly local concerns in Minnesota. He has used the spoils issue to good effect—denouncing patronage in campaigns and paying off with it the day after election. He has appeased corporate interests by bringing about reductions in the taxes of the great steel companies that own the iron in the Mesaba range. By appointing Joseph Ball to the Senate seat left vacant by the death of Ernest Lundeen, he created for himself a Washington spokesman of considerable eloquence.

Senator Ball will nominate Stassen in Chicago no matter what the odds against him are. The odds on Dewey are, of course, almost overwhelming, but not quite so staggering as the pre-convention count would indicate. Every other Republican candidate has been sustained by the knowledge that most of Dewey's delegates would be delighted to leave him if they saw another winner. Band-wagons are seldom powered by devotion to a man, but the Dewey band-wagon may be slowed down by the unrepressed dislike of many who support him. If open dissension should break out, it would spread quickly, and Stassen, who is genuinely popular, would be the most probable beneficiary. One other factor favors him. The Republican internationalist vote, which heretofore adhered to Willkie, has been estimated at close to 7,000-000. This could be a balance of power. If Dewey runs, Roosevelt will capture much of it. But if Stassen were nominated, he would be able to command a great deal of it—and also, because of his service record, a large share of the soldier vote. He would certainly alienate no conservatives.

The far more likely outcome is that Stassen will be offered, and will accept, the nomination for Vice-President. A great many Republican strategists now see this as the solution to their problem, and Stassen is the one candidate who has not yet rejected the prospect of running in second place. Some believe that he can assuage two opposite sections of opinion at once—the internationalists on the one hand and on the other the corn-belt voters, largely isolationist, who will be annoyed if their section is not represented. Annoyed or not, the farm vote will go along with any Republican, but enthusiasm might be heightened by the presence of one of their own on the ticket. And Stassen has played the game cagily enough to be agreeable to both groups. Both the Chicago Tribune and the New York Herald Tribune are pleased with him. The only hitch in this arrangement, and it is one that seriously troubles those who advocate it, is that Dewey, who is reported to have taken the matter under advisement, dislikes the thought of sharing platforms with noticeably taller man. He has a terrible Mutt and Jeff complex, and the thought of a Vice-President half-ahead taller than himself is not appealing.

Patients Without Doctors

BY J. MITCHELL MORSE

HE House of Delegates of the Medical Society of the State of New York, at its recent annual meeting, gave its official blessing to a private corporation, United Medical Services, Inc., established to sell medical insurance. It also voted to set up a Bureau of Medical Care Insurance, to make a "study of possibilities and procedures for a state-wide plan directed and controlled through the Medical Society of the State of New York." A short time previously the medical societies of the five counties that New York City comprises had approved in principle Mayor LaGuardia's plan for voluntary health insurance open to wage- and salary-earners with incomes of $5,000 a year or less, but had served notice that they would fight to lower the income ceiling to $2,500—a revision which would limit the plan's usefulness, would make its working difficult, and in the opinion of some authorities would make it unworkable.

Both these moves are aimed to prevent passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for national compulsory health insurance. The fact that organized medicine has resorted to such sly tactics indicates the growing strength of the demand for effective health insurance. The American Medical Association and its state and county subsidiaries used to fight group-payment plans by suspending from membership all doctors who cooperated with them-the Ross-Loos Clinic case in 1934 and the District of Columbia Group Health Association case in 1939 are well-known examples. In the latter case the Supreme Court ruled that the American Medical Association's activities constituted restraint of trade under the Anti-Trust Act. Since then the A. M. A. seems to have decided that group-payment plans are here to stay, for it is no longer fighting them but trying to keep them in safe conservative hands. It is now fighting the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. Mayor LaGuardia himself favors the bill; he offered his own plan as a stop-gap, not as a substitute.

The bill, introduced in the Senate by Wagner of New York and Murray of Montana (S. 1161) and in the House by Dingell of Michigan (H. R. 2861), is one of a number of similar plans that are being considered in democratic countries. The British government has proposed a plan based on the medical section of the Beveridge Report; the Canadian House of Commons has before it the 600-page Report of the Advisory Committee on Health Insurance, popularly known as the Marsh plan; a similar plan is being considered in Australia; Mexico adopted a comprehensive health-insurance program at the beginning of this year. The Philadelphia Charter of the I. L. O., adopted at its recent convention, recognizes "the solemn obligation of the International Labor Organization to further among the nations of the world . . . the extension of social security measures to provide . . . comprehensive medical care."

The chief economic virtue of national health insurance is that it eliminates the risk of an unpredictable and unbudgetable family expense. Its practicability has been amply demonstrated in those countries which have tried it, notably in Czechoslovakia and Germany before the war and in Uruguay and Chile at present. Before they came to power the Nazis had charged that the German system was administratively top-heavy-the old cry of "bureaucracy"-but when they took it over they found that the only way they could save money was to reduce the quantity and quality of medical care. This they did. They dared not eliminate it entirely. Opposition to the idea in this country takes the line that it would be used as a political instrument by the party in power, that it would have a deleterious effect on standards of treatment, and that it would lead to communism, fascism, Nazism, "state socialism," and state capitalism.

Such irrelevant charges only obfuscate the issue. Medical individualism, which has shown itself to be inadequate for the needs of a nation at war," was inadequate even in peace time; after the war, if it continues to be the characteristic form of medical organization, it will be at the expense of our national health. All available evidence indicates that (1) there are too few doctors, (2) they are poorly distributed, (3) medical care is expensive, and (4) most doctors are not able to use their knowledge and skill to best advantage. These admittedly broad statements are based on the findings of a national survey conducted by the American Foundation and a number of special studies by the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care. The American Foundation's report, "American Medicine: Expert Testimony Out of Court," was published in two fat volumes in 1937 and is the most recent collection of evidence on a national scale; the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care assembled a mountain of statistics covering the years 1928 to 1932 inclusive. Taken together, they afford a broad panorama of the medical situation in the United States during the boom,

• See the reports of the subcommittee on war-time health and education, Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

the depression, and the recovery; it is significant that the findings were much the same in all three periods.

The American Foundation is a highly respectable organization whose directors include Thomas Lamont, Dr. Robert A. Millikan, James D. Mooney, president of General Motors Export Corporation, and Mrs. Ogden Reid, vice-president of the Republican New York Herald Tribune. Hardly a Communist outfit. It wrote letters of inquiry to doctors of twenty years' or more experience and to recent graduates of Grade A medical schools, and summed up their answers thus: "It is fair to say that this correspondence seems to justify the view that, by and large, adequate medical care is not now generally available." A few excerpts from the correspondence will make the point clear enough:

A serious illness, expecially if long prolonged, absorbs the savings of a lifetime of the average family. I have seen it happen over and over again. . . . There is hardly a person living in this county with rich soil who at the present time is able to go to a hospital for attendance. . . . In this state approximately one-third of the people die without consulting a doctor even in their fatal illness. . . . Patent medicines and a faith healer get the major share of support. The faith healer has become wealthy.

And so on, from east, west, north, and south, from big cities, middle-sized cities, small towns, and rural areas, from young doctors and old, from officials of city, county, and state health departments. Their personal observations are borne out by the impersonal statistics of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care, an independent research body composed of physicians and economists and financed by a group of well-known foundations. One of its investigators found in 1929 that families in industrial cities spent an average of $140 a year for medical care, of which $74 went to private physicians; two other investigators reported in 1930 that the annual cost ranged from $66 for families with incomes of less than $1,200 a year to $311.06 for families with incomes of more than $5,000. In the same year Leon Henderson found that 28.3 per cent of all personal loans were made for medical expenses. One of the committee's last studies, published in 1933, showed that "if the nation's bill for medical care were equally distributed among the people of this country, the annual charge would be $123 per family." And Dr. Samuel Bradbury, in an independent study published by the University of Chicago Press in 1937, found that if the average family got all the medical care it should have, the minimum cost would be $260 per year, or 10.9 per cent of its income. In terms somewhat easier to visualize, this means that a family man earning $45.50 a week would have to pay $4.96 a week for adequate medical care at minimum rates.

Some doctors have large incomes, but most don't do too well. Though many replies to the American Foundation's inquiry indicated that there were too few doctors, there is evidence that large numbers of those who are available are not fully employed. The Lynds reported (1929) that the 38,000 people of "Middletown" depended chiefly on patent medicines and folk remedies and that their fifty doctors were idle much of the time; Maurice Leven, in a study published by the University of Chicago Press (1932), found that doctors' incomes compared very poorly with those of mechanical engineers and other professional men with comparable training; and an Idaho physician wrote to the American Foundation (1937) that many doctors "are scarcely able to provide decently for their families, by reason of insufficient practice." The whole situation is summed up in Mr. Leven's conclusion: "Medical care is now supplied in a haphazard way at a high cost to the public and, apparently, with no particular profit to a very large proportion of physicians."

An individual who goes to a public or private free clinic may get the best treatment that science can offer, but this is largely a matter of chance; there is general agreement among investigators that such clinics, on the whole, offer inadequate service, both quantitatively and qualitatively. In any case they are not available to people with moderate incomes, who when they need medical care must (1) pay the high price of private treatment, or (2) accept "charity" from an individual physician, or (3) go untreated. The various group-payment plans now in operation are good as far as they go, but they don't offer complete medical care, and Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association, has admitted that they cover only 3 per cent of the population. Their fees are not based on ability to pay; generally speaking, they are not available to people with low incomes. Moreover, their protection ends when the subscriber becomes unemployed and is no longer able to keep up his payments; they tend to break down during periods of depression, when they are needed most.

National health insurance is of course not a complete solution of the problem of adequate care. Full employment is a necessary factor in any complete solutionthe Beveridge Report recognizes this fact, and so does the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. "Many would agree," says the American Foundation, "that nothing clear can result from any discussion that confuses the problem caused by the lack of a living wage and the problem caused by the lack of medical care. It remains true, however, that many of those that do have a living wage find themselves unable to pay present costs for adequate medical care." That is the raison d'être of all the present national plans. They do not offer to solve the larger social problems, but only to do the best that can be done within the limitations of the present economic system.

[In a later issue Mr. Morse will discuss the provisions of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill and the nature of the forces favoring it and opposing it.]

E DON'T KNOW whether to feel flattered or not by an essay in the News Letter of the Bureau of Educational Research, Ohio State University. The twelfth-grade level of reading ability, it says, "is probably the level required to read The Nation, the New Republic, [and] the Foreign Policy Association reports." That's the highest level it mentions.

HERE'S ONE FOR PEGLER: The Yugoslav Seamen's Club of New York has offered to man ships to carry supplies to Tito without pay.

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO has been voted the most popular speaker of all those who have addressed the weekly assemblies of Bryn Mawr students this term.

FROM A LETTER in Yank, the army weekly: "Here is a question that each Negro soldier is asking. What is the Negro soldier fighting for?... Myself and eight other soldiers were on our way from Camp Claiborne, La., to the hospital here at Fort Huachuca. We had to lay over until the next day for our train... The only place where we could be served was at the lunchroom at the railroad station, but of course we had to go into the kitchen. But that's not all: 11:30 a.m. about two dozen German prisoners of war, with two American guards, came to the station. They entered the lunchroom, sat at the tables, had their meals served, talked, smoked, in fact, had quite a swell time... Why are they treated better than we are?... Some of the boys are saying that you will not print this letter. I'm saying that you will."

THE CITY-COUNTY HOSPITAL for the Indigent at Fort Worth, Texas, has a large inscription above its two narrow entrances and the wide space between them. The central inscription reads: "Erected for the poor of Tarrant County without regard to race, creed, or color." At either end, directly above the doorways, are the words "White" and "Colored."

WE ARE SORRY about that quotation from the Saturday Review of Literature in this column last week. It was taken not from an editorial but from a signed review and does not represent the viewpoint of the editor.

FESTUNG EUROPA: A Norwegian ferryman was arrested for selling a German soldier a child's ticket. The sensitive Nazi officer who arrested him said it was an insult to the uniform. At the trial the ferryman replied that it was the rule to sell children's tickets to all passengers below the age of sixteen and that the soldier had given his age as fourteen and a half. . . . They tell this one in Vienna: The Führer died. As the coffin was being lowered into the grave, it had to be raised twenty times. There was so much applause.

No Unity with Fascists

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THAT the main issue in this war is the destruction of Hitler is an indisputable fact for every antifascist. As early as 1935 this writer scandalized his pacifist associates by asking for international action against Hitler, even at the risk of war. Only the other day French friends now in New York, who in that year attended a meeting in Paris of the International Peace Campaign under the chairmanship of Lord Robert Cecil, recalled the stupefaction with which the delegates listened to a Spaniard who rose to say: "If you want to secure peace, declare war on Hitler." That Spaniard was myself.

In 1939 this was still the attitude of every anti-fascist who watched the development of the world situation. Neither the argument that it was an imperialist war nor the presence in the governments of the great powers of men like Chamberlain and Daladier, who had sold out Czechoslovakia and Spain, was enough to deflect us from our line. To destroy Hitler was, in our opinion, the supreme duty of every anti-fascist.

It is our duty today. The recognition that fascism was the chief enemy made us concentrate our fire upon Hitler, the most aggressive, brutal, and dangerous among the fascists. Every ally was welcome in the effort to destroy him. To finish with Hitler and all that he represents, no sacrifice in the platform of any anti-fascist party seemed too great. To make collaboration possible between the left parties and those sections of the middle class that hated fascism but did not accept a socialist program, many socialist demands had to be modified or dropped for the moment. It was in this way that the people's fronts were born. The same purpose inspired the whole policy of national unity.

But the readiness to accept as allies in the fight against fitler people of diverse political backgrounds had to be alted as soon as there was danger that the dividing line etween fascists and anti-fascists might disappear through he effort to extend the anti-Hitler coalition as far as ossible. If national unity was to be justified in the eyes f genuine anti-fascists, it had to have one limitation: must not lead to unity with fascists or with the tools and allies of fascists; it must not destroy its own aim— p end fascism everywhere and forever.

Today we face the danger that the policy of national nity, instead of being directed against the fascists, may e turned against the anti-fascists who refuse to work with them. Unità del Popolo, the Italian Communist paper in New York, has not hurled its invectives against the retinue of little ducisti who still surround Marshal Badoglio. Its severest reproaches have been reserved for that magnificent old anti-fascist fighter Gaetano Salvemini, who opposes the neo-Fascist Anglo-American rule in Italy.

If the only platform for action against fascism—the platform that the fight against fascism is a fight to the death—is not reestablished quickly and unhesitatingly, the policy of national unity will lead to this cruel paradox: unity will be established with the most reactionary elements in every country, with the renegades from fascism, and at the same time the unity of yesterday among the real anti-fascist forces will be broken. To make it more clear: in the case of Spain this policy would lead to a situation in which any General Aranda or any one of the bishops who have gone along with Franco during the past four years would be accepted as allies, while a labor leader who has refused to move in such company would be branded as a saboteur of unity and politically undesirable.

Let us say very frankly to the Communists: unity built through appeasing the right at the cost of the left is not the kind of unity needed at the moment when fascism, retreating on the battlefields, is trying to survive by every possible means. It is not the kind of unity that can strengthen the progressive forces in their fight against the maneuvers of the various foreign offices, whose supreme wish is to keep in power kings, generals, and politicians who, though they have helped fascism, are considered useful instruments for the maintenance of the old social order.

I know very well that the war is still going on. But no recent event has caused me to change my opinion that a clear-cut anti-fascist line is the best political weapon that can be put into the hands of the people. Not only is the theory false that in order to obtain an immediate military advantage any and every concession is justified in the political field. In addition to rejecting such expediency in the realm of principle, I vigorously deny that it has pushed final victory an inch closer. In southern Italy it has certainly not stimulated the Italian people to contribute to the present Allied offensive. No Italian who really hates fascism will be inflamed by an appeal signed by Badoglio. If there was any possibility of arousing the Italian masses to fight against the invader, it was by encouraging the rise of new, uncompromised leadership in place of that of the Fascist king and his generals.

That this possibility existed we have said several times on the basis of reports from northern Italy. Now, we can cite a greater authority in support of this assertion. A communiqué issued on May 20 by General Alexander, the commander-in-chief of the Allied forces in Italy, stated that Italian patriots in the north were tying up six German divisions. They are Italians like the people in the south, with this difference: in the north they are fighting the Germans and fascism at the same time; in the south they have been obliged by the political mistakes of the Allies to accept Badoglio and the King.

The movement of resistance has proved everywhere how hate for Hitler and for his invading armies has united the political adversaries of yesterday. The owner of a factory has united with the local labor leaders who seemed so difficult when the question of wages was discussed. The aristocratic landowner has united with his peasants; the conservative candidate with his Socialist rival in the last election; the Catholic priest with the Protestant school teacher. But the resistance movement has not united anti-fascists with fascists. Not only would Pucheu, with his bloody hands, have been thrown out of the underground if he had not been disposed of more quickly in Algiers, but no writer, no civil servant, no parliamentarian who had taken a stand in favor of fascism during the era of collaboration, or even before the war, would ever be accepted in the resistance movement. People who risk their lives every day in the fight against fascism do not want repentant fascists in their ranks.

That which is valid during the war is equally valid for the immediate post-war period. Everywhere former fascists and collaborationists will come out hailing the policy of national unity if it gives them a chance to escape the consequences of popular justice. Everywhere we shall see them asking for unity in order that the country may be reconstructed more quickly, that an end be put to "chaos," and that the peace be organized in an atmosphere of calm and reconciliation. In the fight between the forces of progress and the forces of reaction no precaution the progressive elements can take will be too great.

The reaction will have on its side the advantage of four years of war, in which the Allies' failure to take a strong democratic position has played directly into its hands. It will have the support of all the elements in the various Allied governments who were responsible for the policy of appearing fascism from 1933 to 1939. The enemy is too strong and too terrible to need the help of the left, given out of the left's confusion and contradictions.

Snapshot from Algiers

A FRIEND of mine has just arrived in New York from Algiers, having left France only a few months before. Durant, as I shall call him, is an intelligent and reflective Frenchman whose judgment of men and events I greatly value. He reports that the success of the militant resistance movement is largely due to the aid it has received from almost the entire French population, including government officials and even a large number of the police.

Durant, as one of the principal labor leaders of France, was chosen by a workers' organization to represent it in the Consultative Assembly in Algiers. A marked man in Paris, he moved to a city in southeastern France. One day he received a message: "Your departure is scheduled for midnight tonight. Go to S——. Someone will meet you there. The password is 'Bien-être et liberté.'" At the appointed hour Durant was at his rendezvous, far out in the deserted countryside. About two o'clock in the morning a British plane landed in a nearby field. A few minutes later it rose into the air again, carrying him toward England.

Both the Darnard militia and the Gestapo, Durant tells me, have intensified their efforts to track down the men who have taken to the maquis. Their raids have had a serious effect on the underground movement. Many "suspects" have been placed in preventive custody. Others have been tortured, deported, or assassinated. Families of men who have escaped to London and Algiers are seized as hostages. All open spaces which might be used for landing fields are closely watched by the Nazis or have been crisscrossed with trenches.

Durant describes the mounting nervous tension of the French as they wait for the Anglo-American invasion. All France is on the alert, and a large French army without uniforms and variously armed awaits the signal to throw itself into the fight. If the Allied offensive against Fortress Europe is delayed much longer there is danger, he feels, that the Resistance may collapse. But, he adds quickly, this grim eventuality is not likely.

French democracy hopes that the Allies will not repeat the mistakes made in North Africa. For our part, says Durant, we are doing our best to cement the friendship between France and the Allies. Pierre Cot, for example, has condemned very strongly the narrow nationalism of certain French "super-patriots." Most Americans are familiar with the political and diplomatic differences which are impeding an agreement between the Allies and the Provisional Government. But there are other "little things" which irritate the average Frenchman.

"The American soldier is all right," Durant told me.
"He is often just a big boy, but sometimes he is an enfant terrible. The thing that astonished me most in American soldiers, and in the officers, too, was their lack of interest in what the war is about. Hardly a one of the boys I talked with knew what he was fighting for. Most of them wanted only to get back home, where they could have ice-cream sodas again. Moreover, the Americans have too much money and leisure.

"Drunken American soldiers, for example, were a common sight in Algiers. Americans are not in the habit of drinking wine, and since wine is very cheap—and strong—in Algeria, excesses were natural. In the first weeks after the Allied landing French families invited soldiers into their homes. In some cases they were bitterly disappointed by the behavior of their guests. They find British soldiers more correct in their behavior."

Agents of Berlin and Vichy, Durant reports, are trying to turn the French people against the Allies, but their insidious propaganda is being actively combated by all French democrats. In Algeria the trade unions, which include both French and Arabs, are making a special effort to further good relations. There are more trade-union members in North Africa today than there were in 1936 under the Popular Front. But the Vichyites often find protection from French justice among the Allies—Pierre Boisson, for example, whose military tribunal at Dakar condemned ninety-four patriots to death.

No more "expediency" for France—that is the vow of the French people, says Durant, as D-Day draws near.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THINGS have come to quite a pass when a leaflet I dropped by Allied fliers over Germany is made the subject of a leading article in Herr Himmler's Schwarzes Korps. The author of the article (in the issue of May 11) insists on referring to the leaflet not as English or American but as Jewish, but aside from his use of that dodge he gives a fairly accurate summary of it. Only "the lack of German courage," he quotes, "stands in the way of peace. Every normal German would rather see the Anglo-American armies enter Germany than have the war continue, and every German knows that only Himmler and the Gestapo prevent the liquidation of the war. Therefore the time has come to eliminate Himmler and the Gestapo. If the Germans are too cowardly to do this, God Himself cannot help them." At the end was a statement of Hitler's: "The earth is not made for cowardly nations." All this was repeated in Himmler's paper.

The article written in answer began with a display of indignation. "What impudence of the Jews to quote Hitler to us! . . . And what nonsense to accuse the Germans, of all people, of cowardice, and to pretend that only Himmler and the Gestapo keep up the German people's morale, whereas it is sustained actually by the courage and stamina of the nation, which knows full well what is at stake." It then proceeded to develop a serious argument:

Even if the Jews were right in assuming that Nazism -or, as they put it, Himmler and the Gestapo-has not a majority of the nation behind it, the people would still fight doggedly for victory. They feel that there is no alternative, and if the Jewish propagandists want to accomplish anything they should try to disprove that view. They should try to prove that Stalin's army will not cross the German frontier, that Germany will not be bolshevized, that German workers will not be sent to Siberia, that we shall be spared the GPU's shots in the neck, and that our children will not be sent as slaves to the Urals. . . . This "minimum program" is the least that ought to be presented to the Germans if an effect similar to that of Wilson's Fourteen Points is desired. But while the Jews do not find it difficult to make promises in the name of the Anglo-Americans, they cannot credibly promise anything in the name of Stalin. Hence they resort to the simple trick of pretending that this is war between the Anglo-Americans and the Germans. But there is no German who does not know that actually the war is exclusively between the Germans and the Jews and between the Germans and the Bolsheviks. We cannot choose between war and an Anglo-Saxon peace; we can only choose between war and Bolshevik chaos.

Every polemic published by the Nazi authorities gives, by its very denials, a glimpse of the people's mute thoughts. When the Schwarze Korps emphasizes has absolutely unthinkable is an Anglo-Saxon peace, it reveals that the public has been strongly attracted by such a possibility. When it directs especially heavy fire against the statements in a leaflet, we know that these statements have found a weak spot.

Action without precedent in this war, or in any former war, was initiated during the week of May 2 to 9 in the cities of the industrial province of Rheinland-Westphalia. The following announcement of it appeared in the Recklinghausen Nationalzeitung for May 2:

Unfortunately, it is a fact that last year's potato crop is insufficient for our needs. Many householders are without potatoes and will be unable to obtain any until the first of the new crop appear in the market. An attempt will be made to fill this gap by mutual help. The local branches of the Nazi Party are conducting a drive to this end. Every family will be visited and those that have a stock of potatoes will be asked to give up part of it voluntarily. The official market price will be paid. Potatoes thus collected will be distributed by the Food Offices. Only households that have no potatoes at all will be supplied.

For the first time, it is clear from this announcement, provision of a basic food has completely broken down. For the first time part of the meager rations which people have acquired with their coupons are to be taken away from them.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Ambassador Grew's Mission

TEN YEARS IN JAPAN. By Joseph C. Grew. Simon and Schuster. $3.75.

To AT least one reviewer this is a profoundly depressing book. Not alone because it forces one to retrace the events of a sorry period, but even more because it will be used to draw a polite veil over a record of which Americans have no reason to be proud. To judge by the encomia of the early reviews, this is happening on an almost universal scale. The few questioning voices that may be raised will have to make themselves heard through a chorus of praise. This is a frightening phenomenon. If it is so easy to beguile us into glossing over the prime mistakes of the pre-war era, what security can we feel when it comes to the diplomacy of peacemaking? Our need is for the keenest awareness of the lesson of the appeasement decade, in order to fortify our determination to establish a world society in which aggression will not again be permitted to develop with impunity.

Americans have learned to stigmatize the failure of Neville Henderson's mission to Berlin. Is there anything which really distinguishes that failure from Joseph C. Grew's at Tokyo? Each was the consequence of a diplomatic policy beginning in the early thirties and pursued over a long period of years. The parallel between the fates meted out to Czechoslovakia and China is not fortuitous. Written all over both records is the unwillingness of Britain and the United States to adopt a program of uncompromising resistance to the rising aggressors in Europe and Asia. But you may search this book from cover to cover without finding that lesson written down, much less underscored in terms so unmistakable that it will sink into the minds of the American people.

Our ambassador, of course, was merely an agent and cannot legitimately be charged with responsibility for policy, although it is made abundantly clear that he fully supported the line taken. We were, in fact, served by an unusually active and well-informed diplomat in Tokyo. Mr. Grew obviously inspired the respect and liking of a succession of Foreign Ministers, as well as of a host of Japanese in the upper classes. He reported the changing political currents in Japan with skill and fidelity. Very early he learned to distrust the real political strength of the "moderates," and to look with dark foreboding on the unpredictable explosions of the military. In January, 1941, he specifically warned of rumors that the Japanese were "planning to go all out in a mass surprise attack on Pearl Harbor." On November 3, 1941, he reported that war "may come with dangerous and dramatic suddenness," noting in his diary next day that this dispatch was "on the record for all time."

And so it is—but is this enough? The glitter of it must not bemuse us. We must look for something more solid than a timely warning that catastrophe was at hand. What policy did Grew, and his supporters at Washington, have to avert catastrophe? As to this, the Ambassador defines his own position quite clearly: his policy was not one of appeasement; he liked to call it "constructive conciliation." In actual practice it narrowed down to a program of oiling troubled waters, to monotonously repeated protests against injuries to American interests, to a wishful hope that the next Cabinet would be more moderate. "Time, I believe, will play into our hands if we allow nature to take its course unhindered by us. By hindrances I mean steps in the nature of sanctions." This was April 10, 1940, and represented a position held undeviatingly since Grew's arrival in mid-1932. Never a mention after July, 1937, that our materials were arming Japan for its attack on China—and on ourselves.

Counter-measures of a moderate kind-not going so far as an oil embargo-he permitted himself to approve in September, 1940, after Japan had signed the pact with the Axis. The Ambassador mentions in his diary at this time a socalled "green-light" telegram, which he terms "perhaps the most significant message sent to Washington" in the eight years of his mission; unfortunately, the text of this dispatch is not given even in paraphrase. From remarks then and later we are led to understand he henceforth accepted the policy of "inexorably" matching every forward move of Japan's by a counter-move-say, a loan to China. This game, of course, had the drawback of leaving the initiative to Japan, along with the additional hazard that one soon ran out of effective counter-moves except the most extreme. From the end of 1940 restrictions were progressively applied on trade with Japan, and full sanctions were imposed on July 25, 1941. In retrospect there seems to have been a fated irony in the timing of this shift in American policy. What could have been in the mid-thirties a positive and successful program of restraint and war prevention, jointly enforced by Britain, France, the United States, and the Soviet Union, had been transformed by 1940-41, after the collapse of France and the German attack on Russia, into desperate and risky measures which the United States had to sustain largely by its own strength alone.

The result was an initial military-naval disaster of grave proportions. Never was psychological unpreparedness for a blow so complete. The people did not have the benefit of Ambassador Grew's secret memoranda warning that an attack might come unexpectedly. When the Cabinet tried to remedy this situation, it was too late. Speeches delivered by Knox and Welles toward the middle of November largely failed to register, although they were framed in alarmist terms. Partly this was due, too, to the fact that the game played with Japan since the end of 1940 had been almost solely an executive matter, carried through by a succession of orders which attracted little public notice. A genuinely popular embargo movement had existed earlier, but Secretary Hull had deflated the movement in July, 1939, by abrogating the trade treaty with Japan and then postponing action for more than a year. The cards were not all on the table, and the people lost interest. In its way this is a warning, too.

It is advisable to note that pitfalls also lie ahead in the peace that has to be made with Japan. The court circle and the business leaders, making up the "moderates" with whom Ambassador Grew had his main contacts, do not provide the safest foundation on which to build post-war hopes. They are not pillars of democracy; if they are taken for such, the end will be disillusionment. They are much more closely allied to the militarists, whom we are asked to concentrate on eliminating, than to the people as a whole. Expediency will be urged in favor of accepting a group of "moderates" under a "chastened" Emperor as the new government of Japan. It won't work, not for the long pull. Sooner or later, and probably sooner, the militarists will be right back again, working with their accustomed and familiar colleagues. Only a grass-roots movement, organized and led by true representatives of the people, can set up a really democratic government in Japan and make it stick. This is what the American people have to demand and fight for in the peace. It is the only final guaranty that they will not have to fight another T. A. BISSON war in the Pacific.

Housing in America

'AMERICAN HOUSING: PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS.

The Factual Findings by Miles L. Colean. The Program by the Housing Committee. Twentieth Century Fund. $3.

NE of the war's unexpected by-products has been the highlighting by the warring nations of their post-war housing plans. Housing has become a useful weapon on the psychological front. British military and civilian morale has often been bolstered by specific proposals for rebuilding Britain's cities. The replanning of Moscow and of Russia's other war-torn cities has been a great inspirational force in Russian hearts.

While the state of our own housing has never been underemphasized, few major issues have had less hard-boiled discussion; when a concrete program to rebuild our cities could provide a much-needed feeling of social creation in the trying days that may follow the war, we have chosen to do nothing. Instead of programs, long tomes, such as the twelvevolume report of President Hoover's Conference on Home Building and Home Ownership or the thousands of pages of the TNEC testimony on the construction industry, outline the woeful inadequacies of our home-building enterprise only to channel off into a few indictments, a handful of generalizations, or a promising preamble in a useless piece of "remedial" legislation.

"American Housing," the new inquiry into its problems and prospects which the Twentieth Century Fund has just issued, is another brave pilgrimage into the boggy wilderness that is American housing. The study, for which Miles Colean prepared the factual findings and a committee of respectable economists ventured the "solutions," lists all the familiar ailments—the picayuneness of building enterprises, the unsoundness of the tax structure and mortgage financing, the problems of land assemblage and housing distribution, the planless intercession of the federal government as adviser, insurer, building venturer, landlord, prosecutor, and benefactor. The findings represent as complete a summary of the deficiencies in home building as has yet been written. Colleges will find it a useful text for their housing students. The supporting material in the tables and charts particularly will be helpful to those digging into the many-sided phases of housing. Its authors will never be accused of having succumbed to the excessive emotion to which so many others have had to yield when tackling the problem. They have carefully repressed the temptation to reckless exhortation, and have produced a sober study of a sobering problem.

In a field in which viewpoints differ so widely, there will naturally be disagreement with some of the findings. It may be seriously questioned that the hope of continued speculative price increment is still "largely responsible" for the paucity of building sites. Unimproved land represents no more than 5 per cent of total home cost, and in developed areas it is more often the income of old houses rather than the hope of land increment that keeps prices up. The examination of the FHA insurance system is kindly. No adequate criticism is made of its vicious Title VI practices, which have forced many transient war workers into ownership, or of the peculiarly high interest rates on these government-insured loans, which only preferred institutions may make.

After an austere survey of housing liabilities, fortified with as depressing a set of facts and figures as ever beset a vital phase of our economy, the recommendations fade off into vague and carefully guarded generalizations. The program limits itself to a plea for more rigid enforcement of the anti-trust laws, the revision of building codes, the promotion of more research and greater efficiency, better land utilization, more aid to equity investments, and similar reforms. Some of these suggestions are new though they only scratch the surface; others have often been shuttled back and forth among housing reformers.

One of the major faults of the book is that it misses the opportunity to relate the deficiencies in the housing enterprise to the over-all economic patterns of which housing has become an inextricable part. Housing is more than houses, and it is seeing half the problem to see it only from the standpoint of brick and mortar, mortgages, slum elimination, foreclosure, prefabrication, and stabilization of city patterns. The housing problem has become involved with too many other phases of our economy to be any longer viewed in isolation.

Palestine Transformed

PALESTINE, LAND OF PROMISE. By Walter Clay Low-dermilk. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THIS is a very unusual book, written by a man who unites scientific competence with historical perspective. Dr. Lowdermilk has had a long and distinguished career as forestry engineer, hydrologist, geophysicist, and soil conservationist. As assistant chief of the Soil Conservation Service of this country, he has had unusual opportunities to familiarize himself with the situation here as well as with the best available means for improving it. Five years as research professor of forestry at the University of Nanking, followed by more recent journeys, have given him an almost equal grasp of Asiatic problems in the domain of his specialties.

In 1938 and 1939 he was sent by the Department of Agriculture to Europe and the Near East in order to study denudation and conservation of soil in these regions. The present book is the outgrowth of his observations on that journey.

During the past quarter-century Jewish enterprise and skill, powerfully reinforced by generous contributions from the Jewish communities of Europe and especially of the United States, have reclaimed extensive tracts of sand dunes and marshland, of worn-out grain fields and bare limestone hills. Year by year the productivity of the land has been increased by scientific methods of agriculture and animal breeding. With the aid of photographs and descriptions, confirmed by statistical tables, the author paints a vivid picture of the transformation of the sections of western Palestine settled by Zionist action during the past two generationsmostly during the past twenty years. The reviewer, having been in Palestine from 1919 to 1935 engaged in archaeological research, can testify that the picture is true. In fact, he would be inclined to stress certain aspects of the transformation even more strongly than Dr. Lowdermilk does.

Dr. Lowdermilk consulted archaeologists wherever possible, traveling with them over the country and comparing the ancient state of the land with its modern condition. He repeatedly acknowledges his obligation to Nelson Glueck, the brilliant director of the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem. To the specialist this collaboration seems very fortunate, since it has saved the author from many serious mistakes in dealing with the historical past of Palestine. For example, he rejects the fantasies of Ellsworth Huntington with regard to the predetermining influence of climate on man and the decisive part played by alleged cycles of rainfall on human history. These ideas are rejected by every competent archaeologist because they run squarely against archaeological data wherever Huntington gives concrete evidence in support of his conclusions. Since, however, they have enjoyed wide vogue among certain circles of geographers and sociologists, Lowdermilk's attitude is very significant. The reviewer's only criticism here is that the author has not gone far enough, and that further collaboration with archaeologists and Mediterranean geographers would eliminate a number of weaknesses in dealing with his material. For instance, the explorations of Nelson Glueck have proved that the historical occupation of Transjordan was intermittent, not relatively continuous as the author suggests. The Byzantine towns of the southern desert of Palestine were occupied successively rather than simultaneously, as has now been demonstrated by H. Dunscombe Colt's excavations in several of them. Lack of acquaintance with recent French geographical literature has kept Dr. Lowdermilk from understanding the true function of the stone heaps described by him as water collectors-through precipitation of atmospheric moisture—as well as from realizing the existence and importance of the tunnel wells (Arabic fugara), recently rediscovered by Nelson Glueck in the Jordan valley,

A considerable part of the book is devoted to an impressive argument for a "Jordan Valley Authority," comparable to our own TVA. There can be no doubt that there is a wonderful opportunity for such a development, which would utilize the Jordan cleft for a vast hydroelectric and irrigation project. Whether it can be brought about is certainly positive of the color of the co fore to The Parallians d langed more dependent on international politics than on intrinsic engineering factors. What chance have practical idealism and engineering enterprise when faced with industrial imperialism and misguided nationalism?

Dr. Lowdermilk's political approach is frankly Zionist. The reviewer is very much afraid that the "Jordan Valley Authority" will not see fulfilment until political rivalries have been replaced by friendly economic competition. As long as politics dominate the scene, we cannot hope that the non-political interests of either Arabs or Jews will receive the attention they imperatively need. Will it be possible for the nomad and the farmer, the peasant and the factory worker, the Arab and the Jew really to cooperate in carrying out this splendid program? If not, so much the worse for the Near East, whose future development depends so largely on its peaceful adoption of modern Western technique and practical humanitarianism.

De Profundis

THE BOTTOMLESS PIT (DER BRUNNEN DES AB-GRUNDS). By Gustav Regler. With Five Drawings by Marie Louise Vogeler-Regler. La Nacional Impresora S. A., Mexico City. Private Printing.

THE events in which Gustav Regler took part compelled him and all others involved to choose in the end between betraying and being betrayed. Regler chose the latter course and could not help doing so. He has paid for it with everything short of his life. Still believing in socialism and the brotherhood of man, he has come to distrust passionately every method proposed for their realization; and his disillusionment with methods and means—with reason itself, it almost seems—causes his anguish. It is not defeat at the hands of the enemy but betrayal by friends that compromises beliefs.

These poems of Regler's-written in free strophes and seeking objective equivalents for an emotion which without the check-rein of art would become hysteria-are his testament for the time being. They have a flavor of Young German romanticism, Jean Paul Richter's: yearning, pessimistic, exuberant in their visionary quality, embittered in their content, disregarding the laws of space but forced to obey those of time by the inability of the mind in which they originate and of their medium to exist in any other dimension. One hesitates to remonstrate with a man like Regler; yet one cannot help asking that he give us something more positive. If the present slogan, as Regler says, is "Workers of the world, distrust one another," it is up to reason to substitute a better one. And it is up to the Reglers, who know most about the workers in their heroic moments, to translate that experience into thought, which is viable, as well as into emotion, which is viable only in art, and therefore too uncertain.

The German of Regler's poetry is accompanied by a parallel translation into English and by five very interesting drawings by Marie Louise Vogeler-Regler. It is to be hoped that more of Regler's writing will be published—in this country as well as in Mexico.

A Challenge to Better Management

By J. M. JURAN

Administration

Charges and counter-charges about unnecessary and dangerous government bureaucracy are a front issue in the national campaign. What are the facts? Is the government guilty of gross stupidity, dry rot, red tape? Are government procedures slower and more complicated than those of private business? Are these costly checks and double checks peculiar to government or peculiar to bigness—in public or private agencies?

Here is "must reading for every serious citizen;—a political science classic," as President Paul Douglass of The American University states. Here is light without heat on a hot issue.

As Harlow S. Person, management consultant, says "The author has observed many of the causes of inefficiency and waste with seeing and twinkling eye," Lillian M. Gilbreth, management expert, says: "The fact that the material is presented with humor and a light touch does not prevent the reader from realizing it is of great and timely importance."

Constructive remedies are offered. "I am very much impressed with the suggestions made for the improvement of the service," says Representative Robert Ramspeck, Chairman, House Civil Service Committee.

A campaign volume of first importance, this is also a guide to citizens on how to understand how government works today and why. $2.00

Peace Beyond Our Time

HOW TO THINK ABOUT WAR AND PEACE. By Mortimer J. Adler. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

R. ADLER seems to think that he has arrived at a rather novel and revolutionary conclusion about war and peace, which he feels under compulsion to defend against certain blind guides who are, in his opinion, promising our generation peace through inadequate instruments. According to Mr. Adler, neither treaties nor alliances can guarantee real peace. This can only be done by world government. Treaties and alliances which do not bring the nations under one world government cannot guarantee peace, for "anarchy and sovereignty are inseparable." He believes that a "society or community cannot normally exist without government" and that therefore a world community cannot exist without world government.

There is a slight note of pretentiousness in defending this thesis so rigorously against his supposed critics, for Mr. Adler has no hope that world government can be easily achieved. In the hundreds of years which must elapse between the present and the final achievement of world government he is ready to use the best possible makeshifts in order to stem the tide of world anarchy; he could therefore have a quarrel only with those proponents of leagues, federations, and alliances who promise lasting and perpetual peace upon the basis of such alliances. If there are optimists who promise as much as that, some of us have not heard of them

Mr. Adler is no simple utopian, though there is a final utopian note in his analysis. He declares: "The issue between pessimists and optimists can be resolved. The resolution turns on two predictions: first, that a lasting peace will be made but not in our time; and, therefore, that we can expect more wars, even world wars, in the interim." If such a resolution of the conflict between pessimism and optimism has any value, let us accept it, though some of us might have difficulty in accepting the guaranty of a "lasting" peace, if the word "lasting" is pressed. Mr. Adler does press it. In another connection he declares "once existent, world peace can be perfected. From being universal it can be made perpetual." Is not this a rather large promise, particularly in view of the fact that there is no national community, however perfect its instruments of justice, which could boast of an absolute guaranty against the peril of a future civil war?

This final utopian note in Mr. Adler's otherwise sober analysis of political realities is not an accident. It is derived from his too purely political interpretation of society. His thesis is that communities which stand under a single sovereignty can have peace, while those which have several sovereignties are bound to become involved in war. He regards government as the sole agent of unity in a community. It is in fact only the final agent. Mr. Adler says quite truly that "men must be morally and intellectually ready for political institutions but only to some degree. Once institutions exist, they will condition the whole social environment and produce further intellectual and moral changes favorable to their own operation." This is an important insight to be urged against moralists who believe that perfect moral cohesion must precede political integration. The actual fact is that there must be authority and power to organize a community precisely because the moral oneness of a community is never complete enough to provide for an uncoerced peace.

But in the development of the national community Mr. Adler underestimates factors which are neither political nor moral and intellectual. National communities gain part of their unity from geographic limitation. Some of it comes from ethnic homogeneity and a common language. Some of it is derived from the collective self-consciousness which develops in the pursuit of a common task, particularly the task of avoiding a common, concrete peril. The concreteness of the peril must be emphasized, for the peril of anarchy in the abstract does not create unity in a community as easily as the peril of an actual foe standing at the borders.

The underestimation of all these non-political but also non-rational factors in the development of limited communities persuades Mr. Adler that the international community can be created rather easily by the power of an international state. He would deny that he regards the task as an easy one, because he thinks centuries will be required to achieve it. Yet it is for him an essentially easy task. He believes that once men have discovered that nothing less than a world government will give them world peace, they will proceed to establish it. The non-rational and non-political factors of unity in national communities are consistently underestimated by Mr. Adler for the purpose of proving that the world community requires little more than a single sovereignty. The real fact is that national communities do usually have a common language, a fact which is not negated by pointing to Switzerland; and they do have a core of ethnic homogeneity, a fact which is not negated by a peripheral heterogeneity in many of them. If they do not have ethnic unity they may fall apart as Czechoslovakia did under German pressure. They also usually have a common culture and religion. At least the religious differences must not be too marked. If they are marked, the national community faces the peril of disruption which India faces in the Hindu-Moslem controversy. The state may be the head of a community, and it may be correct to insist that a single community must have a single head. But it is wrong to suggest that the head can create the body.

Mr. Adler's thoughts about war and peace are, in short, despite their soberness, not sober and circumspect enough. When he deals with the moral and cultural impediments to world community he finally relies, despite himself, not upon the power of the international state but upon an educational and moral process which will mitigate the force of present antagonisms. "I am not saying," he declares, "that cultural and racial differences do not present obstacles to world peace. They do indeed, but only through the intervention of such moral factors as race prejudice and cultural antipathy." "The moral obstacles are genuinely surmountable by education and by enlargements of experience." Of course they are. But it is rather simple to distinguish so nicely between the natural fact of race distinction and the moral fact of race prejudice. For it is the character of human history to build spiritual and moral facts, both good and evil, upon the natural facts. Men never express a simple survival impulse, either individually or collectively, as animals do. The survival impulse is transmuted into pride and the will-to-power. Hence these evils and make the inordinate desires of men more moderate. But there is no more possibility of guaranteeing race prejudice. We know that moral discipline may mitigate, that any educational process will finally tame, all inordinate passions and desires of men than that government, strong enough to check these desires and to arbitrate in conflict between conflicting collective desires, can be formed.

About the necessity of world community and world government Mr. Adler speaks eloquently and persuasively. A technical civilization has given us a potential world community. But a potential world community, which has no instruments to manage the vast interdependence which modern techniques have created, becomes in fact an insufferable anarchy. This is clear enough, though it is well to have the fact presented as cogently as Mr. Adler does. But what is necessary is not as simply possible as Mr. Adler believes.

It may be observed in conclusion that Mr. Adler does not address himself to one important problem at all; and that is how the transfer from national to international sovereignty is to be made. In this respect he shares a weakness with those who would be satisfied with something less than a world state and settle for a world federation. In all these theories a social-contract theory of government is assumed. Mr. Adler seems to think that when mankind has been persuaded that lesser strategies do not avail, it will resolve by a supreme act of the will to create a world state. It will do on an international scale what Thomas Hobbes thought was done in the formation of national states. But the fact is that neither national nor international states, neither national nor international communities, have ever been formed like that. All communities and states have grown through gradual coalescences of smaller communities and gradual elaborations of the instruments of government. If that fact is fully comprehended we shall be less impatient with the makeshifts of international order, which promise no more than "peace in our time." They may fail. They may fail a dozen times. But if world community is ever formed it will be built upon the success, and not the failure, of one of these makeshifts. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

TN COMBINATION, the Alaska Highway and the Canol I project constitute by far the biggest construction program in the world's history from the standpoint of area covered and time of accomplishment. The Alaska Highway was holed hrough as a pioneer road in November, 1942, and finished as an all-weather artery in October, 1943. Canol officially wound up with the dedication of a refinery at Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, on April 30, 1944, which meant that crude il pumped through pipe line from Norman Wells on he Mackenzie River was now being turned into gasoline to uel the Alaska Highway and its airfields.

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

The public still knows little about the Alaska Highway, much less about the Canol project.

Harold Griffin has produced the first book giving a cogent account of both the Alaska Highway and the Canol project. It is absorbingly written and reasonably reliable. A mixture of interviews, personal anecdotes, and essays, it is patently the hastily assembled report of a painstaking journalist who wanted to strike while the iron was hot after a junket through the Northwest in 1943, backed up by a trip ten years earlier, when he acquired a lasting interest in the country.

"Far North Country," on the other hand, is a pretentious though whimsically presented history of Alaska by a man who appears to regard himself as an authority on the subject. (He makes just as many factual mistakes as Mr. Griffin does.) The book is also a framework supporting diverse personal views and prejudices of the author, some of which are rather remotely related to Alaska, if at all. Thames Williamson tells more about Alaska's past than Harold Griffin does, much less about its present; but their ideas regarding its future are uniformly enthusiastic.

Mr. Williamson's eyewitness descriptions of Alaska go back more than thirty years. He seems to have visited it since, but he deals with recent developments as if he were inspired only by newspaper stories. In some sections his writing is straightforward and interesting, in others it is incorrect, supercilious, and maundering. Incidentally, he often speaks of places and events in the Yukon Territory as well as in Alaska, but he makes no distinction: to him it is all Alaska.

Mr. Griffin's account of the building of the Alaska Highway is fairly accurate. His account of the building of Canol is not so accurate, but that is forgivable because much of his information was picked up from Canol workers, most of whom at the time of his visit were ill informed themselves. Canol being then a restricted project. However, his summing up of Canol as well as of the Alaska Highway and Northern matters in general is sound and farsighted and well worth reading.

It is amusing to compare the attitudes of the two authors toward Vilhjalmur Stefansson. Mr. Williamson brings in the great Arctic explorer and scholar only to insult him, while Mr. Griffin pays just tribute to him as a prime exponent and prophet of the Northern progress over which Messrs. Griffin and Williamson both rhapsodize.

Mr. Griffin concludes: "The Alaska Highway and the Canol project have been built. Now they must be used to build the country. . . . I believe that the American people have never made a better investment for the future than in the Alaska Highway. Here, in our own Northwest, we have created the physical means of realizing international cooperation, both in achieving victory and constructing the post-RICHARD FINNIB war world."

NUSANTARA. A History of the East Indian Archipelago. By Bernard H. M. Vlekke, Harvard University Press. $5.

Dr. Vlekke, formerly general secretary of the Netherlands Institute in Rome, has provided a very readable as well as authoritative and learned history of the East Indies for English readers. It is particularly valuable for its full documentation from Dutch sources, but it does not neglect the English writings and thus provides a really balanced view. Beginning with the geographical background, and the dawn of history as traced by the anthropologists, the author follows the development of the islands from the Hindu-Indonesian period to the fall of Bandung in March, 1942. The volume is admirably illustrated and contains enlightening maps.

SOCIETY AND NATURE. A Sociological Inquiry. By Hans Kelsen. University of Chicago Press. $4.

On the basis of much ethnological material Mr. Kelsen explains that the distinction between society and nature is known only to civilized man, not to primitive man. The former conceives nature as a system of elements connected with one another according to the principle of causality; for the latter "nature" is an intrinsic part of his society, interpreted according to social norms, especially according to the lex taliones, the norm of retribution. In sharp contrast to that conception, modern science, endeavoring to overcome dualism and to establish a monistic view of the world, tries to conceive of society as part of nature and not nature as part of society. But "no essential difference between natural and social laws, that is, between the laws determining nature, and the laws determining society, exists as soon as the natural law itself relinquishes its claim to absolute necessity and satisfies itself with being an assertion of statistical probability.'

FILMS

F AN automatic movie camera could have been set up in the Roman Forum on no matter what day two thousand years ago, every foot of it would have for us a special quality of wonder. I feel that sort of wonder in watching the March of Time's "Underground Report." Made up mainly of captured film, it gives the fullest image of occupied Europe I have seen, and gives us, above all, an image of a world, a phase, which we shall never see by any other means, since it will be wholly altered by the mere presence of our fighters, camera men, and observers, once they get there. One might discuss the film in detail and at length, for the moral and psychological charge of many of these shots is complex, and a surprising number of the single shots are magnificent. But I will merely recommend "Underground Report," very highly, to anyone who would like to be walking in the cities of Europe, invisibly, today.

I didn't see "The Eve of St. Mark" on the stage. As a film, though it is smooth, careful, and full of decent intentions, it depresses me. It has a good deal of that flavor of corn syrup which becomes continually more official in honest, homely celebrations of our local way of living: what bothers me quite as much is its equally characteristic passion for eating its cake and having it. The sufferings of war-time love and the difficulties of celibacy are conveyed in gentle glimmers by the drafted hero (William Eythe) and his sweetheart (Anne Baxter), but never frankly or painfully enough to trouble the audience. In the same way, later, a choice between honorable withdrawal from a hopeless military predicament and a still more honorable, useful death is "faced" and as promptly about-faced. There is no mention of other soldiers whose lives the deaths of these soldiers may save; the men do discuss, rather bitterly, whether their country and its future, judging by past and present performance, are worth dying for. When one of them insists that the purpose of this war is to guarantee an end of poverty everywhere, they all choose to stay and die-only to have that necessity removed by the demolition of their gun. This sort of half-honesty, which so comfortably spikes every possible charge of dishonesty, can be very deceitful; I'm not sure but what it is worse than none

I never read "Mr. Skeffington," by "Elizabeth," either. Judging by the film, I can't have missed much. It is another of those pictures in which Bette Davis demonstrates the horrors of egocentricity on a marathonic scale; it takes her just short of thirty years' living and two and a half hours' playing time to learn, from her patient husband (Claude Rains), that "a woman is beautiful only when she is loved" and to prove this to an audience which, I fear, will be made up mainly of unloved and not easily lovable women. Miss Davis, Director Vincent Sherman, and several others put great deal of hard work and some that is good into this show, and there are some expert bits of middle-teens and 1920's New York atmosphere. But essentially "Mr. Skeffington" is just a super soap opera, or an endless woman's-page meditation on What to Do When Beauty Fades. The implied advice is dismaying: hang on to your husband, who alone will stand by you then, and count yourself blessed if. like Mr. Rains in his old age, he is blinded. JAMES AGER

MUSIC

OUSSEVITZKY—when there is an occasion for him to talk about music-has a way of hurling big words and ideas around, with much destruction of intellectual crockery. One such occasion was his recent Life article on American composers. Explaining what he meant by American music he ob-served that "musical art is an expression of life and nature . . . its manifestation in each country is in accordance not only with that country's spiritual riches but also with its natural riches-its mountains, its rivers, its fertile land"-in our case the Mississippi, for example. It was not surprising therefore to learn that while "there is probably not a single living musician who understands Einstein's fourth dimension, yet the discovery that fourth dimension could exist has powerfully stimulated musical artists' imaginations, broadened their artistic horizons, and deepened their inspiration"-indeed that it has made a difference in Koussevitzky's own performances. And "the composer of today reveals in us different emotions than the composer of yesterday. . . . We don't always understand exactly what are our own emotions. . . . Beethoven had difficulties with some people who did not understand that he was expressing their emotions." That is something Beethoven himself did not understand, I suspect.

I suspect also that the facts of some of the incidents Koussevitzky described in his account of his patronage of American composers would not recognize themselves in the stories as he now recalls and tells them. He has, he says, had to battle for the American composer with the public and the critics: and when he has considered a work worth playing and they have not, he of course has been right and has continued to play it until they were convinced. His example is Copland's "Music for the Theater," which he says was a complete failure at its first New York performance, and which he therefore repeated month later, with the result that each critic now liked a different part, and which "today . . . is in the standard repertoire of every major orchestra in the United States." But I heard that first performance (at a concert of the League of Composers or some other such group); and my recollection is that the audience responded to the piece as warmly as it deserved, as did the Carnegie Hall audience month later. On the other hand I heard people in the audience express their dislike of the "Ode" which Copland wrote for the Boston Symphony several years later; and they were right, and would not, I am sure, have changed their opinion if Koussevitzky had repeated the workjust as the people who have disliked the works of Harris and Schuman have been right and have, I am sure, continued to dislike them in the face of Koussevitzky's persistence.

In 1924, he says, when he began his work with the Boston Symphony, "American creative music was barely alive"; and he revived it by playing the works of American composers and in this way getting them to write. American music was barely alive when another conductor played a new work of Hadley or Hanson; it began to revive when Koussevitzky played a new work of Edward Burlingame Hill. The truth is that other conductors have offered American composers the same kind of encouragement, and that if Koussevitzky hadn't played the music of Copland, Harris, and Schuman it would not have gone unperformed and uncomposed. And it is amusing to watch him. in some of his stories, by-pass what others did.

Thus he tells that during his first months in America he met Gershwin. "He had already composed the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' I went to the première given by Paul Whiteman. . . . Although then he lacked great technical knowledge, Gershwin . . . brought a new idea in the expression of music. He showed the whole gaiety and gusto of American life. I confess that I did not then think the 'Rhapsody in Blue' suitable for concert performance by a great symphony orchestra. I was wrong. Later I became aware of this and asked Gershwin to compose a piece for the Boston Symphony. He wrote the 'Second Rhapsody.' . . . The rhapsodies . . . were proof that there would be a real American music." One would suppose from this that after "Rhapsody in Blue" Gershwin's next step as an American composer, taken at the instigation of Koussevitzky, was "Second Rhapsody": one would never suspect that there were intervening steps instigated by someone else.

As a matter of fact Koussevitzky, who took over the Boston Symphony in the fall of 1924, could not have heard the première of "Rhapsody in Blue," which occurred in February of that year. The conductor who did attend that first Whiteman concert in Aeolian Hall was Damrosch, who after each number managed to get his "bravo!" out ahead of the applause, and who for the same reason jumped into the driver's seat of the Gershwin-for-American-Composer bandwagon by commissioning Gershwin to write the Piano Concerto in F. This was performed in the season of 1925-26; and Damrosch also conducted the first performance of "An American in Paris" in the season of 1928-29. And it was not until a couple of years later that Koussevitzky performed "Second Rhapsody," which-if I remember correctly -had begun as part of a Gershwin score for a film, when it had had the title "Rhapsody in Rivets," because of its imitations of riveting with which it "expressed" American life.

Koussevitzky evidently shares this idea that was behind Gershwin's career as a serious American composer—that since American life includes jazz and riveting the music which "expresses" this life also had to include them, and that a man who writes superb Broadway show music is therefore the man to write the American symphony and opera. The idea is completely fallacious; and that is what Gershwin's works as a serious American composer proved.

Letters to the Editors

Contrasts in Tennessee

[We print below excerpts of a letter written by a colored service man, now stationed in Tennessee, to a member of the Lynn Committee to Abolish Segregation in the Armed Forces.]

Dear ——: This camp is beautiful and well laid out. The barracks are well constructed in white with green roofs. The airplane runways are all paved and well kept. The food is good.

The segregation in the camp is of a pattern with the "legal" segregation in the surrounding territory. You are cowed and brutalized by it. You can just feel your soul growing ugly. To "make good" here, to "adjust" yourself, you have to become abject and servile. You have to crawl like the others. I won't, though

We are assigned three barracks. The lower floor of one of these is our library, recreation room, canteen, and soda fountain. The library is like neglected stable, the recreation room an ill-kept barn, the canteen store like a country store, the soda fountain worse than slum side-street candy store-all this amid elegant services for the whites. In the camp theater we are segregated in the back. I went once. Don't intend going back. We are not allowed on the navy buses. We pay twenty-five cents to go and twenty-five cents to return on buses operated by a private company. The white boys ride navy buses free. The white boys are allowed visitors; we are not. Some of the Negro USO leaders in Memphis are supposed to be doing something about that.

I went in to Memphis on liberty last Tuesday. The horror of it is still with me. My dear fellow, the Negro here is worse off than any Jew in Germany or any untouchable in India. No white person speaks to a Negro in public-I mean on the bus or trolley or street. The faces of the white people horrify you with their "apartness" and grimness. The Negroes are contemptible-servile, grinning, packed in the back of the buses, myself along with them of course. I saw the famous Beale Street, a dilapidated trickle of filth across the face of the earth. The density of syphilis among the Negro population of Memphis is 85 per cent. They look it. Being with sailors I of course went to the clubs and saloons and bars and so forth. The people there were so tawdry and falsely glittering in their "glad rags" and so loudly and boisterously happy that I became literally ill.

A friend had given me the telephone number of his home. I phoned and went out there. It's on the north side of Memphis in a suburban neighborhood referred to by southsiders as "the country." This family was a composite of what the strength of the Negro and the human race is. A humble familymother, father, and four children-in a humble home which they owned, something between a cabin and a cottage. That home held many fascinating contradictions. Of the four children, one boy is in the navy, one daughter is at Clark Theological Seminary in Atlanta, a boy and a girl are in high school. The father works as a janitor for a white church, and the mother is a cook in service for a white family. Yet here is home, you can feel it's a home, with children being educated, an electric refrigerator in the kitchen, chickens and a hog in the backyard, and a lovely cabinet radio, all from the earnings of two semi-illiterate parents. The father is a handkerchief-head. The crook in his back would pain you. The mother looks up and there is no fear in her eyes. These Negro mothers are the greatest mothers ever, I sometimes think. But along with this, white leghorn chickens in a coop in the corner of the kitchen making a fearful noise, the junky coal stove, the accumulated clatter of striving poverty through the years. I loved these people. Memphis, May 8

Mr. Agee's Good Word

Dear Sirs: Inasmuch as I was one of those who used to write you in the interest of movie criticisms, I feel that now I should commend your film colmun.

Mr. Agee is splendid when one gets accustomed to his intensive style of writing, and I hope you will keep him coming along week after week. Movie criticisms are important to people who live butside New York, as important as drama criticisms are academic. It's too much trouble and expense to go to all the movies blindly in the hope of running across a good one now and then. I have recently seen two good pictures—"The Lodger" and "The Miracle of Morgan's Creek"—that I would probably not have seen but for Mr. Agee's good word. Where else is one going to find out? As nearly as I can remember, the local newspaper described "The Miracle of Morgan's Creek" as "a picture about soldiers and their sweethearts which presents a strong case against hasty marriages to men in uniform," Not much help there, would you say?

Thanks for Mr. Agee, however it is

"International Affairs"

Dear Sirs: Owing to the war, International Affairs, the quarterly journal of the Royal Institute of International Affairs, has been suspended during the past four years, but arrangements have been made by the Council of Chatham House with the University of Toronto Press to have International Affairs printed in Canada as of January, 1944.

International Affairs is the only British periodical devoted exclusively to current international questions and problems of reconstruction. We believe that you may wish to call the journal to the attention of your readers because it is a valuable source of information on the research and discussion related to post-war problems that is being carried on in Great Britain today.

The Shape of Things

THE SYMBOLIC AND POLITICAL VALUE OF THE liberation of Rome need hardly be stressed, but its military significance is not yet clear. As General Alexander has emphasized, the primary objective of the Allied army in Italy is not the capture of territory but the destruction of the enemy forces. This end has still to be achieved. In the twenty-four-day offensive which preceded the fall of Rome the Germans were badly mauled. They lost heavily in men and equipment, and many thousands were taken prisoner. But by flinging his reserves into Valmontone and holding that point for several days, Field Marshal Kesselring kept open the Via Casilina long enough for the bulk of his forces in the Sacco and Liri valleys to escape. However, he is by no means out of the woods. If our advance columns can pass rapidly through Rome and seize control of the roads paralleling the Tyrrhenian Sea, the effect will be to press the Germans back into the mountainous interior of the peninsula, where they will be badly hampered by inadequate communications. Politically the fall of the Italian capital has brought the fulfilment of King Victor Emmanuel's promise to retire in favor of Prince Humbert, a move which leaves the situation unchanged. The prince is tarred with the same Fascist brush as his father and is, if anything, more cordially disliked by Italian democrats. This "solution" of the monarchy problem is a makeshift the flimsiness of which will become increasingly apparent as more of Italy is freed.

CATHOLICS ALL OVER THE WORLD WILL BE happy to see the battle for Rome ended without a fight within the walls of the Eternal City and to know that the Pope has passed safely from Axis custody to territory under Allied control. Many of us, however, would be happier if we felt that in receiving the Pontiff we were welcoming a true friend of our cause. With the geographical and ecclestiastical limitations the Vatican has had to face, nobody expected the Pope to assume a belligerent role. It was, however, fair to count on greater firmness in his condemnation of Nazi crimes; it was certainly proper to expect a strict observance of neutrality. The Pope's speech of June 2, on the very eve of our occupation of Rome, was not the speech of a neutral. In taking a stand against the need for total victory when the hour of Europe's liberation was about to strike, he was serving the cause of Berlin. Those of us with longer than war-time memories ask if this is not the same Cardinal Pacelli, the Vatican's Secretary of State, who oriented the policies of the Holy See against Spanish, Czechoslovakian, and Austrian democracy. Indeed, the speech had the familiar ring of that religious totalitariantism that regretted the Reformation because in smashing the authoritarian controls of the Middle Ages it opened the floodgates of democracy. Perhaps even now the enemy is rejoicing that within the camp of the Allies there is so influential an agent of a negotiated peace.

SPANGLER, BUTLER, AND BRICKER—A TRIO OF frightened Republicans—have directed urgent and pathetic appeals to the Attorney General, the Senate, and the nation at large to be saved from a fate worse than death at the hands of the CIO Political Action Committee. The writing is plainly on the wall. The curtain is slowly descending on a tragi-comedy that has already played too long. Where are now the stout troopers of yesterday—Dies, Starnes, Holman, Costello—driven from the stage by the insistent voices of those who had sat watching the farce without realizing that they had the power to stop it? The Political Action Committee have declared that they are quite willing to appear before any proper committee of investigation and that their books and records are open. The net result appears to be: increased prestige for the Political Action Committee and the final alienation of an important section of the American labor movement by the Republican Party.

CONGRESSMEN MAY NOT READ THE BILLS they vote on, but their aptness in following the election returns was demonstrated on a number of important issues last week. Two months ago the House eliminated the school luncheon program from the agricultural appropriation bill by a vote of 136 to 52; last week it restored the program by attaching it to a pending bill for insect and plant-disease control. Earlier in a high show of independence the House had denied funds to the Federal Security Agency with the intent of forcing its liquidation; this action has now been reversed by the adoption of special legislation giving statutory authority to the agency. Less surprisingly, the House also voted to restore the Tennessee Valley Authority's revolving fund by rejecting Senator McKellar's amendment which would have forced the TVA's receipts into the Treasury and thus made the agency dependent on Congress. Another dangerous McKellar amendment, calling for Senate confirmation of all federal employees whose salaries exceed $4,500, was also thrown out by the House.

THE REFUSAL of 13,500 BREWSTER AIRCRAFT workers to budge when the navy shut down the big Long Island plant was an event of great portent. It dramatized a situation that is bound to loom with increasing seriousness as cutbacks in war production increase. Several aspects are worth consideration. First, the spirit of American workers, tempered in the fires of the depression and forged into a unity in the common war effort, will not stand for any government fuddling in the conversion of industry and the transfer of workers. All the talk of full employment must have consummation in plans that work. Second, it appears that the Brewster situation caught short the several agencies and individuals generally responsible for coping with it. It took the dramatic sitdown to bring to light the plans for reconverting the plant that War Mobilization Director Byrnes, the WPB, and the Senate Military Affairs Committee were apparently holding in reserve. Third, widespread conversion obviously involves more than renewing contracts or making over factories while the workers wait around. In many cases it means breaking up work forces and moving workers to other plants. But if workers are to accept the inconvenience of uprooting themselves and their families and seeking new homes, they must be assured that they are moving according to some over-all plan and not merely being dispersed so as to lessen the effect of their solidarity.

THE WAR MANPOWER COMMISSION'S NEWLY announced program for controlling the hiring of all male workers of seventeen years of age and over appears to be a thoroughly sound one so far as it goes. It is only reasonable that in wartime all hiring should be channeled through some central agency such as the United States Employment Service. It is probable that this step would have been taken long ago if the Employment Service had been prepared to handle the responsibility. In the early days of the defense program, however, conditions in some of the local employment offices bordered on the chaotic, and it was recognized that they could not be burdened with additional tasks. Since that time the USES has successfully taken over responsibilities, and it is now well qualified for the job of supervising the ticklish employment problems of the "cut-back" period. Although some critics have attacked the WMC's new order as "totalitarian," actually it imposes no obligation to work upon any man. It merely prevents men from shifting from essential to non-essential work-a type of control that is clearly necessary.

WE ARE SORRY TO SEE THAT IT REQUIRED some rather tricky parliamentary maneuvering in the House to obtain even the four-vote margin by which the President's Fair Employment Practices Committee won an appropriation of $500,000. The FEPC was included among eighteen war agencies in a supply appropriations bill which was taken to the floor under a unanimous consent agreement that points of order would be waived. The FEPC's opponents seem to have been taken unawares and claimed that they did not know it was included until after the unanimous consent agreement had been made. For once the agile Southern parliamentarians were beaten at their own game. The incident, however, may have serious consequences in the Senate. The reaction of the Republican press indicates that the Republicans may use this as an excuse to join hands with the "white supremacy" Democrats in another of those combined operations. Defeat of the FEPC, hitherto a purely presidential agency, would be a deadly blow to the morale of the Negro population already irritated and disheartened by discrimination in the armed forces as well as in industry. Praise is due Majority Leader Mc-Cormack for joining with Marcantonio in piloting the FEPC appropriation through the House.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION IN CANADA IS described in an article by David Lewis which appears in this issue of The Nation. The most significant phenomenon is that the political competition is on the left, each party attempting to prove to the Canadian people that it represents the soundest kind of advanced social and political thinking. Forcing the pace is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation-the C. C. F.-pledged to a program of socialist planning. Recent gains of the new party were climaxed last summer in the winning of thirty-four seats in the Ontario provincial election to the Conservative government's thirty-eight. On this occasion the C. C. F. showed its greatest strength in urban and industrial centers. Now it has an opportunity to test its hold on a purely agricultural area. On June 15 the Saskatchewan voters will go to the polls. The issue is a clear-cut one between the present Liberal government in power and the challenging C. C. F., which is conceded an excellent chance of victory. The outcome will have an important bearing in the federal election that is due to take place sometime within the next year. American as well as Canadian progressives are watching Saskatchewan with intense interest to see which way the political winds are blowing.

Another Snub for France

HEN Mr. Churchill told the House of Commons that he had invited General de Gaulle to come to London, bringing some members of "his government with him" (was this a prophetic slip of the tongue?), he added the move had the entire approval of Mr. Roosevelt. This suggested American participation in the conversations between the British and French and seemed to offer the hope of some agreed policy on France in the eleventh hour before the invasion. The hope was quickly quenched by word from Washington that the United States would not be represented at the London talks; and now de Gaulle is, quite naturally, hesitating to make the journey since he has no assurance that agreements reached with the British will not be nullified by the refusal of Mr. Roosevelt to indorse them.

It may be argued, of course, that the French leader would have an opportunity in Britain to negotiate with General Eisenhower, who has been entrusted with full powers to make arrangements for the civil government of France. But it is by no means clear how full General Eisenhower's powers are. Can he, for instance, decide to deal with the French Committee of National Liberation as the exclusive authority for the civil administration of the liberated areas? Can he arrive at binding agreements with the French authorities on financial and economic matters?

Questions of what kind of currency shall be used in liberated France, under what authority it shall be issued, and at what rate it will be exchanged against the dollar and pound are of outstanding importance. The Norwegian, Dutch, and Belgian governments have, it is understood, been promised control over their currencies; the French, very reasonably, demand the same privilege, which is one of the first prerogatives of a sovereign state. And French interests are deeply involved, for errors in fixing exchange rates will accentuate the inflation which has resulted from German occupation. In this connection, it is even more important, perhaps, that some control of spending by the armies of liberation should be instituted. If our soldiers, with their comparatively high pay, are permitted to compete with the local population for the very limited supply of goods available, prices are bound to soar while rationing systems will break down.

On such matters the French are certainly entitled to a voice in deciding policy. But in this instance, as in so many others, the negative attitude of the President to the French Committee and his failure to establish proper channels of communication with it have created a deadlock. The proper solution for this situation is one which we have urged for a long time—recognition of the Committee of National Liberation as the provisional government of France. Russia, it is believed, is pressing for this solution and may act unilaterally if we refuse to take the plunge. British opinion is pressing strongly in the same direction but the Churchill government appears committed to rubber-stamping American policy.

Consequently, the invasion of France may take place with the situation completely fluid, with no settled plans for dealing with the myriad problems of civil administration that will arise. Perhaps that is what the President wants; perhaps, distrusting the De Gaullist movement, he cherishes a belief that once France is liberated some other group will miraculously emerge and prove capable of restoring France to constitutional government. Undoubtedly there are anti-Gaullist groups waiting to catch the Presidential eye but they are composed of men who having run with the Nazi hounds now hope to finish with the Allied hares. To range our power and influence behind them would be to declare war on the people of France.

The Texas Plot

DIEHARDS of the right in both parties are determined that if they cannot beat Roosevelt by rallying a majority of the voters against him, they will beat him in spite of the voters. That is the meaning of the Electoral College conspiracy which, after long and careful underground preparation, was unveiled at the Texas Democratic convention. It is not confined to Texas. The earlier decision of the South Carolina Democratic convention to postpone the choice of the state's Presidential electors until after the national convention was the first hint of the plot. And now its organizers are working to bring in four other states—Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississisppi.

The technique the conspirators hope to employ to thwart the popular will is strictly in accordance with the letter of the Constitution. In Presidential elections the votes are cast not for the party nominees but for members of the Electoral College, who legally have the right to make a free choice of men for President and Vice-President. In practice, as Mark Sullivan has pointed out in the New York Herald Tribune, "the electors of a state are supposed to vote for that candidate for President who carried the state in the November election. They have done so ever since our two-party political system arose, with the solitary exception of one elector in one state in the year 1820."

The Electoral College is to the Constitution what the appendix is to the human body. The appendix has no function any more and normally causes no trouble. However, if it becomes infected and inflamed, the result is violent illness and even death unless it is promptly cut out. The Southern bourbons, aided and abetted by their Northern cousins, are deliberately attempting to inflame this vestigial constitutional organ—the Electoral College—although, as they must be fully aware, they thereby risk a dangerous sickness of the whole body politic.

The Texas gang which captured the Democratic state convention resolved to instruct their electors to ignore the national nominees for President and Vice-President unless the national convention in Chicago complies fully with their demands. Their terms include a Democratic platform which will specifically condemn the Supreme Court decision permitting Negroes to vote in Texas primaries and the various Administration efforts to diminish racial inequalities. In addition, they are insisting on a restoration of the national convention's two-thirds-vote rule for nominating Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates. These terms, obviously, are completely unacceptable to the President and a majority of Northern Democrats. They could only be met at the cost of splitting the party in two.

No doubt the large minority of Texas Democrats who broke away from the regular convention will try to force the anti-Roosevelt electors off the state ballot. But such action, we understand, will encounter almost insurmountable legal barriers. The next step would be to attempt to put on the ballot a slate of electors pledged to the party's nominees. If successful, this would lead to a split in the Democratic vote and might enable the Republicans to capture the state. Even so, an election with rival Democratic tickets would be better than one in which Texans could merely have a choice between voting Republican or voting for "Democratic" electors committed to the defeat of Roosevelt—a choice which would mean effective disfranchisement of the probable majority.

In a close election—and this strategy is predicated on that possibility—the twenty-one Texas votes might be decisive in the Electoral College. If the conspiracy succeeds in naming "uninstructed" electors in Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, it would mean a reactionary bloc of seventy. These votes could be flung to the Republican nominee—no doubt the G. O. P. would be willing to make a suitable deal—or they could be given to some "safe" Democrat such as Senator Byrd. In the second case the election would be thrown into the House of Representatives, where each state delegation would have one vote. We should then have, perhaps at a most critical stage in the war, a prolonged period of confusion, violent controversy, and involved political bargaining. That is a terrifying prospect to any patriot, but as a Texas "neutral" is reported by Barron's, the financial weekly, as saying: "There's one modified behind the whole maneuver—to get Roosevelt, and my guess is that those boys will stop at nothing until they do."

Have We Lost the Peace?

CECRETARY HULL'S announcement that he was asking representatives from Great Britain, Russia, and China to confer with us on plans for post-war world organization is being widely hailed as an important step toward carrying out the commitments of the Moscow Declaration. The wording of the announcement and Mr. Roosevelt's guarded comments on it suggest that the plans have already reached an advanced stage, if, indeed, agreement has not already been achieved on essentials. This supposition is borne out by the close parallel between the statements regarding the future organization of the world that have been made recently in Washington and London. Purposely vague though these statements have been, they are specific enough to arouse grave apprehension regarding the trend of thinking in both capitals.

Churchill's recent speech, which in general was so alarming in character, made it clear that Britain is thinking in terms of a world organization that would be dominated, for a considerable period at least, by Britain, Russia, and the United States-with China possibly a silent partner. Eden confirmed this general impression a few days later in a speech which was slightly more detailed than Churchill's. America's attitude on the vital question of the relationship between the small and the great powers is not quite so clear. But Mr. Roosevelt may have had this issue in mind when he referred to the proposed organization as a 1944 model of the League reflecting in some ways a more cynical attitude than in 1918. Some ordinarily well-informed Washington correspondents insist that the "American plan" which Mr. Hull has worked out in consultation with a bi-partisan group of Senators closely parallels the British proposals in placing the greatest responsibility, and power, in the hands of the Big Three. The Secretary's attempt to reassure the small nations was so effusive that it is doubtful whether it carried much weight.

The problem of apportioning power and responsibility among the smaller and larger nations in a post-war international organization is of course an extremely difficult one. It cannot be solved by any simple formula. Quite probably we shall again have to fall back on some dual arrangement similar to that found in the Council and Assembly of the old League of Nations. But the plans now being discussed in London and Washington go considerably farther and would limit effective political and military power within the world organization to the three or four states that are carrying the main burden of the present war. This may be necessary in the first months following the defeat of the Axis, before the occupied countries can be rehabilitated. But it is hardly a sound pattern for a stable world order. It bears a striking similarity in principle to the "new order" which the Axis has been striving to impose in Europe and Asia. This similarity has, of course, not passed unnoticed among the exiled governments. The protest of the Netherlands Foreign Minister, Eelco van Kleffens, undoubtedly reflected the view of all the smaller countries. It seems peculiarly unfortunate that the British and American statements should have been issued on the eve of invasion when every effort is being made to enlist the active assistance of the peoples of Europe. Secretary Hull has indicated that some attempt will be made to conciliate the smaller countries by offering them certain safeguards and concessions in setting up the new international organization. But the fact remains that, according to present signs, they will be taken in as junior partners with very little to say about the operation of the firm's business.

Nor is this the only cause for apprehension in the preview of the peace plans that has been permitted us. We are told that the idea of a world police force, capable of enforcing the peace, has been dropped because none of the powers are willing to place any part of their armed services under international control. Instead, some provision will presumably be made whereby the new international agency may request the assistance of the various national armies in preventing future aggression. The weakness of such a plan should be apparent to anyone who lived through the tragic 1930's when the League was in process of disintegration. The League had no difficulty in enforcing peace as long as the great powers agreed among themselves. But it collapsed when the powers differed, or lacked interest, because it had no means of its own for enforcing its decisions. The creation of a genuine international force which is not subject to the limitations of conflicting national interests is basic to any plan of international security. Such a force should not, as was implied in the objection cited above, be composed of various national units serving under an international authority, but should be an international body, like, say, the French Foreign Legion, giving allegiance to the world organization. Unless some such supranational power can be created, capable of curbing future national adventurers, we shall have lost the peace.

For the Jews-Life or Death?

BY I. F. STONE

[At his press conference on June 2, after this article was written, the President indicated that he was considering the conversion of an army camp in this country into a "free port" for refugees. Unfortunately, as the New York Post has pointed out, "his statement was conditional, indefinite. The check is still on paper and we don't even know what the amount is." In these circumstances Mr. Stone's analysis of the urgency of the situation and his plea for public pressure to secure action from the Administration are no less valid than they were before Mr. Roosevelt spoke.]

Washington, June 1

HIS letter, addressed specifically to fellow-news-papermen and to editors the country over, is an appeal for help. The establishment of temporary internment camps for refugees in the United States, vividly named "free ports" by Samuel Grafton of the New York Post, is in danger of bogging down. Every similar proposal here has bogged down until it was too late to save any lives. I have been over a mass of material, some of it confidential, dealing with the plight of the fast-disappearing Jews of Europe and with the fate of suggestions for aiding them, and it is a dreadful story.

Anything newspapermen can write about this in their own papers will help. It will help to save lives, the lives of people like ourselves. I wish I were eloquent, I wish I could put down on paper the picture that comes to me from the restrained and diplomatic language of the documents. As I write, the morning papers carry a dispatch from Lisbon reporting that the "deadline"—the idiom was never more literal—has passed for the Jews of Hungary. It is approaching for the Jews of Bulgaria, where the Nazis yesterday set up a puppet regime.

I need not dwell upon the authenticated horrors of the Nazi internment camps and death chambers for Jews. That is not tragic but a kind of insane horror. It is our part in this which is tragic. The essence of tragedy is not the doing of evil by evil men but the doing of evil by good men, out of weakness, indecision, sloth, inability to act in accordance with what they know to be right. The tragic element in the fate of the Jews of Europe lies in the failure of their friends in the West to shake loose from customary ways and bureaucratic habit, to risk inexpediency and defy prejudice, to be whole-hearted, to care as deeply and fight as hard for the big words we use, for justice and for humanity, as the fanatic Nazi does for his master race or the fanatic Jap for his Emperor. A reporter in Washington cannot help seeing this weakness all about him. We are half-hearted about what little we could do to help the Jews of Europe as we are half-hearted about our economic warfare, about blacklisting those who help our enemies, about almost everything in the war except the actual fighting.

There is much we could have done to save the Jews of Europe before the war. There is much we could have done since the war began. There are still things we could do today which would give new lives to a few and hope to many. The hope that all is not black in the world for his children can be strong sustenance for a man starving in a camp or entering a gas chamber. But to feel that your friends and allies are wishy-washy folk who mean what they say but haven't got the gumption to live up to it must brew a poisonous despair. When Mr. Roosevelt established the War Refugee Board in January, he said it was "the policy of this government to take all measures within its power... consistent with the successful prosecution of the war... to rescue the victims of enemy oppression."

The facts are simple. Thanks to the International Red Cross and those good folk the Quakers, thanks to courageous non-Jewish friends in the occupied countries themselves and to intrepid Jews who run a kind of underground railway under Nazi noses, something can still be done to alleviate the suffering of the Jews in Europe and some Jews can still be got out. Even under the White Paper there are still 22,000 immigration visas available for entry into Palestine. The main problem is to get Jews over the Turkish border without a passport for transit to Palestine. "Free ports" in Turkey are needed, but the Turks, irritated by other pressures from England and the United States, are unwilling to do for Jewish refugees what we ourselves are still unwilling to do, that is, give them a temporary haven. Only an executive order by the President establishing "free ports" in this country can prove to the Turks that we are dealing with them in good faith; under present circumstances they cannot but feel contemptuous of our pleas. And the longer we delay the fewer Jews there will be left to rescue, the slimmer the chances to get them out. Between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 European Jews have been killed since August, 1942, when the Nazi extermination campaign began.

There are people here who say the President cannot risk a move of this kind before election. I believe that an insult to the American people. I do not believe any but a few unworthy bigots would object to giving a few thousand refugees a temporary breathing spell in their flight from oppression. It is a question of Mr. Roosevelt's courage and good faith. All he is called upon to do, after all, is what Franco did months ago, yes, Franco. Franco established "free ports," internment camps, months ago for refugees who fled across his border, refugees, let us remember, from his own ally and patron, Hitler. Knowing the Führer's maniacal hatred for Jews, that kindness on Franco's part took considerably more courage than Mr. Roosevelt needs to face a few sneering editorials, perhaps, from the Chicago Tribune. I say "perhaps" because I do not know that even Colonel McCormick would in fact be hostile.

Official Washington's capacity for finding excuses for inaction is endless, and many people in the State and War departments who play a part in this matter can spend months sucking their legalistic thumbs over any problem. So many things that might have been done were attempted too late. A little more than a year ago Sweden offered to take 20,000 Jewish children from occupied Europe if Britain and the United States guaranteed their feeding and after the war their repatriation. The British were fairly rapid in this case, but it took three or four months to get these assurances from the American government, and by that time the situation had worsened to a point that seems to have blocked the whole project. In another case the Bulgarian government offered visas for 1,000 Jews if arrangements could be made within a certain time for their departure. A ship was obtained at once, but it took seven weeks for British officials to get clearance for the project from London, and by that time the time limit had been passed. The records, when they can be published, will show many similar incidents.

The news that the United States had established "free ports" would bring hope to people who have now no hope. It would encourage neutrals to let in more refugees because we could take out some of those they have already admitted. Most important, it would provide the argument of example and the evidence of sincerity in the negotiations for "free ports" in Turkey, last hope of the Balkan Jews. I ask fellow-newspapermen to show the President by their expressions of opinion in their own papers that if he hesitates for fear of an unpleasant political reaction he badly misconstrues the real feelings of the American people.

Canada Swings Left

BY DAVID LEWIS

An AMERICAN liberal observing Canadian politics today would be struck by one encouraging fact: the competition between political parties is on the left. All the parties are vying with one another in presenting progressive measures for the post-war period—for greater social security, the rehabilitation of service men, the provision of full employment. Liberals and Conservatives alike are emphasizing the duty of "putting human need ahead of private greed." If the politicians keep only half their promises, the lot of the Canadian people will be greatly improved whichever party wins.

The reason for the shift to the left even by parties of the right is found in the temper of the Canadian people and the challenge of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, better known as the C. C. F. Everywhere in Canada there is a strong demand for progressive government, an unwillingness to leave the country after the war to the unregulated mercies of "free enterprise." This does not mean that Canadians have all become Socialists. It does mean, however, that they are convinced of the need for legislation and government regulation to guarantee them a minimum of security. Relatively little opposition to government controls as such is shown in Canada, and most of the complaints are confined to the business community. The workers and farmers, and many middle-class groups, are persuaded that some measure of planning is necessary. The old parties do not date ignore these stirrings among the people lest there be an even more vigorous swing toward the C. C. F.

The C. C. F. was born of the Great Depression in 1932, as was the New Deal in America. Its program, however, was not grafted on to an old political party; which contained many elements basically opposed to progressive political action, but was fashioned by an independent party starting from scratch, without obligations to any contradictory forces or institutions. As a result the growth of the C. C. F. was at first very slow and its influence relatively small. At the same time it built on an integrated ideological basis which assured its continued growth.

The program of the C. C. F. is democratic socialism, with as much emphasis on the concept of a dynamic democracy as on the objectives of socialization. Like similar parties in other parts of the British Commonwealth, the C. C. F. rejects dogmatism and presses for immediate reforms as vigorously as for its ultimate objectives. It has thus become closely identified with the daily struggle of the workers and farmers of Canada. Its continuous and vigorous political activity is largely dependent on the voluntary aid of thousands of Canadians, who have thus developed a big stake in the movement.

By reason of a combination of events in western Canada, the initiative in founding the C. C. F. was taken by farmer groups on the prairies. Western farmers participated fully in drawing up the party's first statement of principles, accepting its socialist aims as well as its immediate reform program. The party quickly became established in British Columbia, on the Pacific coast, and in Saskatchewan. In the rest of the country, particularly in central and eastern Canada, it had a difficult struggle for the first nine years. Influenced by the American tradeunion tradition, organized labor remained officially aloof. But the C. C. F. continued to build painstakingly, patiently, from the ground up.

Just before the party reached its tenth anniversary. the turn came and it began to grow at a striking rate. In two years it won four federal by-elections and five provincial ones. This advance reached a climax last August in the provincial elections in Ontario, when the C. C. F. entered the election without a single representative in the Legislature and emerged with thirty-four members as against the government party's thirty-eight. At the present time the C. C. F. is the official opposition in four of the nine provinces. The first step in the growing tie between organized labor and the C. C. F. was taken by the eastern district of the United Mine Workers, which joined the party in 1938. The Canadian Congress of Labor, which includes Canadian branches of C. I. O. unions as well as a number of national organizations, has officially called on its member unions to affiliate with the C. C. F. and has formed a Political Action Committee to promote such action. Many A. F. of L. unions in various parts of the country are also affiliated.

Some seven months ago a Gallup poll showed the C. C. F. to have the support of 29 per cent of the people as against 28 per cent for each of the two old parties. Two later polls showed a small decline in C. C. F. support and a corresponding rise in that of the other parties. But there is reason to believe that this is only a temporary swing back by the outer fringe of C. C. F. adherents. Few people doubt that the party will emerge from the next federal election the second largest, if not the largest, party in Parliament.

The "free-enterprise" advocates recognize that they can combat the real and growing threat offered by the C. C. F. in only two ways—by a campaign designed to arouse people's fears of what would happen to them under the C. C. F., or by the Disraeli technique of stealing their opponent's political pants. Since the people are not likely to be frightened away from the C. C. F. if the only alternative is reaction, they must be persuaded that the other parties also stand for reform. Even big business has been forced to talk about a "reformed" capitalism and the need for curbs on its own excesses.

An important test of C. C. F. strength will be provided by the provincial election in Saskatchewan on June 15. There the battle is exclusively between the Liberal Party and the C. C. F., and it is a battle for power. The C. C. F. is better organized in Saskatchewan than in any other part of Canada. It has entered the election campaign not simply to make a little more progress but to capture the government. Observers are agreed that its victory is extremely likely. Obviously, if the C. C. F. does win, it will be given tremendous momentum in the rest of the country.

A victory in Saskatchewan will produce the first C. C. F. government in Canada and the first demonstration of the worth of C. C. F. policies and leadership. But the demonstration will be incomplete because it will be confined to a province. A provincial government has constitutional limitations which deprive it of many basic economic levers, such as, for example, monetary and fiscal policy. And, in addition, a C. C. F. government would probably face unfriendly or indifferent action by the federal government, to say nothing of the vigorous opposition of big business.

Thus if the C. C. F. takes over the government in Saskatchewan, it will have no easy task. Nevertheless, it is preparing for the event with confidence. It believes strongly that democratic socialists must be ready to assume power whenever the opportunity presents itself and must be bold enough to implement a progressive policy whatever the difficulties. The C. C. F. also has great confidence in its Saskatchewan leader. T. C. Douglas, a young man under forty, has been a member of the defeatal Parliament since 1935 and has exhibited a profound understanding of social and economic forces, a great deal of courage, and a keen political sense.

Another provincial election due this year will hinge on the strength of political developments in another direction. The Liberal Premier of Quebec, Mr. Godbout, has stated with as much definiteness as can be expected of politicians that he intends to go to the people before the end of 1944, probably in the summer or early fall. On this occasion the Liberal Party's rule will be seriously challenged not by the C. C. F. but by reactionary nationalist parties. The main contender against the Liberals will be their present opposition in the Legislature, the Union Nationale. The Union's leader is Maurice Duplessis, who was Premier of Quebec at the outbreak of the war and whose government was distinguished chiefly for its anti-labor measures and the notorious Padlock Act, a barefaced attempt to interfere with civil liberty. Next comes the Bloc Populaire Canadien, a dangerously reactionary and corporatist party which arose mainly in opposition to conscription and to Canada's all-out participation in the war. Recently there has been a split in the Bloc, and three well-known nationalist rebels-Hamel, Gouin, and Chaloult-have left its ranks.

The Godbout government has three or four major progressive measures to its credit. It has given Quebec women the right to vote in provincial elections, introduced compulsory school attendance, and paid particular attention to the Quebec farmers. One of its most important acts was its expropriation of the Montreal Light, Heat, and Power Corporation—a giant private-power monopoly—and its creation of a publicly owned hydroelectric system. The effect of these progressive measures, however, may be more than offset in industrial centers by that of two reactionary labor laws which seriously interfere with union rights.

The C. C. F. is relatively weak in Quebec although it is steadily gaining in strength, particularly among the organized workers. It is significant that the French Canadians in Ontario supported the C. C. F. in very large numbers in last August's election. C. C. F. growth in Quebec is accelerating now that the Catholic church has officially lifted an imagined ban against the party. The main interest in the Quebec contest, however, will be the strength of the nationalist groups and their fate at the hands of the electorate.

The provincial elections in Saskatchewan and Quebec have additional importance because they set the stage for the federal election, which is due any time within the next twelvemonth. All political parties are gathering their strength for that contest in the full knowledge that its result will determine the pattern of Canada's economic and social development. To meet the challenge of the C. C. F. the old parties, in collaboration with big business, have launched one of the best-organized propaganda campaigns in Canadian political history. Huge funds with which to finance it have been set up in various centers of Canada. Advertising firms and public-relations counsel have been engaged to direct it. The technique employed is the well-known appeal to fear. The press and the air are filled with the warning: "The C. C. F. will take away your homes, confiscate your savings and your insurance policies, grab your farm, and regiment your life in a bureaucratic strait-jacket." (American New Dealers will recognize the formula.) Because the Soviet Union is deservedly popular with the masses of the people, the old epithet "Communist" has been replaced by "National Socialist."

The C. C. F. is countering this attack with an intensive educational campaign. Having already won the support of most Canadians of all classes who are consciously ready to support fundamental economic change, it is now directing its appeal to the masses who are more concerned with their immediate prospects than with ultimate objectives. Fortunately the C. C. F. has always avoided doctrinaire jargon and has concentrated its attention on concrete, practicable proposals. It is now elaborating for the people of Canada a post-war program based on the pregnant lessons of the country's war economy. The program is directed to the achievement of full employment, a high national income, adequate housing and education, planned rehabilitation of service men, and a comprehensive scheme of social security. Its socialist proposals are presented challengingly in terms of these objectives.

A victory for the progressive forces in Canada will encourage progressives in other countries on this continent. And it will strengthen the influence of the labor movements in the British Commonwealth—an important factor in the development of a world community.

But Why Do Spaniards Talk So Loud?

BY LEON FELIPF

N THIS point I think that I, too, have a few words to say. The raised voice in which the Spaniard speaks is an old defect of his race. Old, chronic, and incurable. We Spaniards have throats that are hoarse and raw. We talk in a shout, as if we had been hurt, and our vocal chords are forever out of tune. Forever, because three times in history—three times—we had to scream so loud that it tore our very larynxes.

The first time was when we discovered this continent, and there was need to yell at the top of our lungs, "Land! Land! Land!" We had to shout that word so that it would sound above the noise of the sea, and would reach the ears of men who had stayed behind on the other shore. We had just discovered a New World, a world of different dimensions, a world to which—five centuries later at the time of the great European shipwreck—man's hopes would have to cling. There were reasons for talking loud. There were reasons for shouting.

The second time was when that ghostly old eccentric the knight of La Mancha, grotesquely clad, with his broken lance and his paper helmet, sallied forth into the world and lawlessly launched on the four winds those words that men had forgotten—"Justice! Justice! Justice!" There were reasons for shouting then, too.

The third is more recent. I was in the choir that time. My voice is still hoarse from the strain. That was the shout we gave on Madrid's hilltop in 1936 to warn the sheepfold, rouse the shepherds, and waken the world: "Watch out—here comes the wolf! Here comes the wolf! The wolf!"

He who cried "Land!" and shouted "Justice!" is the same Spaniard who, only eight short years ago, screamed from Madrid's hilltop to the shepherds below, "Watch out! Here comes the wolf!"

Nobody heard him. Nobody. The doddering old sheep herders who write history to suit themselves closed all the doors and windows, made themselves deaf, filled their ears with cement. And even now they go about asking, "But why do Spaniards talk so loud?"

The Spaniard does not raise his voice. The Spaniard talks exactly on man's level. And as for those who think his voice is too high, perhaps that is because they are listening from the bottom of a well.

Big Steel-Prince or Pauper?

BY BERNARD J. REIS

THE crucial point in the steel hearings now being held before a special panel of the National War Labor Board is whether the industry has sufficient funds to meet the wage and other demands of the United Steelworkers of America (C. I. O.). According to industry spokesmen, these demands would exhaust the financial resources of the steel companies and destroy their ability to provide jobs and maintain a high level of production after the war. Even before the case came up, the industry was telling the country the same story. It may be useful to test this claim by presenting a case history of the largest corporation in the industry.

Big Steel maintains that it is in a relatively precarious position. It argues that rising costs and frozen price levels are threatening its future security. In its 1943 report to stockholders it points out that "United States Steel was not able, after the payment of modest dividends to its common stockholders, to make an adequate addition to the fund carried forward for future needs. A continuation of such a state of affairs may prove serious to United States Steel and ultimately to the nation, as this fund constitutes insurance against the times when the customers' demand for steel may be small and the need for cash may be great." To buttress this point, the corporation claims firmly that after "dividends totaling $60,000,000 declared on the preferred and common stock, there remained from the 1943 income the relatively small sum of $3,400,000 to be carried forward for future needs. This was one-third of the amount carried forward in 1942 and was equivalent to about one-sixth of 1 per cent of $2,000,000,000 received from customers in 1943. This sum would cover costs, at current operating rates, for less than one day."

United States Steel, it would appear, despite its recordbreaking war operations, is practically a pauper. Forgetting its rugged individualism, the corporation has widely proclaimed its poverty in large advertisements. Some sections of the press have already reacted with the proper degree of alarm. The New York Herald Tribune, for example, ran an editorial which argued that Big Steel must be maintained "in a financial condition which will insure its ability to do its share in meeting the post-war reemployment problem." It presented Big Steel's case in these words: "The fact that steel prices have been frozen at 1939 levels while wages and many materials used in steel production have been steadily rising is mainly responsible for the fact that this $1,428,000,000 corporation has been unable to make adequate provision for the vicissitudes of the future, complicated as these are by the prospect of transition from war to peace."

That is the story. Now let us look at the corporation's actual financial record during the war years and its position today. First consider the $3,400,000 added to earned surplus in 1943. At the end of 1939 the earned surplus (undistributed profits) was $263,000,000. By the end of 1943 this had risen to $377,000,000, an increase during the war years of $114,000,000. More than that, examination of the corporation's 1943 financial statement shows that it put away in its financial kitty many times more than the amount it added to its surplus. In that one year it set aside $25,000,000 for a post-war reserve. This substantial reserve has been built up during the past three years until it now amounts to almost $74,000,000. In addition, the corporation added more than $2,500,000 to its reserve fund for contingencies and various other expenses, Altogether, at the end of 1943, a general reserve, including the special postwar reserve, amounted to more than $126,500,000.

Furthermore, the corporation in 1943 deducted more than $85,000,000 for depletion and depreciation charges and about $43,650,000 for amortization of war-time facilities built by the corporation, a total of almost $129,000,000. Two points must be noted in this connection. First, the $43,650,000 deducted for amortization of war facilities is not altogether an operating cost. A good part of this amount probably represents a hidden profit. The corporation benefits from regulations which enable it to amortize war-time plants in five years -or less, depending on the duration of the war-instead of the twenty-five-year period which is the normal average for the industry. At the end of the war it will have completely written off its new and most efficient plants, and this will definitely be a war-time profit. Secondly, the charges for depletion and depreciation of more than $85,000,000 in 1943 are much higher than those of $61,000,000 in the prosperous year of 1937. An appreciable part of this difference is probably a concealed profit for the corporation. It is common knowledge in the accounting profession that what companies deduct for depreciation frequently does not coincide with the deductions permitted by the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Another item in the corporation's financial report deserves comment. In 1937 United State Steel contributed $7,400,000 to its pension fund and in 1939 $8,300,000. But in 1940 its contribution rose to $15,600,000 and in 1943 to $33,650,000. Actual pension payments, however, remained fairly stable from 1936 through 1942, the last year for which figures are available. In 1942, for instance, the corporation contributed $32,600,000 to the fund and paid out only $8,600,000 in pensions. It would appear that since 1940 more than $60,000,000 has been added to the fund over and above the pensions paid out.

While building up its financial strength in various ways, the corporation was still able to pay out more than $60,000,000 in dividends during 1943—$25,000,000 to its preferred stockholders and $35,000,000 to its common stockholders. This dividend level has been maintained since 1940. The common stockholders in particular have benefited from the war-time boom. In the four pre-war years, 1936-39, they received a dividend in only one year. This amounted to $8,700,000. Since 1940 they have been getting around $35,000,000 annually.

Moreover, the corporation's average net profit after payment of taxes during the pre-war years, 1936-39, was $44,732,000. For the four war years, 1940-43, its average net profit after payment of heavily increased taxes was $88,270,000. This rise of almost 100 per cent hardly justifies Big Steel's fears.

Accounting procedure has a great deal to do with the different pictures that can be drawn of the present financial resources of United States Steel. We have already indicated how it is possible for the corporation to maintain that in 1943 it was able to set aside only a relatively small amount for future needs, while actually it accumulated large resources. Further examination of the corporation's financial report reveals that it has been slanted in a direction that minimizes United States Steel's actual resources. As an example, the corporation carried its plant and equipment on its books as of December 31, 1943, at $1,011,000,000. On December 31, 1939, these properties were carried at $1,120,000,000. Considering the enormous addition that the corporation has made to its plant and equipment in the war years, the decrease shown on the books suggests that the present value of the properties is somewhat underestimated.

As to the corporation's liquid position, on December 31, 1939, its liquid assets, including cash and government securities, less all current liabilities, amounted to $457,000,000. At the end of 1943 this amount had grown to $681,000,000. But the corporation's financial position was actually much stronger than this figure indicates. During the period 1940-43 its long-term outstanding bonded indebtedness was reduced by $87,000,000; hence its position on December 31, 1943, was $311,000,000 better than at the end of 1939. There is another factor that underscores the financial strength of Big Steel. It will come out of the war with new and efficient plants and equipment that under post-war conditions will substantially reduce its operating costs. But even if this factor is ignored, liquid assets of $681,000,000 effectively answer the corporation's contention that during the period of reconversion it will not be able to operate for more than a few days because of its poor financial position. In fact, Big Steel is so fortunate as not to face a very tough reconversion problem. To a large degree it will continue after the war to produce the same products that it is turning out today. Besides, as we have shown, Big Steel has already charged off more than adequate amounts to take care of deferred maintenance.

There is a surprise ending to this story which is not generally known to the public. Under the provision of the 1942 tax law, Big Steel in the first two post-war years has the right to apply for tax refunds if its profits before taxes fall below a certain level. This level is the excess-profits credit of the corporation, which amounts to around $120,000,000. On this base, or credit, according to the law, Big Steel does not have to pay excess-profits taxes; it need pay only normal corporate taxes. And in the first post-war year that the corporation's income before taxes falls below this level, it has the right to "carry back" that portion of its excess-profits credit which is not used and apply for a refund on a large part of the federal taxes it paid in the second preceding year.

Without going into the details of this carry-back procedure, it is sufficient to state the results. Let us assume that Big Steel in 1944 breaks even and does not earn a dollar of profits. Under the carry-back provisions of the law it will be entitled to a net refund from the United States Treasury of about $49,000,000. If the same thing happens in 1945, United States Steel can benefit by the same amount, partly as an excess-profits-tax refund and partly in possible future tax savings. In other words, the tax law makes it possible for Big Steel to pay dividends in 1944 even if it only breaks even. It would have enough income to pay $25,000,000 to its preferred stockholders and $20,000,000 to its common stockholders, and to add a few millions to its surplus. These figures, of course, are based on a hypothetical situation and a generalized application of the tax law.

The tax law protects Big Steel in similar fashion up to 81 cents on every dollar of operating loss it may incur in the first two post-war years. By using the carryback procedure, the corporation in 1944, if it suffered a loss of $7,717,000—an amount equal to its loss in the depression year of 1938—would receive a net refund from the Treasury amounting to about $55,000,000. Thus, even assuming fairly large losses, the Steel Corporation would be able to pay to its preferred stockholders the full $7 a year dividend and to its common stockholders dividends equal to 60 per cent of the war-time rate. The common stockholders would thus receive two and a half times as much as they did in 1937.

Big Steel, therefore, has benefited from war-time prosperity and is not going to the poorhouse tomorrow.

Contrast the position of the corporation with that of the average steel worker once the war is over. The United Steelworkers of America made a study of the family income and expenditure of a typical steel worker in the period September-November, 1943. The study found that even with war-time wages the average steel worker was going into debt at the rate of 79 cents a week. He will not have very much in the way of resources to meet a protracted period of post-war unemployment. And he will have no guaranty of possible post-war refunds and tax savings equal to his pre-war earnings in the event he loses his job. That puts it squarely up to Big Steel to assume the responsibility of providing post-war jobs for its workers. It has the resources to do it, and with its potential post-war tax refunds it can carry out a bold program without any large risks to itself.

What we have said of Big Steel holds true, in general, for all American industry. With the cushion of potential post-war tax refunds, industry cannot use the excuse that the post-war picture is too uncertain for it to plan effectively now for full employment. Randolph E. Paul, former counsel of the Treasury, recently underscored this point in these words: "Whether we like it or not, government, and by government I mean the people, has become a partner in industry's reconversion costs and losses under the carry-back adjustments. In dollars-andcents terms, we might say that government will be the senior partner for war-time excess-profits taxpayers with responsibility for 81 per cent of their losses. . . . Government has always been interested in industry's profits, but now it is deeply concerned also with industry's losses. With government sharing those losses, industry can maintain a high level of production and employment with a smaller stake."

Medicine and Politics

What confusion!—What mistakes! . . . In this corner, a son of the divine Esculapius, . . . feeling his patient's pulse, instead of his apothecary's.

-"Tristram Shandy."

THE inability of the medical profession to provide adequate treatment for the population as a whole was described in last week's issue of The Nation. A concrete measure to improve the situation is now before Congress. It has split the profession wide open.

The Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill would enlarge the scope of Social Security benefits to include all types of medical care—at home, at the doctor's office, and in hospitals. It would provide for the services of specialists as well as general practitioners, and would cover X-ray and laboratory fees. It would apply not only to Social Security registrants but to their dependents. In addition, postgraduate medical education and research would be encouraged by grants-in-aid to physicians and to hospitals, schools, and research institutions.

Though the American Medical Association is fighting the bill, the Committee of Physicians for the Improvement of Medical Care and the Physicians' Forum are fighting for it; and the Association of Internes and Medical Students, by promoting objective discussion of its provisions, has been an influence in its favor.

The Committee of Physicians for the Improvement of Medical Care is headed by Dr. Channing Frothingham of Boston. Its professional caliber is indicated by the fact that eighteen of its twenty-seven members are listed in "Who's Who in America" and the other nine are all prominent in medicine for their scientific or administrative work. Its breadth of vision is expressed in its statement of principles:

It is recognized that the medical profession is only one of several groups to which "medical care" is of vital concern. Close cooperation between physicians, economists, and sociologists is essential. . . . It seems to us probable that certain alterations in our present system of preventing illness and providing medical care may be necessary.

This committee favors the general purposes of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, but believes it must be strengthened in a number of its provisions if it is to be effective. It has offered to work with the bill's sponsors to improve it, and they have welcomed the offer.

The Physicians' Forum, headed by Dr. Ernst P. Boas of New York, supports the bill with similar reservations. It started out as a small band of liberals in the New York County Medical Society and now has members in sixteen states. Its position is stated in its November, 1943, bulletin:

There is a large hiatus between the high scientific levels to which medical knowledge has attained and the availability of this knowledge to the vast majority of Americans. . . . The serious social and economic consequences of illness make the problem of medical care the concern of the entire community as well as of physicians.

But perhaps the most significant of all the liberal groups is the Association of Internes and Medical Students, an alert organization of the younger men and women in the profession. It has some 3,000 members, maintains an office in New York, and publishes a monthly magazine, the Interne, with a circulation of 25,000. It organizes lectures, forums, and radio programs on medical topics of public interest; it cooperates with labor unions and liberal organizations as well as with professional bodies; it makes a continuous effort to improve conditions in hospitals; and it takes an interest in the progress of medical education. In a poll of young doctors by the Interne last winter, more than half of those who answered favored "some form of health insurance"; about a third favored tax-supported insurance.

Outside the medical profession the bill is supported by the C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and virtually all liberal organizations. It is opposed by the National Association of Manufacturers, the Committee for Constitutional Government, Gerald L. K. Smith's America First Party, the Insurance Economics Society of America, and a curious organization called the National Physicians' Committee for the Extension of Medical Service (N. P. C.).

The N. P. C. might be described as the secular arm of the American Medical Association. It does the dirty work. Its sole purpose and function is to fight the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. It has no program of its own for improving medical care. At its annual meeting last November it resolved to support private grouppayment plans, but in view of its previous bitter opposition to such plans it appears that its object in supporting them now is to create the impression that their existence makes a national plan unnecessary. It is closely allied with Frank Gannett's Committee for Constitutional Government; its administrator, John M. Pratt, is a Gannett protégé who was formerly executive head of the Physicians' Committee for Free Enterprise in Medicine and of the Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government, predecessors of the two present organizations. There is no official connection between the American Medical Association and the N. P. C., but the House of Delegates of the A. M. A. last year adopted a resolution indorsing the work of the N. P. C., and the A. M. A. Journal promotes its doctrines.

The N. P. C. has admitted that its original capital came largely from the big drug and surgical-instrument firms. The relationship between these firms and the A. M. A. may be described as one of Mutual Helpfulness. Since approval by the A. M. A. is essential if a new drug or instrument is to be widely used in practice, the manufacturers court its good-will and even pull wires in its internal politics, using the golf course and the hunting lodge to good advantage; and now they are demonstrating their own good-will in very handsome fashion. With their financial backing the N. P. C. has blanketed the country with literature attacking the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

The N. P. C.'s chief publications are two pamphlets, "Abolishing Private Medical Practice, or Prelude to Centralized Control of the Professions and Industry," by Mr. Pratt himself, and the anonymous "$3,048,000,000 of Political Medicine Yearly in the United States." In the words of one of its promotion letters, the N. P. C. is "undertaking to distribute twenty million copies (20,-000,000)" of the latter pamphlet at a cost of $200,000. It is probable that since the letter was written at least that many have been distributed. Doctors were asked to place copies on their waiting-room tables, mail them to friends, inclose them with their monthly bills, and hand them around at meetings of the "Chamber of Commerce, Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, [and] other group meetings." Copies were mailed from headquarters to editors, ministers, college professors, lawyers, and other professional groups. The misleading nature of the pamphlets becomes obvious when their language is compared with that of the bill itself. "Abolishing Private Medical Practice" contains this statement, for example:

For the doctor state medicine means abject slavery; the necessity of catering to the ward committeeman or the precinct captain rather than to the needs of the human beings who are his patients.

Under the terms of the bill the medical portion of the Social Security Act would be administered by the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service (Section 903-a); his expenditures would be subject to the approval of the Social Security Board (Section 903-c); he would be advised by a council of sixteen members selected from a panel of names submitted by the medical profession (Section 904-a); local administration would be in the hands of the doctors themselves (Section 905, paragraphs 1 and 7). As neither the Surgeon General nor the Social Security Board is subject to the influence of the ward committeeman or the precinct captain, it is not clear how the doctor would be subject to it. The pamphlet does not explain.

Or consider this lugubrious chant from "$3,048,-000,000 of Political Medicine":

What does political medicine mean for sick people? It means that they must depend upon a doctor who:—

Is paid by the government—presumably working eight hours per day. The emergency sickness must wait until the doctor is on the job;

Is not the doctor of their choice but the one that has been assigned by a political bureaucrat;

Cannot have a personal interest in patients who come to him because they are compelled to do so;

Is less knowing and less efficient because he must follow methods and prescribe remedies that are fixed by his bureaucratic superiors;

Since his job is political, is more interested in pleasing his political boss than in curing his patients.

The presumption that the doctor would work only eight hours per day is gratuitous; the bill does not prescribe hours of work. As for payment by the government, the doctor would be paid "(a) on the basis of fees for services rendered to individuals entitled to benefits, according to a fee schedule approved by the Surgeon General [after negotiation]; or (b) on a per capita basis, the amount being according to the number of individuals entitled to benefits who are on a practitioner's list; or (c) on a salary basis, whole time or part time; or (d) on a combination or modification of these bases, as the Surgeon General may approve, according in each area as the majority of the general medical practitioners to be paid for such services shall elect, subject to such necessary rules and regulations as may be required." (Section 905, paragraph 7, my italics.)

The bill does not change in any way the traditional doctor-patient relationship. It states clearly (Section 905) that the individual physician is free to furnish services under the act or not (paragraph 1); that the patient may select any physician he pleases, subject, as now, to the consent of the physician (paragraph 2); and that "in any area where payment for the services of a physician is on a per capita basis, the Surgeon General shall distribute . . . on a pro rata basis among the practitioners of the area on the list . . . those individuals in the area who, after due notice, have failed to select a general practitioner or who having made a selection have been refused by the practitioner." (Paragraph 11.)

Moreover, the patient is free to go to physician who doesn't offer his services under the act. (He would nevertheless have to pay the full tax, and this element of fiscal compulsion has been used as an argument against the bill. The principle, however, has long been accepted in other fields, notably in that of education, where all are taxed to support public schools, even those who send their children to private schools and those who have no children.)

The last two counts of the indictment are ridiculous. The remedies a doctor prescribes and the methods he uses are determined by his scientific training and professional standards, and there is nothing in the bill that would require him to consult other standards. The administrative machinery is entirely non-political.

The Committee for Constitutional Government is running its own campaign along similar lines. To a mailing list of doctors it sends literature in envelopes imprinted with this message in red ink:

To All Physicians: Danger Ahead . . . Sen. Wagner's Bill 1161! See inside important message for you. Here are your WEAPONS! Protect your profession from SERFDOM to the STATE. Help NOW to save free enterprise for all.

The important message, entitled "Bismarck's Golden Chain," stoops to the demagogic argumentum ad homi-nem that Senator Wagner was born in Germany, but makes no specific charges against the bill.

The excerpts presented here are typical of the arguments on both sides. The difference in quality between those favoring the bill and those opposing it is plain enough. It is a fair indication of which way the truth lies. The Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill has nothing to do with state medicine. It is reformist rather than revolutionary in principle, and some of its provisions are modest to the point of inadequacy. If it fails of passage the necessary first step toward a more rational medical system will remain to be taken.

PROFESSOR HARLEY LUTZ of Princeton, who writes the monthly Tax Review of the Tax Foundation, sees no pressing need to keep "this something called the national income" at a high level or to achieve anything better than "reasonably full employment." He thinks full employment would cost too much money.

HOWEVER, THE WORLD does move. The London Daily Mail reports that Lady Hoare, wife of Sir Reginald Hoare, former British Minister in Teheran, wrote to the annual meeting in London of the National Anti-Vaccination League, of which she was an ardent supporter, that she could not attend because she had been vaccinated.

MEDICAL CARE should not be thought of in economic terms, as if it were bread or coal, says Alphonse M. Schwitalla, dean of the St. Louis University School of Medicine. "To me," he says, "medical care is more related to a mother's love or a child's affection than it is to a loaf of bread or a ton of coal." That is the reason he gives for opposing the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

BY BLAIR BOLLES

THE people of the occupied countries look to the coming Anglo-American invasion to bring more than liberation from Nazi tyranny. They believe that it will introduce social and political changes which will make life much better than it was before the Germans came to plague them. The underground in the occupied countries has been nourishing new ideas—as well as plans for blowing up railroad trains and munitions factories. And nowhere have these ideas about the post-war period been formulated more clearly than in the Netherlands.

Thought in occupied Holland has a leftist tinge, if we may fairly judge by the available secret papers, of which Het Parool, Vrij Nederland, Trouw, and Ja Maintiendrai are the chief. Altogether these sheets put out about 250,000 copies a week. Not all of them have the same political orientation, but they show remarkable unanimity in discussing the larger issues. A great many of these papers reach London and exert an influence on the Dutch government in exile.

They voice the general demand for a better division of riches among all Dutchmen, young as well as old. Het Parool, the Socialist paper, calls for an "end to the monstrous system which forces old people to toil until they are sixty-five or seventy, while youngsters get no chance to work. There should be a guaranty of reasonable comfort for everyone over sixty years of age, without further labor." And they ask an end to the Dutch custom of a long betrothal and late marriage, which has been the consequence of the young Dutchman's slow progress toward economic independence.

The friends of social justice at home seek its spread to the colonies. Vrij Nederland, which expresses the political attitude of some Catholic and Calvinist circles, demands that every economic and social reform won in the Netherlands be passed on to the East and West Indies. "Not our own needs and dividends are to come first," says Vrij Nederland, "but the needs and rights of the Indonesians." This is revolutionary in a nation which has granted some political but few economic udvantages to its colonial subjects.

In many European countries before the war the effiiency of representative government was hampered by he large number of political parties. Holland had nearly wenty active parties. Now Je Maintiendrai, a royalist aper, proposes a two-party system, and other papers dvocate limiting the number of parties. Of Je Maintienrai's two parties, "the Progressives would include all those who aim at the greatest possible social justice and protection of the consumer, while the Conservatives' task would be to act as a brake on ill-considered experiments and extremist tendencies."

In foreign affairs "there will be no more neutrality and no more individual national policy, but the small nations will not be mere tools in the hands of their bigger neighbors." The Dutch underground writers believe in world collaboration based on regional understandings like the monetary agreement between the Netherlands and Belgian governments in exile. Winston Churchill's outline of a world council composed of representatives of four or five of the largest states does not please the Dutch. Foreign Minister van Kleffens has spoken out publicly in opposition to a world controlled by four or five "big brothers."

The Netherlands, like the other liberated countries, will have the problem of dealing with its traitors after the German defeat. It will also suffer the economic stringencies of the transition period between the withdrawal of the enemy and the reconstruction of the land, which is being impoverished by the flooding of productive agricultural areas with sea water. Inflation is the great dread of the underground. To prevent it, state control of the economy is advocated, with large government loans, high taxes, a property levy, and perhaps a forced-savings program.

The Dutch underground papers rule out personal vengeance against the Nazis and their henchmen. "Such action would simply bring down the Netherlands to the level of inhumanity reached by the enemy." Just punishment of the Germans, however, is urged "as a first condition for the solution of Europe's post-war problems." Traitors are divided into four classes: Dutch Nazi Party leaders, to be sentenced to death; commanders of uniformed Dutch Nazis, to lose Dutch citizenship and be sentenced to at least ten years' penal servitude; those who took an oath of allegiance to Hitler, to be deported, possibly to Germany; and the rank and file of the Dutch Nazi Party. No clear formula for the treatment of this last group has been offered.

Even in 1936 Mr. Churchill was displaying a zeal for the Spain of General Franco which it is difficult not to interpret as an enthusiasm for the traditional privileges of the aristocracy to which he belongs when those principles were called into question by the Spanish masses.—From the forthcoming book "Faith, Reason, and Civilization," by Harold J. Laski.

Reactions to Churchill

What They Said in London

The Economist, liberal British weekly, commented: "Spain has not been neutral. Spain has been unofficially at war. It is sheer quibbling to say that Spain is not ranged among Britain's enemies. The Hungarians have not fought the British, nor have the Finns. Yet because of their attack on Russia, Britain is at war with both. It is curious procedure to give only glancing reference to Russia's part but four columns of kindly words to Russia's enemy. It throws suspicion on all of the more liberal passages in the speech.

"Mr. Churchill admitted he thought fascism the cause of the war. If in Italy, why not in Spain? The British know it is not their business to impose a government on Spain, but they are at a loss to understand why they should pretend to like this one or why the French committee should be thought less representative than Franco's government."

The New Statesman remarked that Mr. Churchill's view of Spanish fascism "precisely repudiates" the view of United States Secretary of State Cordell Hull that fascism and free government "cannot exist together in this world."

The Daily Herald, organ of the Labor Party, said that the most remarkable thing in the speech was the "flattering and almost fulsome tone of his references to the rulers of Spain." It added, "It is impossible to understand . . . why he should champion General Franco." The Daily Worker asserted that Mr. Churchill's "apologia for Franco" was "lamentable."

The Cartoonists

The Prime Minister used a harsh expression about cartoonists who draw "comical or even rude caricatures of General Franco."

This sentence seems to have whipped up British cartoonists into a frenzy of artistic activity to increase their output of anti-Franco cartoons. . . . The News Chronicle's cartoonist, Vicky, shows a fat nightgowned and haloed Franco with big blotches of blood on his hands and night dress and Churchill in shirt sleeves swishing a whitewash brush over the bloodstains. The legend beneath the drawing says: "Damned spot, Out I say. What? Will these hands ne'er be clean?"

Churchill's injunction to quit caricaturing Franco also prompted the Evening Standard's great cartoonist, David Low, to publish a sketch of Franco dejectedly huddled with his head in his hands amid shabby bagage on the platform of a railroad past which trains were speeding to victory.—Frederick Kuh in PM.

The Effect on the Neutrals

An immediate response to the Prime Minister's promises of friendly relations and profitable post-war trade with Spain was found in Swedish foreign-trade circles, which have been in the blacklist limelight for the last fortnight. After pointing out that Spain is the only country whose forces have actually fought against the United Nations, a report in the Dagens Nyheter, leading Swedish daily, commented that "from now on small democratic neutrals ought to be able to take threats about Continental blacklisting and other forms of post-war sanctions not too seriously."—The New York Times.

Moscow Disapproves

Moscow, June 1—In its first reference to Spain since Prime Minister Churchill's recent speech, the Soviet press today comes out strongly with the opinion that "the sick devil turned monk," as Franco is described by Izvestia, continues to help Hitler's cause both economically and ideologically. . . . General Franco, Red Star says, did not forgo an attack on the Western powers because he lacked the will to do so but because he . . . was fully aware of the hostility of his people and the disintegration of his army.—The New York Times.

The Phalanx Rejoices

Madrid, Spain, May 25 (U.P.)—Prime Minister Churchill's speech in which he praised the Spanish regime caused widespread satisfaction in all circles here today, and newspapers printed extensive front-page accounts, with his references to Spain in heavy black type.—The New York Times.

Distress in Latin America

Havana, May 25—Prime Minister Churchill's defense of Generalissimo Francisco Franco caused considerable surprise in Cuba, according to the reaction of the local press today.

The afternoon newspaper Puebla asserted that until the question of why Mr. Churchill was now defending General Franco was answered the conclusion was logical that Britain "is not as strong as supposed."

Mexico City, May 25—The Spanish refugee colony here—the largest in the world—expressed shock and amazement today at Prime Minister Churchill's "kindly words" about Franco Spain.—The New York Post.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

In THE First World War, as we know, the correlation between developments within Germany and developments at the front was appallingly weak and slow. After the exhaustion and disintegration at home had become indescribable, the army continued to fight with undiminished tenacity, courage, and discipline. Similarly today the undiminished fighting qualities of the German armies are no proof that "things can't be so bad" in Germany. The fact is that the situation has become much worse than the American public, on guard against too great optimism, may think. The leading Swiss newspaper, the Neue Züricher Zeitung, printed on May 23 a sober, balanced account of conditions "behind the enemy line" by a Swiss just returned from Germany. The details add up to an impressive picture of decline.

Books, furniture, and luxury goods are practically unobtainable. Even brushes, gloves, saucepans, crockery, knifes, forks, and dishcloths are rarities. Any repairs which the householder cannot undertake himself, no matter how small, become lengthy affairs of state; it often takes weeks of démarches to get the services of a mechanic. . . . Even towns spared by the air war begin to look run down.

There are also the difficulties of travel.

When you enter Switzerland from Germany or the occupied territories, you are amazed at the comfort which is still regarded as normal here. The Swiss porter's perfunctory question at the frontier station whether he shall place your luggage in a smokers' or non-smokers' compartment, and on which side you prefer to sit, is an overwhelming experience when . . . you have probably spent the night in a corridor, squeezed against other passengers and unable to move.

A special chapter would be needed for the bombed cities, according to this Swiss reporter, who has visited a great many in western and northern Germany:

The once busy streets are deserted. The traffic that formerly pulsed through them is reduced to a mere trickle. There is hardly any life left in the ruins and one doubts whether it will ever return as before. . . .

The state takes care of the people that have been bombed out and of the évacués as well as it can, but its facilities are of course limited. Since complete compensation within a reasonable time is impossible, those who have lost everything are "declassed" in the truest sense of the word. The authorities issue purchase vouchers for clothes and household articles, but the time is long past when people could be sure of obatining something with them. The destruction of material goods has become so great that German industry, already overstrained, cannot possibly satisfy the demand. The glass industry is unable to replace broken windows; hence hundreds of thousands have to live and work in cold rooms. Transportation in the bombed cities is difficult and very slow.

What has been the effect of these conditions on the people? The most significant effect, in the opinion of this observer, is a deadly lassitude:

The power of resistance has been gradually weakened. Air war does not break down resistance at one stroke but wears it down gradually. The excitement of the raids and fear of death finally leave their mark even on healthy people. Life becomes one dreadful makeshift . . . everybody gets nervy and overstrained.

In the dreadful uncertainty of existence life loses all meaning. . . . A kind of defeatism, which is non-political to a certain extent, is developing. The number of people who can no longer keep up the fight, try as they may, is increasing. They are so tired that they crave an end to it all, at no matter what cost. A paralyzing exhaustion produces a boundless desire for rest. People show a certain indifference in all their actions. Evacués, for instance, make no effort to give their quarters a semblance of home. No one believes in the value of money, and it is senselessly wasted on trifles. In short, a normal human existence such as people must have to do efficient work is slowly but surely becoming impossible.

The Swiss returned home convinced that things could not go on indefinitely as they were. "One day the Germans will break under their burden." But he thinks that the very exhaustion of the people, the complete disintegration of normal life, will prevent their collapse from taking the form of a popular uprising. "The people have neither the strength nor the time to start any political action. The Nazis have nothing to fear directly from the home front." He is certain that the break will come at the battle front, either through a defeat, pure and simple, or through the infection of the front with the exhaustion and decline of morale of the people at home.

The Press: Its Manners and Mores

THE DISAPPEARING DAILY: CHAPTERS IN AMERI-CAN NEWSPAPER EVOLUTION. By Oswald Gartison Villard. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

R. VILLARD is always worth reading on the subject of newspapers. All his life he has labored in the fields of journalism as reporter, editor, owner, publisher, and columnist, and he has combined this practice of his profession with a continuous study of its manners and mores. He has firmly held ideas about what a newspaper should be, and he finds all too few publications which conform to them. He dislikes sensationalism in both the selection and the presentation of news, comic strips, and sacred cows; he favors clean and dignified make-up, straight news, and editorial independence and leadership.

In this book, which is a revised and expanded version of an earlier work, Mr. Villard applies his tests to a number of leading American newspapers and newspaper chains. Among those which pass with fairly high marks are the Christian Science Monitor, the New York Herald Tribune, and the Washington Post, even though the author disagrees strongly with some of their editorial stands. The Chicago Tribune, the New York Daily News, and the Gannett newspapers come off much better than might have been expected, but in these cases Mr. Villard's judgments are colored by his own attitude toward the war. Thus he rather surprisingly hails Colonel McCormick for his championship of freedom of the press, although noting a few pages farther on the "vicious tactics" which he has employed in attempts to make this freedom impossible for competitors. "On international questions," Mr. Villard points out, "the Tribune has generally been cynical, reactionary, militaristic, and jingo, which added to the surprise that it should have taken the anti-war course that it did prior to Pearl Harbor." The author's unexpected pleasure at finding himself in agreement with the Tribune seems to have blinded him to the fact that its pacifism, unlike his own, is characterized by cynicism, reaction, militarism, and jingoism. The Colonel does not object to war as such; he merely wishes to choose his own enemies, and he does so never minding that some of them are America's allies.

Mr. Villard's appreciation of the Daily News may also startle some readers. It is possible to agree with him that, compared to Macfadden's Graphic, the Patterson tabloid is a model of decency. But one wonders through what spectacles Mr. Villard has read its editorials in order to see in them "the work of an editor who has not lost his head or discarded his judgment in this crisis, but continues to pass upon issues with peace-time detachment and unbiased scrutiny of what is going on." After this the Hearst press might have expected more kindly treatment than it receives in this book. Mr. Villard, however, has in no way revised his longheld opinion that Hearst has been a debasing and degrading influence on the newspaper business. He does not even mention, as a saving grace, the similarity of the Hearst policies on international affairs to those of the McCormick-Patterson press, which he tends to approve.

The chapter of this volume which supplies its title is interesting as far as it goes, but one could wish that the author had attempted a more extended analysis of the causes of the "disappearing daily" and its corollary—the monopoly of the press. Mr. Villard provides some useful notes on newspaper mortality and points out that the survivors, despite growth in circulation, tend to decline both in craftsmanship and influence. One reason he adduces is the extent to which newspaper ownership has become a highly capitalized business into which only the wealthy can hope to force their way. The tendency of proprietors, he says, "is naturally to think and act as do the members of the economic group to which they belong, and to drift steadily away from the plain people and especially from the workers."

Strangely enough, however, Mr. Villard does not seem to realize the part which the Associated Press has played in diminishing competition in the newspaper business and in protecting vested publishing interests. In discussing the antitrust suit against the A. P. he lines up with the publishers, contending that there is no evidence that the news agency has been a factor in promoting monopoly. He points out that newspapers, denied A. P. service, can still rely on the U. P. and the I. N. S. but ignores the fact that these services do not and cannot provide competitive coverage in "news of spontaneous origin." More than that, he overlooks the fact that in many cities today a new daily, barred from the A. P. by the rules which the Department of Justice challenged, could not obtain any news service owing to exclusive contracts with the other agencies held by existing papers. Finally, he charges that the prosecution was motivated by the exclusion from the A. P. of a New Deal organ. Would it be any less gratuitous to assume that Mr. Villard's defense of the agency would have been less passionate if it had gored one of his own pet oxen?

My disagreement with Mr. Villard on this and other points does not in the least discourage me from recommending his book as a valuable companion to the newspaper reader. We need more such candid appraisals of an institution which plays so important a part in all our lives. For it will be much easier to preserve freedom of the press if its hidden workings are revealed and its readers allowed to know what makes it tick. One of the most regrettable tendencies of modern newspapers, and one which I wish Mr. Villard had dwelt upon more directly, is their general refusal to criticize each other. There was a time when editors pounced fiercely on each other's errors and delighted in controverting each other's views. But now such polemics are regarded as bad for business, and there seems to be a gentlemen's agreement that dog shall not eat dog. I should like to see Mr. Villard speak out strongly on this point. If the press policed itself by mutual criticism, the dangers to its freedom which he stresses would be greatly lessened.

"CRUX ANSATA—AN INDICTMENT OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH"

First Time Published In America!

Like a Breath of Fresh Air in a Stuffy Room. . . . !

H. G. WELLS, world-known author and historian, gives us in this latest book, "CRUX ANSATA," his frank convictions about the meddling policies of the Roman Catholic Church—from its first tie-up with the Emperor Constantine to its present alliance with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis. He sums up his conclusions as follows:

"As this present world war goes on, and even if there is some sort of temporary half peace before it deepens into m tangle of minor wars, it will become plainer and plainer that it is no longer m geographically determined warfare of governments, nations and people, but the world-wide struggle of our species to release itself from the strangling octopus of the Catholic Church. Everywhere the Church extends its tentacles and fights to prolong the Martyrdom of Man."

Written in his usual dignified and scholarly style, this latest work of the famous British author is like a breath of fresh air in a stuffy room, and should be welcomed as much-needed ventilation of a subject that is generally taboo to the public in America.

Sovereignty and Peace

THE CONSTITUTION AND WORLD ORGANIZA-TION. By Edward S. Corwin. Princeton University Press. $1.

DWARD S. CORWIN'S new book contains only fifty-seven pages, but this is enough to pickle the American isolationists in an equal number of ways. The noted Princeton professor of law starts off in the first paragraph by reducing the isolationist outcry against violation of American sovereignty to an absurdity. How, he asks, can national sovereignty prevent the United States from assuming international obligations which other sovereign nations are free to accept? That would lead to the paradox that the United States, because it is more sovereign than other powers, is less capable of acting as it chooses, and therefore is less sovereign than the others.

Professor Corwin examines the three possible conceptions of sovereignty: (1) that it is a concept of international law under which nations are bound to fulfil their obligations toward each other; (2) that it is an inherent characteristic of the individual state, which is free to accept or reject international law on the basis of self-interest; (3) that the only real sovereignty is in the family of nations, which bestows what is called sovereignty upon its members.

He rejects the third concept as "a tour de force of heroic rationalization directed toward a selected ideal" (by the Austrians Kelsen and Verdross). The first, he decides, is the one that was held by the founders of the American republic. It has "been invoked myriads of times" by our State Department against other nations accused of violating international law, and has been accepted by the United States when advanced by other countries, as in the question of liability of American coastwise shipping for Panama Canal tolls.

Nevertheless, the author concludes, the ruling concept has been the second one, that nations are fundamentally free to do as they please, violating international law when they choose and overriding treaties by unilateral legislation. Its dominance is due to the fact that international law itself recognizes war as a legitimate instrument of national policy. The unlimited right to make war destroys international obligations, and total war wipes out international law. From the very first an attempt has been made by writers to escape this dilemma by distinguishing between just and unjust wars, but there has been no agency to do the distinguishing. That is where the proposed world organization comes in. By limiting the right to make war it would exalt the concept held by the American Founding Fathers—that national sovereignty exists within the obligations of international law.

If that is true, Corwin asserts, there is no impairment of sovereignty when a nation restricts its freedom of action by accepting membership in a world organization. Perhaps this coincides with, perhaps it goes beyond, the opinion I expressed in "Road to Peace and Freedom" that impairment of national sovereignty is not involved in the American choice because "there is no need to amend the Constitution to confer revocable authority upon a world association of nations." Dr. Corwin does not specifically deal with revocability, but his treatment of power and obligation carries suggestion that the power to commit involves the power to revoke a commitment, yet that the power to revoke might give way, in time, to an overruling obligation not to do so. In either case entry into a world association is an act of sovereignty designed to support the nation's obligations under international law. If it be contended that sovereignty with binding obligations is not total sovereignty, then, says Corwin, "when total war is the price of total sovereignty, the price is too high."

Turning to constitutional powers and restrictions, Corwin finds that no restraints are placed upon American freedom of action in the foreign field by our system of dual federalism, or by guaranties of private rights. State authority does not enter this province of national policy, while by the supremacy clause of the Constitution treaties and laws of the United States are superior to the laws and constitutions of the states.

The fact that the federal government is one of "enumerated powers" imposes no limitation in the foreign field, for two reasons. First, the author points out, treaty-making is one of the enumerated powers, and it extends indefinitely beyond the other enumerated powers. The one-time effort to restrain treaties to the subjects covered by other powers "may be unqualifiedly asserted to be defunct." Secondly, in the international field, the Supreme Court has tended more and more to regard the national government as one possessing inherent powers which exist not by virtue of specific clauses in the Constitution but because such powers belong "to the American people as a sovereign political entity at international law." This allows the federal government to act in the foreign field by legislation as sweepingly as it can by treaty and makes it impossible for a minority in the Senate to block the road. The power of Congress in this field is being indefinitely extended, while the special powers of the Senate are steadily shrinking. Contrary to the rule in domestic matters, the silence of the Constitution serves to affirm power in the foreign field instead of to deny it.

The end result is to establish Congress "as the legislative organ of a nation which is sovereign at international law," and free to act accordingly. Hence our national government may enter validly "into a general engagement with other governments either to exercise its constitutional powers in the furtherance of international peace or to forgo their exercise for the same purpose."

By this brilliant and penetrating analysis, amply sustained by historical evidence, Dr. Corwin has swept all constitutional issues, all questions of impairment of sovereignty, out of the field of legitimate debate. That will not, of course, silence the hubbub raisers. IRVING BRANT

Welfare Work in Greece

BALKAN JOURNAL. By Laird Archer. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

EFORE the Germans came to Athens with their scien-D tific methods of mass starvation, Laird Archer had spent twenty-one years in Greece, Albania, and Bulgaria attempting to counteract the effects of the starvation of the First World War. As field director of the Near East Foundation, he was combination fund raiser, go-getter, agricultural expert, and relief administrator. He was also something of a diplomat, for the success of his school, farm, and sanitary projects depended in large measure on the good-will of the governments of all three countries. In recognition of his considerable services to Greece, Mr. Archer was decorated by George II with the Order of the Phoenix. To what extent this honor affected his political judgment I am unable to say. I can only point out that, despite continual references to his own democratic convictions, Mr. Archer in his war diary has little but praise for Their Majesties George, Zog, and Boris, and even goes out of his way to defend the late Iohn Metaxas.

"Whatever else may be said about Metaxas in history," he writes in his awkward style, "it should record correctly that he was sincere in these two things: making the country strong to defend itself and improving relations with its neighbors." This is the usual Metaxist line of argument, and Mr. Archer is no more successful in producing evidence to support it than any other apologist for the old regime. He makes much of "the rugged fortitude and undoubted patriotism of this really great military leader" but fails to offer any explanation for the appalling miscalculations of the general staff and the outright treason of so many of Metaxas's principal aides. In justice to Mr. Archer, it must be said that while he minimizes he makes no effort to conceal the inconsistencies of Metaxas's position. He repeats the dubious story about the letter which the dying dictator is said to have written to his friends warning them, after it was already too late, to beware the treachery of the Germans; yet he admits that Metaxas refused to close the radio transmitter in the German Legation by means of which Greek military secrets were known in Rome and Berlin before they were known to most Greek officers on the firing line.

Mr. Archer is a well-meaning exponent of social uplift, and it is perhaps too much to ask that he combine his humanitarian activities with political understanding. Nevertheless, I doubt whether there are very many people in Greece today who would agree that Metaxas was really a friend of labor, or that "recriminations [against the King] at this moment are unbecoming. . . ." Mr. Archer is now in Cairo, I understand, and may soon be returning to Greece in charge of some phase of UNRRA operations. If so, it is to be hoped that he will ponder the prophetic words of his colleague. Harold B. Allen, quoted in his diary: "... we get cooperation from all of them, presidents, kings, prime ministers, or dictators. The only trouble is we may get efficiency now at the expense of internal strife later on." That remark, it seems to me, is even more pertinent now than when it was uttered in 1936. If Mr. Archer had seen fit to draw the obvious conclusions, he would have written more illuminating book.

Fixtion in Review

DEX WARNER'S "Return of the Traveller" (Lippin-Cott, $2) is chiefly interesting for the fresh evidence it brings of the difference between the way the war is being written about in England and over here. I have several times commented on the refusal of American fiction to discuss any of the political, social, or psychological realities of this war. Ideologically the war plays about the same role in our current novels that a storm plays in murder mysteries: it is something noisy going on outside the house to add to our indoor tensions. But this is not the case in England, where, probably because of a different cultural tradition or perhaps only because the walls between the outdoor and indoor worlds have been blown in, all classes of novelists at least dare to nibble at the real issues. And now it seems that even in the matter of titles we on this side of the Atlantic show our disposition to evasion: Mr. Warner's book, published in England under the blunt name "Why Was I Killed?" appears here labeled for a more delicate taste.

Mr. Warner is best known in this country for his "The Wild Goose Chase" of some years ago, a Kafka-like fantasy. In "Return of the Traveller" the Kafka element is gone, but fantasy to a certain extent persists. Mr. Warner's new novel, that is, employs a fantasy device, the return to earth of a dead soldier, as the basis of a philosophical research into the possible justifications for the present war. Appropriately enough, the research starts among a group of people gathered at the tomb of an unknown soldier; Mr. Warner's philosophical microcosm includes a priest, an upper-class English patriot, a self-seeking member of the English lower middle class, a socially conscious intellectual, an emotional woman pacifist, and a refugee, each of whom first argues his attitude toward the war and then, by a flashback, reveals the source of his opinions in his personal and family history. But although each of the revelations is illuminating, none of the group except the priest can give the soldier a satisfactory answer to his question, "Why was I killed?" For it happens that, dying, the soldier himself had had a double vision—of the battlefield and of the sunny valley of life and among the people the soldier is canvassing only the priest has also had this vision; it appears that Mr. Warner means, by this double vision, the tragic view of life—the view of life that includes a view of death. But here "Return of the Traveller" becomes muddled: Mr. Warner's mystical syntax becomes hard to follow. I take the last chapter of Mr. Warner's novel to be a plea for a kind of political theism: it seems to say that good politics must be based on tragic view of life and that a tragic view of life depends on a belief in something which can encompass both life and death—in other words, in God. At least, Mr. Warner's priest makes it clear that only God is big enough to surpass all the conflicting ideas which have been presented to the returned soldier, that God is the only idea big enough to organize all of mankind into brotherhood, and that only in brotherhood is there hope for the future of mankind.

The religious proposition is very much in the air these days, and one should perhaps have been prepared for Mr. Warner's religious revolution, but the modern intellectual comes to religious faith disconcertingly well armed with the arguments of the world; consequently the forthrightness with which Mr. Warner presents the positions which he finally discards threw me, for a good part of the way, off the religious scent. In the light of his religious conclusion, however, even the truths he announces in passing lose their validity. "Return of the Traveller" issues in an attitude which, to some, may be personally consoling but which can scarcely be useful, I think, either in avoiding future wars or in comprehending this one.

Three novels by women have come to me which have me wondering about my sex. Such a field day of villainy I haven't come across in many a fictional moon. "No Mortal Fire" by Elsa Valentine (Simon and Schuster, $2.50) is a detailed account of the incredible doings of a young woman of Nazi leanings; but it seems to me that the Nazi tie-up merely gilds this lily. "Insurgent Summer" by Charlotte Aiken Yarborough (Harper and Brothers, $2.50), a first novel not without writing talent, has it in for a publisher—which is understandable enough, I hear, but surely might be held within convincing limits. Fanny Sedgwick Colby's "The Apple Must Be Bitten" (Scribner, $2.50) has it in for practically the whole race of man, divorce lawyers included. It all seems vaguely unhealthy.

Victor White's "Peter Domanig" (Bobbs-Merrill, $3), on the other hand, is not a bit unhealthy; it is just long. And I am sorry to report my disappointment at Howard Hunt's novel about Henderson Field, "Limit of Darkness" (Random House, $2.50); there was a quality in his first novel, "East of Farewell," which I hoped Mr. Hunt would improve on.

REAM WITH MUSIC" (Majestic Theater) is said to have cost $200,000, and I've never seen a more dazzling display of costumes, scenery, girls, and "effects." The show is a vehicle for Vera Zorina-complete with magic carpet that actually moves, rather cumbersomely, through the air. Miss Zorina's talents seem to me far better suited to musical comedy than to ballet. She has a handsome face and figure, she has a pleasant casual voice, and her angular movements are, in this setting, rather attractive than disturbing. But she has little to work with, though "Dream with Music" is as full of machinery as a defense plant.

There is not an ounce of original creative talent in the show-the music is cadged from the masters, the lyrics are limp, the book is very, very dull. And it is so lavish a spectacle that I found myself thinking solemnly of Marx and Veblen, of priorities and the coming invasion of Europe. Except for the girls, it would make a fine text for a study in conspicuous waste.

The mountain of money has, however, produced a mouse-literally. There is mouse which sings, with Zorina, a number of which the burden is that it's too bad when mouse meets girl because they are biologically incompatible-as gruesome an idea as could well be invented by a desperate song writer. #### FILMS

R. CORYDON M. WASSELL, an unspectacular man, too compassionate and brave to mesh smoothly, in crisis, with authoritarians, was ordered, when Java was about to fall, to abandon several helplessly wounded sailors who were in his charge. He refused, stayed with them, kept them alive, and with great difficulty got all but one of them out of Java to Australia. I do not feel I need to have been there to know that his story is one of the great ones of this war; also, that it could be much better told through moving pictures than by any other means; also that on both counts Cecil de Mille's screen version of it is to be regretted beyond qualification. It whips the story, in every foot, into a nacreous foam of lies whose speciousness is only the more painful because Mr. de Mille is so obviously free from any desire to alter the truth except for what he considers to be its own advantage. All the more touching, and terrifying, is the fact that Dr. Wassell himself thinks that the picture, with a few trifling exceptions, is true and good.

Well, he has a right to be generous, or deceived, which none of us can dispute with him, far less claim for ourselves. One measure of the truth and goodness of the film is the difference between the elderly, simple face of the doctor and the simple yet far from simple face of the high-priced male beauty who enacts him. I like Gary Cooper; but God himself, assisted by all nine Muses, could not have made an appropriate film of "Dr. Wassell" once that piece of casting was settled on. For another measure. I choose one minor detail. When the ship out of Java is strafed and a young woman is wounded, and her ankle is being bandaged, the occasion is used to slip in a discreet bit of leg art. That, I can promise you, is typical of every shot in the movie. If you'd like another sample-I could go on forever-I offer the cinegenic idiocy of a moment when Dr. Wassell, wheeling out of a shelled road, drives his lorry through every roadside fowl-pen which, in his urgent predicament, he can get within range. Here are three brief respective counter-suggestions: (1) If you must use an actor in this sort of film, where no actors belong, get an inexperienced, unknown man who looks right and is right inside and who lacks mythologizing power, and train him only so much as need be. Failing that, use an obscure, realistically competent, somewhere nearly appropriate professional like Edward Ellis. (2) If woman is wounded, her flesh may very possibly be exposed, but for heaven's sake photograph it in such a way that nobody in your audience can possibly gobble it up-or vomit it out-as criminally misplaced cheese cake. (3) Dr. Wassell was a country man, and a gentle one. I would assume that his countrybred reflexes might cause him to try his best to avoid juggernauting livestock; and I know that this frightening conflict of reflexes could have made a wonderful moment in the film.

This viciously bad picture and a fine one called "Attack!-The Invasion of New Britain" furnish between them an opportunity-almost an obligation-to discuss our war movies to date. I hope I can do so soon, and do some justice also to "Attack!" Meanwhile I urge you to see both pictures if they are available: one as a sumptuous demonstration of our confused sense of reality-a confusion which amounts almost to insanity: the other as an antidote, a cleanser of the eyesight, and a restorer of hope and respect for what we can do when we honor and understand our subject and our craft. SEVERAL hundred of the Metropolitan Museum's best paintings shipped off more than two years ago for protection at a time when air defenses were less adequate"-have been returned to Fifth Avenue and were last week put on exhibition once more. Only about twenty of the canvases have been cleaned or restored; yet most of them seem to have acquired fresh luster during their absence. The impression is partly owed, no doubt, to the redecorated galleries-on which the museum staff is to be congratulated. In two or three cases the color scheme may be unfortunate, but this detracts little from the total effect. Seeing the pictures again calls forth a surprising amount of joyous emotion. These are among the relatively few indisputable achievements, the integrity of which history and circumstances will never overthrow, even when the canvas rots. That one can experience their actual presence, and not merely reproductions, seems a

The Museum of Modern Art's fifteenth-anniversary exhibition, "Art in Progress" (through October 8), is another source of pleasure. All three gallery floors of the museum have been filled with displays of painting, sculpture, architecture, industrial design, stage design, photographs, movie stills, posters, and more. The material, much of it borrowed, some of it owned by the museum, has been selected with an eye both to intrinsic and representative quality. This, in effect, is the modern movement as it is embodied in the more visual arts and crafts. The works in the painting and sculpture sections-beginning with Renoir, Degas, and Maillol among the French, Eakins and Homer among the Americans, and Lehmbruck and Barlach among the Germans-are well chosen; most of the examples have been borrowed and are more or less unfamiliar to the New York public. Matisse is shown at his best, and the spectator is reminded, as he needs to be, that the old Frenchman is the only living painter to offer Picasso any competition as a dominating force. But the absence of Vlaminck and Segonzac is unjustifiable; and I differ strongly with the museum on many of the younger artists whose work has been included —though some of the weakest of them are shown at their strongest. On the other hand, the notion given of American abstract painting is insipid and very unfair.

If the remainder of the exhibition is no better than it is, it may be because modern architecture, industrial design, and their allied fields are no better than they are. It is possible that there are errors of omission or inclusion, but I am not competent to decide. The architecture section seems to make the point, not intended, that no adequate modern style has yet been developed for the dwelling. I found nothing to quarrel with in the photography section except that Ansel Adams is given an undeserved amount of space, while only nine of Walker Evans's prints are shown. Evans is certainly our greatest living photographer after Stieglitz. Among the posters those of A. M. Cassandre, the French artist, which take advantage of every hint offered by the painting of the school of Paris, are superb.

The Museum of Modern Art does much in this show, as it did in its previous one, "Modern Drawings," to redeem its sins. Yet the redemption is a negative one. The best of what has already been accepted is made available, but the selection indicates no positive policy in respect to the art being produced at the moment. The museum continues to show an uneven catholicity to contemporary art beside which the present policy of the Metropolitan in regard to the art of the past appears narrow and dogmatic. The younger museum needs some of that strictness. The masterpieces at the Metropolitan furnish a standard which the Museum of Modern Art can well use to test the merits of contemporary art. Not that the works admitted into its galleries have necessarily to meet such a standard, but simply that they ought not to be completely irrelevant to it—as irrelevant, say, as the examples now on view of the art of Blume, O'Keeffe, Dali, Portinari, Zorach, Tchelitchew, Berman, Tanguy, Pereira, Robus, and more than a few others. The extreme eclecticism now prevailing in art is unhealthy, and it should be counteracted, even at the risk of dogmatism and intolerance. Inevitably, the museum makes enemies. Let it make them for good reasons.

RECORDS

N VICTOR'S June list is Morton Gould's Latin American Symphonette (Symphonette No. 4), played by Iturbi with the Rochester Philharmonic (Set 964; $3.50). In this work Gould uses the rhythms and idioms of Latin American dances; but he also uses his technical expertness to produce something cleverly surprising or amusing at every beat—which is too much, and wearying after a few measures. The performance is appropriately explosive and is well recorded.

Also on the list is a Suite No. 1 by sixteenth-century composer, Esajas Reusner, played by Fiedler with his Sinfonietta (Set 969; $2). The dances are agreeable to listen to, but no more than that; the performance seems good; its recorded sound is a little shrill.

On a single disc (10-1099); $.75) is a charming song of Schubert, "Auflösung," sung by Eleanor Steber. On this record, which must have been made two or three years ago, Miss Steber's beautiful voice is often clouded by tremolo to a degree where it is not pleasant to listen to. The reverse side offers a trashy song by Cimara, "Canto di primavera, which I imagine Miss Steber, clutching roses, has sung at the end of her recitals. Another single disc (11-8595; $1) offers Kipnis's sonorous singing of Rachmaninov's "Harvest of Sorrow," lugubrious but not bad, and Gretchaninov's familiar "Over the Steppe," quite bad in spots.

The rest is even less consequential and can go uncommented on. Some surfaces were fair, a few very noisy.

Commodore Music Shop, which specializes in jazz records, makes its own records of "Classics in Swing," and puts on Sunday afternoon jam sessions at Kelly's Stable, has resumed recording after a long interval and issued several superb performances-with spontaneity and vitality in the ensembles, and inventive power in the solos-by a group comprising "Wild Bill" Davison (trumpet), George Brunis (trombone), Pee Wee Russell (clarinet), Eddie Condon (guitar), Gene Schroeder (piano), Bob Casey (bass), and George Wettling (drums). On a ten-inch disc (546) are "That Da-Da Strain" and "Ugly Chile"; on a twelve-inch (1511) are "That's a Plenty" and "Panama." The other performances that Commodore has issued-by the Edmond Hall Sextet, Eddie Heywood and his orchestra, Leonard Feather's All Stars, and the Big Sid Catlett Quartet—are full of showy virtuosity, luxuriance of style, and tricky or gilt-and-plush scoring.

From the major companies the only comparable release is Columbia's "Blues by Basie" (Set C-101; $2.50), in which "Count" Basie, supported by the rhythm section of his orchestra, improvises variations on "How Long Blues" (36710), "Cafe Society Blues" (36711), and "Farewell Blues" and "Way Back Blues" (36712), and is joined by Buck Clayton (trumpet) and Don Byas (tenor sax) in "Sugar Blues" and "Bugle Blues" (36709), "Royal Garden Blues" (36710), and "St. Louis Blues" (36711). Basie's inventive power and rhythmic sense are extraordinary; but even when they are operating, his delicate piano-playing, all in the treble, needs his rhythm section to give it foundation and body; and there are moments when the performance is nothing but rhythm section with an occasional delicate peck or chirp by Basie. I say rhythm section; but the surfaces of my copy are so noisy that there are only a very few places where I can be sure I am hearing drums and guitar in addition to string bass, Clayton and Byas play very well in "Sugar Blues" and "Bugle Blues," less interestingly in the others.

As for books, I had intended to review Panassie's "The Real Jazz" (Smith and Durrell; $2.50) and Goffin's "Jazz From the Congo to the Metropolitan" (Doubleday, Doran; $2.50); but I have come to feel there is no point in a detailed explanation of why they are not worth reading. There exists-if you are interested—one piece of appreciative writing about jazz by a man who knows the music and loves it and utters sense in the process of writing about it with warmth and color; this is Wilder Hobson's "American Jazz Music." There is also-if you must have that-a musicologist's unloving dissection of the melody, harmony, rhythm, and structure of jazz, with a few heavily philosophical trimmings that are easily and wisely disregarded; this is Winthrop Sargeant's "Jazz Hot and Hybrid." The rest-books, articles, record-notes-is unprofitable. B. H. HAGGIN

Can a Soldier Vote?

Dear Sirs: There has been a good deal of controversy over the soldier's right to a special, expeditious voting law. Under the present compromise each individual state still has the power of directing the voting procedure of the soldiers claiming residence in that state. California has one of the more liberal sets of laws regarding the absentee voting of its soldier-citizens. What follows is the history of how one California soldier got in his vote:

Let's call him Pvt. Joe Polachek, a newly naturalized American citizen, in the army for five months, all of which were spent in a Signal Corps training camp in Missouri. He is perhaps a little more conscious than most of the precious rights for which he and millions of Americans like him are fighting. This is the first time he has had the opportunity of enjoying that essence of democracy, the casting of a ballot. The right to elect the men who will represent him and who will formulate and administer the laws under which he lives he realizes is a privilege worth dying for if need be. He will not let that privilege wither from neglect or be lightly pilfered from him. For this reason, when it was finally decided in Congress that the states should continue in charge of the service man's vote, Joe sat down and wrote his registrar of voters in Los Angeles for instructions on absentee registration and voting. He received an application for absentee registration with printed instructions on absentee voting. The hardest rule to follow was to get a commissioned officer to certify the application; they all seemed to think it was a highly dangerous business and "passed the buck" to someone else. Pvt. Polachek returned the application, duly filled out and at last signed by a commissioned officer. and received a receipt of registration.

Next, Joe ferreted out the supply of War Department Form Number 560, a request for an absentee ballot, which should have been easily obtained in any company orderly room. The orderly room neither had the cards in stock nor had any idea of getting them. The first sergeant and the company commander expressed disgust over Joe's taking an interest in voting instead of concentrating only on his army studies. At last a friend of Joe's who worked in an administrative office of the post happened across a stack of these Number 560 cards. He gave Joe part of them. Pvt. Polachek took it upon himself to distribute the cards among his buddies, vigorously urging them to fight for true democracy at home by voting. He mailed his own request card to the Secretary of State of California. Weeks went by without any sign of the awaited ballot. Thinking that the first card might have been misplaced or lost in the mail, Pvt. Polachek sent in a second card after the usual unpleasantness of persuading an officer to sign it. Several more weeks slipped by. Pvt. Joe Polachek took the Secretary of State to task with a letter. That gentleman informed Joe in his answering letter that his office was merely a clearing house which sent the requests to the various county registrars. Time continued its inevitable march. No ballot was forthcoming. But Pvt. Joe was not to be brushed off like a speck of dust from an official's glasstopped desk. The governor of the state next heard from dauntless Polachek in a scathing registered air-mail letter. By this time the county registrar's office in Los Angeles had sent a non-partisan ballot, which omitted Presidential, Senatorial, Congressional, and Assembly candidates, together with another application for registration, indicating that the receipted previous application had been misplaced!

Again the application had to be filled out and a reluctant officer, who obviously was uninformed about the whole procedure, pinned down to sign it. On the day Pvt. Polachek was unexpectedly shipped back to an assignment in his home town of Los Angeles, he received reply from Governor Warren's office blandly informing him that his communication had been forwarded to the county registrar of voters.

Now the registrar in Los Angeles returned the second application for registration untouched with a letter stating that at the time of his first request for a ballot, Joe Polachek's registration affidavit had not been on file, but that since then it had been filed and the party ballot sent. When he arrived in Los Angeles, Pvt. Joe immediately presented himself at the county registrar of voters' office, where he was wryly greeted and shown the small stack of correspondence of which he was guilty and which had eventually all found its way to the registrar's desk. The office claimed to have just mailed the party ballot, and in fact it did arrive a few days later. Certain by now that the army wanted nothing whatever to do with election, Pvt. Polachek marked his ballot before a civilian notary rather than incur the displeasure of his local army superiors. The deed had been done! Joe had cast his ballot to the best of his ability after spending considerable of his free time in study of the candidates and their platforms.

How many other "Joes" accomplished the same feat remains to be seen.

Concerning Mr. Gilbert

Dear Sirs: On May 6 you published an anonymous letter attacking the Post-Graduate School of Journalism of Chungking and the new dean, Rodney Gilbert.

In your caption you asked a question, "Is It Journalism?" In reply I inclose the Chungking Reporter, which is edited and published by the students of the Chinese school and is now, after seven issues, self-supporting. This newspaper was created and made possible entirely and exclusively by the establishment by us, in cooperation with Hollington K. Tong, of a school to teach journalism to Chinese college graduates.

The product of this Chinese school is journalism.

It is always disappointing when any publication prints a letter or article without investigating the facts at the source. The anonymous writer whose letter you published also made a personal attack upon Mr. Gilbert, alleging that he is "a notoriously anti-Chinese writer." Mr. Gilbert has been a personal friend of Mr. Tong's for at least a quarter of a century, and it is highly unlikely that Mr. Tong or his superiors in the Chinese government would permit Mr. Gilbert to return to China if the label you put upon him were true.

Both this school and the leading citizens and officials of China have complete confidence in the integrity of Mr. Gilbert as an individual, in his high moral and ethical standards as a journalist, and in his teaching ability.

As a journalist, I regret to see The Nation permit its columns to be used in time of war for sabotage.

CARL W. ACKERMAN

New York, May 10

[Readers of The Nation may be interested to learn that the copy of the Chungking Reporter which Dean Ackerman inclosed with his letter to refute the allegation that "the School of Journalism was merely a branch of Tong's propaganda department" contained as its feature article a defense of the totalitarian restrictions on press freedom by the Minister of Information and an apology for Chiang's refusal to permit the foreign correspondents to visit the Communist areas. Mr. Ackerman's artful dodging of anti-Chinese charges against Rodney Gilbert is also interesting in view of the fact that Mr. Gilbert's long-standing Chinese attitude is literally an open book. Twenty years after its publication Mr. Gilbert's "What Is Wrong with China?" still stands as the most exaggerated and unfounded attack ever made on the Chinese people and their civilization. Throughout his years of experience in China, and more recently as an editorial writer for the Herald Tribune, Mr. Gilbert has remained one of the most extreme exponents of treaty-port diehardism.-EDITORS THE NATION.]

Dialogue in Limbo

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

"This is it!" say the American troops as they pile into flat-bottomed landing craft, as they tumble from transport planes in a kaleidoscope of colored parachutes, as they crash-land in gliders on the rough fields of France. No more "exercises." No more false alarms. This is the end of waiting, the end of controversy; this is the fabulous "second front," almost as important before it began as in today's bloody reality. . . . "This is it," say the Russians, shouting with relief, their blasted villages and dead millions in their minds and in their hearts a new sense of comradeship with the West. . . . And in Germany, Adolf Hitler and his fellow-conspirators say it, too, though not out loud. This is it; in the west as in the east and south the great German retreat has begun, and where it ends, they will end too. . . . "This is it," say the old people on the streets in Bayeux and the little villages of Normandy, greeting the Allied troops, smiling, bringing out wine long bidden, and flowers. "For this we have seen our homes and our people blown to pieces by your bombs, and have not wept. We knew you would come; we thought you would come sooner. But now you are here and, at the moment you arrive, we are free."

In the White House the President greets his guest. "How do you do, mon Général"; the Roosevelt smile expresses just the appropriate mixture of formality, cordiality, quizzical irony. (No title of state; he's a general, whatever he isn't; better stick to that and play safe.)

"How do you do, Mr. President. It is good of you to receive me."

"I'm glad to welcome you, General. It must have been difficult to leave England at such an hour."

"Not at all, Mr. President. This hour is not a particularly busy one for me." A pause; not a comfortable pause. "A few of our paratroops are at the front, in France, and doing well, I hear. But I, as you see, am not. Nor do I seem to be needed in London."

"The French are fighting like heroes, as we knew they would. And the underground, too, is evidently performing with amazing discipline—and an amazing degree of organization." The President smiled again, warmly and with an air of relief.

"You will pardon me, Mr. President, if I say that there is no reason to be amazed. The underground in all its phases—the Maquis, the saboteurs, our intelligence service—it does its work well. And why not? It has been fighting since the day the traitors of Vichy signed the Armistice. And for a long time, Mr. President, the resistance forces inside and those outside—the Free French forces—have been closely coordinated. This, of course, you know. I mention it only to explain why the performance of the underground fighters can hardly be termed amazing. They have poured their blood into the earth since long before your great country entered the struggle. They know how to fight, Mr. President."

The President smiled again, this time rather sardonically. He waved his cigarette. "Perhaps, General, it would be well to take up some of the particular questions you were good enough to come to Washington to discuss."

"Certainly, Mr. President. But these are exactly the questions we have been taking up. It is hardly a secret, I think, that the Provisional Government of France, which I have the honor to head, wishes the recognition of the government of the United States. It is specifically in its role as leader of the resistance of France, military and civilian, that it claims such recognition.

"I hesitated to come to Washington, Mr. President, particularly since the failure of your government to delegate a representative to meet with me in London seemed to underscore your attitude toward the Committee of Liberation. But the safety of France means more to me than my pride, which is considerable. Therefore I am here. I wish to talk of matters which should have been settled long before the Allied armies landed in France. Even now our people are beginning to ask uneasy questions. . . Mr. President, I put it to you plainly: Do you wish to repeat in France the sequence of unhappy events that took place in North Africa?"

The President stopped smiling. "I was not aware that things had gone so badly in North Africa. The Germans have been expelled from the country; a base was secured for operations across the Mediterranean—operations which are proving, I might add, a notable success; and in the French areas your own authority, my dear Gentral, seems quite firmly established. I hardly see how North Africa serves to illustrate your point. In fact, if you will excuse me, I'm afraid I hardly see your point."

General de Gaulle's expression grew more stubborn. "North Africa was a military success, Mr. President, and a political fiasco. Only a timely assassination saved your administration from disaster. Your attempts to side-track the only French authorities that could command a popular following increased by many times the prevailing Gaullist sentiment; they cost you the friendship of the French people of North Africa. America is hated in the region you chose first to liberate. I find it painful to say this, Mr. President, but it is true."

Mr. Roosevelt flushed. "I think, General de Gaulle, we are again wasting time. You came from London not, I assume, to rake up past controversies but to discuss the future of France. Let us do so."

"As you please, Mr. President. North Africa merely illustrates France, but the illustration is not exact because in France, happily, we are spared many of the complications which confused the issue in North Africa. In France we need not, for example, worry about the feelings and prerogatives of the traitors of Vichy—or I assume we need not, Mr. President? No, clearly not. We have your explicit word for that. In France we can concentrate on wiping out and driving out the enemy and on maintaining an orderly administration."

The President nodded. "You could not have phrased the situation better, General. That is exactly the task we have set out to perform. You have omitted only one point: the determination of the Allied powers to see to it that the people of France have n chance to choose their own government as soon as the country is cleared of enemy forces. This is an element in our program of liberation which must not be forgotten, General."

"I have not forgotten it, Mr. President. It is equally an element in the program of the Provisional Government. Plans for a national referendum and the calling of a constituent assembly have been worked out in detail by the Committee of National Liberation and the Consultative Assembly. We announced those plans to the world, Mr. President; we are publicly committed to carrying them through. Meanwhile, the country must be administered and the Provisional Government has completed its preparations for that role, too. We believe it to be essential that civilian agencies move in as the enemy moves out.

"Mr. President, no other governing body has even been germinated in the soil of France—outside of Vichy. No other could possibly claim the allegiance of the people. It is stupid, I know, to sit here repeating known facts. They all point to one conclusion, and it is this that I wish to submit to you with all the energy and conviction I can command: You have only a single choice in France—to recognize and deal with the Provisional Government or to install an Allied military administration such as you set up in Italy, and then to look around, as you did there, for local functionaries to act as instruments of Allied policy.

"May I say, Mr. President, that the results of the political strategy pursued in Italy are hardly so striking as to make it seem worthy of imitation elsewhere? The government created by the Allies was from the start incapable of rousing a spark of popular support. But France is not Italy, Both you, Mr. President, and General Eisenhower have promised to entrust the administration of France to the French people. Secretary Hull said very clearly that the United States was 'disposed' to depend upon the Committee of National Liberation for the establishment of order as France is liberated. This is not a promise of recognition; Mr. Hull pointedly excluded recognition, but his words go well beyond the acts of your representatives. In each of his messages to the French people, General Eisenhower has studiously avoided any mention of the Committee of National Liberation, Naturally I am driven to wonder whether the cautious words of Mr. Hull are now considered inconsistent with your promise to let the French people direct the civil affairs of France. We maintain, Mr. President, that we represent the people of France as far as their will can be made known today. The Provisional Government has the active backing of the organized, political elements-all of them outside of Vichy, left, right, and center. Can any other government in exile claim more? Can many regularly elected governments claim as much? Can you yourself, Mr. President?"

The President was silent, and De Gaulle went on, with more confidence.

"The important things," he said, "in the next few months are practical things-feeding of the people, the organization of resistance. The agony of France has been great; it will be worse while the fighting lasts. The people are rising, all over France, to drive out the invader, to die in thousands-after five years of war and four years under Hitler. Nothing could be worse at this moment than a spreading suspicion that the Allied armies plan to use French lives-and then run France to suit themselves. . . . Those Allied francs! How could such scheme be invented for use in a friendly country among people already starving on the fixed currency of the invader? For the Allies to have set up a fiscal system for liberated France-without even consulting the Provisional Government-makes an ugly joke of the very word 'liberation.'

"This is only one instance. Another, equally significant, perhaps, was the failure to use French troops in the first landings. Can it be that the Allied command feared demonstrations for De Gaulle and the Provisional Government? I hope not. But that is what people are asking.

"I hesitate to speak, Mr. President, of the failure of the Allied authorities to make use of my services in planning the military campaign in my own country, though to do so would have seemed not inappropriate to Frenchmen; I speak, rather, of their refusal to use me in helping direct the activities of the resistance movement inside France. My respect for General Eisenhower forbids me to question his judgment in military matters. On political questions, however, I can only believe that he follows the policy laid down by the British Foreign Office and your own State Department. And so I feel free to assume that his failure to use the Committee of National Liberation—whether recognized as a government or not—as an instrument of political war during the invasion of France can only be the result of an attitude on your part which I most passionately deplore."

The President puffed his cigarette. "I didn't like that business of executing Pucheu," he said.

De Gaulle frowned. "He was a traitor," he said.

"Bad business, that sort of retributive justice. Usually ends in terror, like Germany," said the President. "If your committee runs France, there might be a good deal of that. Too much."

De Gaulle spoke very carefully. "Pucheu," he said, "was tried in a French court. His rights were safeguarded as carefully as seemed possible in a situation such as exists today. Undoubtedly there will be more such trials. French patriots have died by thousands through the acts of traitors working for Germany. Either the men suspected of treason must go to trial—and promptly—or terror is inevitable. Not only inevitable, but excusable. I hope, Mr. President, that you do not imagine order will be better maintained without the help of French authority."

"Oh no, on the contrary. We must depend on French authority all the way. Under the direction of the military, of course. We've said that right along. The only question is, General, what authority? If we take your word for it, your committee is the only authority there is. Well, we'll see. If that's so, we shall soon find out. But—well, let's let it go at that.

"As for those American francs and the other specific points you brought up—I must say I think you have a case. It's too late to do anything about the francs, I'm afraid. They're all over the place already. But perhaps we can do something to keep prices from skyrocketing the way they did in Italy. Hard to, though, without taking money out of the pockets of American soldiers—and that's harder still. I'll speak to Eisenhower about the whole list. He's really the one to decide—within the limits, of course, of the government's basic policy.

"And now, General, haven't we pretty well covered the ground you had in mind? I have a good many appointments and I know you are anxious to get back nearer the scene of action. I am, myself; indeed I envy you. These are great days—and terrible ones. But we are winning, and that's the main thing after all, isn't it? These other problems—well, they seem secondary, however much they clamor for attention. When we think of those boys fighting their way in from the beaches ..."

"Into France," said General de Gaulle.

"Of course, into France," said the President. He looked a little nettled at having his closing sentence broken off.

The General stood. Mr. Roosevelt grinned with that sudden amiability that speeds the unwanted guest, held out his hand. De Gaulle looked down at the President. "I am going back," he said, "disappointed and confused. I thought I might alter your position, although I knew it was not likely. But I thought that if I failed, you might at least tell me honestly and openly your reasons for maintaining an attitude that seems to me so dangerous. You have not told me your reasons, though I think you approached them when you mentioned Pucheu.

"I am not taken in, Mr. President, by your smile, nor by the off-hand way you dispose of the problem of governing France. I have been told that you dislike me but I do not believe that this, either, explains your refusal to recognize my government. You are not a high-school girl. Nor do I believe you entertain serious doubts as to the strength of my government with the people of France. If you will pardon me, I think this a convenient and rather appealing excuse to give the public.

"No, Mr. President, I believe your attitude toward me and the government I head is an expression of policy. I can only guess at that policy. I think you are opposed to the Provisional Government of France because you believe that, under me, it will be too independent, too firm, too set upon maintaining the sovereignty of France. It will not be subservient, as Darlan was subservient. It will not protect men who are traitors merely because they consented to serve later as agents of the Allies. I do not know what other 'authorities' you plan to deal with, if any. I do not share the suspicions of those who say you are ready to make use of those pre-armistice appeasers who held aloof from Vichy-men like Georges Bonnet. Still less do I credit the stories that you have an understanding with Noguès or with the clique of financial collaborationists who wait to come to terms with any power that will assure them protection and profits. I realize that these are the sort of people you accepted in North Africa, but in France such a deal would bring down on you the unlimited anger of the very forces you are calling on today to share the struggle against Hitler. No, I do not think you will pick any Peyroutons or Pucheus in France.

"What then? What is your alternative to the Committee of National Liberation? I think I know. I think you prefer to the tough reality of the committee —of my Provisional Government—a state of fluid uncertainty, a state in which you can maintain the dominance of Allied armed power, using as instruments whatever individuals or groups seem suitable—and suitably pliable. I think you want, for the present at least, a weak France, weak in will as well as in material force. With such a France it would be possible to make bargains—an island here or there, perhaps; a naval base. . . . Who can tell what the security of the United States will require in terms of power and resources? Dakar—can it be left safely in French hands? Or the French islands of the Caribbean?

"I think, Mr. President, that questions like this control your policy toward France—and toward me. I think you would prefer to hold off until you see whether more conservative, more 'reasonable' elements may not emerge with at least enough backing to give a color of excuse for dealing with them.

"I hope I am wrong, Mr. President, because such a policy seems to me reckless and indefensible. It may easily plunge France into civil war. I hope I am wrong but since you will not tell me, I can only take my suspicions back to England with me.

"Goodbye, Mr. President. In spite of everything we shall do our duty. We shall cooperate to the limit with General Eisenhower to drive the Germans out of our country. We shall also do our best to govern France until the people can speak. We shall try to prevent internal collapse and revolution even if it means shooting every collaborationist in and out of Vichy. We shall do our best, Mr. President. May God speed our common cause."

The Shape of Things

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN THE BALKANS have been somewhat obscured in the past week by more dramatic events on the coast of France, but the Germans have lost nothing of their enthusiasm for controlling that part of the world. In Bulgaria the Allies have received a serious setback in the formation of a new pro-Nazi government; Russian attacks around Iasi, in Rumania, have been fiercely resisted, and Marshal Tito's headquarters in Bosnia have been subjected to a vicious German assault, Fourteen German divisions, four Bulgarian divisions, 120,000 to 130,000 Croat Ustashis, 15,000 followers of the Serbian puppet Nedich, three regiments of the Serbian White Corps, 12,000 Slovene legionnaires, and about 10,000 Albanians, all under the command of Field Marshal von Weichs, are fighting against Tito's 250,000 or 300,000 men, Fortunately, Axis efforts to annihilate the Yugoslav resistance have been frustrated by Tito's technique of rapidly dispersing and regrouping his troops, and air and sea contact between the Anglo-American base in Bari and Tito's headquarters has been successfully maintained. General Maitland Wilson's forces in the Middle East are undoubtedly waiting for a Russian victory over Rumania before rushing toward the Balkans. Once Russia has occupied Bulgaria, Tito can lead the Soviet and Anglo-American armies from northern Yugoslavia, through Austria, into Germany. The Balkans will be a decisive factor in the final collapse of German military strength.

WITH THE COLLAPSE OF THE BADOGLIO regime the Allies' second experiment in imposing excollaborators with the Axis upon the liberated peoples has met its deserved fate. The Italian repudiation of Badoglio was as complete and throughgoing as the French repudiation of Darlan, Peyrouton, and Giraud. The new Premier, Ivanoe Bonomi, has a clean record as far as Fascism is concerned. He opposed Mussolini and his Black Shirts before the March on Rome in 1922, and has maintained his opposition through the years at the cost of great personal hardship. In recent months he has been the leader of the anti-Fascist National Committee of Liberation in Rome. Unlike some of the pre-Fascist political leaders, Bonomi's reputation for integrity is untarnished. Following Mussolini's rise to power he disposed of the furniture of a comfortable Rome apartment and lived for years in an attic. In sharp contrast to Badoglio's temporizing policies, Bonomi's first action was to promise a thorough purge of all Fascists still holding public office in the liberated sections of Italy. Another innovation was the Cabinet's refusal to swear allegiance to the royal house; instead, its members took an oath to uphold the Constitution-pre-Fascist model.

THE BEACHES OF NORMANDY ARE HARDLY visible from Capitol Hill. Inside the House of Representatives there is no sound of the Battle of Europe. It is D-Day; but Congress has its own work to do and it can hardly take time out for history. At first it seems that the representatives of the American people may turn from partisan politics and match the solemnity of the hour with high action. But the moment passes. Visitors to the galleries have come from their radios, from the headlines, from conversation with a taxi driver whose son is a paratrooper. Now they look down with bewilderment. There are good men down there, good Americans whose sons, some of them, are dying this morning so that Europe and the world may be liberated. But in charge of the debate are the shallow, unseeing men who are converting the tragedy of another fateful day into a tawdry issue of party gain. Step up to that microphone and rant that the Administration has something to hide in wanting to postpone a court martial. Block that amendment. File like sheep past the tellers. This is the time-tested game of politics. What day is this? D-Day? What has that to do with us? Our men are landing on the beaches of France? But have they votes in November?

THE PRICE CONTROL ACT IS ONCE MORE IN grave danger. While few opponents of the Administration dare at this time to come out openly against the war-time regulation of prices, both the House and the Senate have adopted a number of amendments which, if retained, will completely wreck the stabilization program. It is difficult to say which body has proposed the more crippling changes. Both have shown uncalled-for solicitude for violators of the act. The House version of the bill extending the life of the OPA permits violators of the agency's regulations to avoid prosecution for a year or more by throwing enforcement cases into the District Court and wiping out the present provision requiring all protests to be filed within sixty days. Another amendment hampers the OPA in checking the figures presented by a firm by compelling the agency to accept "the established accounting method of the firm" in determining whether a price violation has occurred. The House bill also removed an important weapon in enforcement by cutting the damages which a consumer may recover from three times the excess price to one and a half times the excess. The Senate went a step farther by writing an amendment that would ignore any violation of the price control where the offender could show that he had not acted "wilfully" or as "the result of failure to take practical precautions." In addition to these attempts to undermine the enforcement of the act, the Senate has passed the Bankhead amendment lifting ceilings on cotton textiles, while the House has written in clauses which will raise rents and increase prices of cheap clothing, gasoline, and oil. It is time for consumers to protest-loudly.

WHATEVER HOPE SEWELL AVERY MAY HAVE had of capitalizing on his appearance before the House committee to attract public attention to his "blitz" against the government collapsed when his day in court happened to coincide with the invasion of Europe. But it did not matter much. Avery's testimony contributed little or nothing to his case. He was compelled to admit that he had forced his ejection from the plant in an effort to dramatize his protest against governmental interference. He attacked his industrial colleagues on the WLB because they were not as able as the union members, and suggested that he would probably be the best man for the President to appoint to the agency. Apart from this, his one constructive suggestion for a solution of the basic problems of war-time labor relations was the complete abolition of the WLB. Obviously delighted with the publicity he had received when he was ousted from his office, Mr. Avery prepared the way for a return engagement by refusing once again to extend Ward's contract with the union as ordered by the WLB. But meanwhile Mr. Avery's last hope for sustaining the legality of his action collapsed when a United States Court of Appeals held unanimously that the orders of the WLB were not reviewable in court. The decision not only vindicated Attorney General Biddle's rulings but directly contradicted the highly partisan report of the McCarran-Revercomb committee, which had been hailed by Avery's supporters.

Anxiety in Cairo

Cairo, June 11, by Cable

RENCH circles here are distressed by the apparent decision of the Allied command to deprive France's own government of wide prerogatives in the most critical hour of its history. Government by General Eisenhower is called "abnormal."

The French here are saddened by reports from Algiers that the broadcast on June 8 of Commissioner of the Interior d'Astier over the United Nations radio to the maquis was barred because the expression "Provisional Government" was used. They also resent the fact that non-French francs are being issued to the troops in France. Hostility toward America is mounting.

MICHAEL CLARK

THE HOUSE'S UNEXEPECTED DEFEAT OF THE Smith amendments designed to emasculate the WLB and prevent other plant seizures was by far the most thorough repudiation of that committee in years. Representative Smith had succeeded in persuading the Rules Committee that his anti-WLB amendments should be added to the pending legislation for the extension of the Price Control Act, Without voting directly on the amendments the House challenged the authority of the Rules Committee to introduce new legislation under the guise of establishing a "rule." The committee's highhanded action was repudiated by a vote of nearly three to one, with many Republicans joining the New Deal Democrats in administering the rebuke. It is to be hoped that in addition to checking the increasingly dictatorial practices of the Rules Committee the setback will serve as a warning against future conspiratorial tactics on the part of Old Guard Republicans and Southern Democrats.

THE KU KLUX KLAN HAS BEEN OFFICIALLY disbanded, but it is not as dead as it deserves. In an interview with the Atlanta Journal, Imperial Wizard James A. Colescott declared that he and other officers retain their titles although their functions are "suspended." "We have," he added, "authority to meet and reincarnate at any time." Reincarnation, according to our understanding, means rebirth of the spirit in a different body, and this seems to be exactly what is happening. We learn from Frank McCallister, who as Southern secretary of the Workers' Defense League did such valiant work from 1935 on in exposing Klan attacks on trade unionism, that already many Kluxers have joined the Keystone Society, a newly formed "patriotic" group. Another organization competing for their support is Vigilantes, Inc., fathered by ex-Governor Eugene Talmadge of Georgia. Moreover, the semi-disembodied spirit of the Klan surely was present at the Texas and Mississippi Democratic state conventions which threatened to bolt the party's Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees unless the national platform included a "white supremacy" plank. And living up to its non-partisan tradition, it alighted recently in the midst of the Indiana Republicans, reviving memories of the time when the Klan dominated that state and under the leadership of D. C. Stephenson gave it the most corrupt administration it ever had. In those days Robert W. Lyons was treasurer of the Indiana Klan; on June 2 he was elected state member of the Republican National Committee.

Beginning of the End

DAY was hailed with a sense of relief all over the world, but people were quick to realize that a new period of tension lay ahead. Now we must wait again, keeping our nerves under control, for indications that the invasion has succeeded. According to Arthur Krock of the New York Times, the High Command expects a lapse of four to five weeks before any conclusive verdict on General Eisenhower's operations can be given. By that time the whole design of the grand strategy decided on at the Teheran conference may have emerged. For it must not be forgotten that the landings in France are not an isolated event. They are linked closely to the drive in Italy, which is developing with such success, to the campaign of Marshal Tito, which may be supplemented by Allied operations in the Balkans, and, finally but most important of all, to the new blows which the Red Army has begun to deliver on the eastern front.

In the immediate future we can expect plenty of colorful details of the fighting but little news of the kind that will enable us to assess its progress. There will be no release from Allied headquarters of any information that could possibly help the enemy. This involves a risk that the public will pay too much attention to the artfully concocted mixture of fact and fancy that Goebbels is serving in generous portions. We can only hope that the press will be careful in handling stories from this source. It was unfortunate, to say the least, that the fall of Caen was headlined on a German say-so when next day the papers had to admit that the battle for the town continued.

The broad outline of General Eisenhower's strategy became clear as soon as the location of the first landings were known. It was based upon the geography of the Cotentin Peninsula, which sticks into the English Channel like a raised thumb. At its northern tip, less than ninety miles from the nearest point of the English coast, is the well-equipped deep-water port of Cherbourg. The shores of the peninsula are rocky and unsuitable for landing craft but immediately to the east are the wide sandy beaches of the Bay of the Seine. Here the chief landingto date—was made and a beachhead established cutting the main road and rail communications of Cherbourge

At the same time the peninsula itself was saturated with Allied parachutists whose apparent objective was to isolate Cherbourg and prevent any Nazi reinforcements from reaching it. If this port can be captured the first essential for the deep penetration of France—a good supply base where heavy equipment can be landed—will have been secured.

Our successes in taking the Normandy beaches proved that a certain amount of bluff had been mixed with the concrete of the Atlantic Wall. In places the first echelons ashore encountered fierce resistance and suffered heavy casualties, but the fixed defenses proved much less formidable than Nazi propaganda had suggested. This does not mean, however, that Marshals Rundstedt and Rommel have shot their bolt. Whatever Goebbels may have said, they have known all along that they could not stop an invasion on the beaches, and accordingly they have concentrated their best troops well inland as a mobile, strategic reserve to be hurled at the Allies once it is clear where the main line of attack is developing. The next crisis of the invasion, which may come before these words appear in print, will arise when this élite German force is put in motion. However, Rommel must be sure that Normandy is really the danger point before he can afford to counter-attack there. He knows that only a fraction of General Eisenhower's forces are engaged so far, and the Allied warning to fishermen from Norway to the Pyrenees to stay in port suggests that new landings are contemplated.

But while the Nazi generals wait, the Allied bridgeheads grow stronger, Moreover, the American and British air forces are busy sweeping a wide arc south of the Channel, bombing and shooting up everything German that moves on rail or road, attacking bridges, marshaling yards, stations, barracks, and supply dumps. This war of attrition from the air, together with that carried on by the underground, must be reducing both the mobility and the potential striking power of the Nazi strategic reserve. Yet in the opening stages of the invasion there was little sign of counter-measures by the Luftwaffe. In the first two and a half days of the invasion Allied planes flew 27,000 sorties with a loss of little more than 1 per cent. What remains of the Luftwaffe is being hoarded, perhaps for a blow to be synchronized with Rommel's counter-attack.

The dilemma of the German western command is but one phase of the total dilemma which total warfare has become for Hitler. Now his old nightmare has become grim reality. Germany is encircled, forced to fight not merely on two but on four fronts. Indeed, we may say on five, for while external foes batter down the walls of Fortress Europe, unarmed but increasingly formidable enemies fight within its gates. The strength Hitler commands is still great but not great enough to beat all his challengers at once. Where, then, shall he throw his reserves? Into the western breach and have nothing left to bolster the east when the Red Army strikes? Or must he stem the Russian tide at all costs even though it means opening a path to the Rhine? Again, how far can he strip his home garrisons when Germany harbors ten million foreign slaves waiting a chance to break their bonds?

Facing defeat, Hitler will fight hard and cunningly. We must be prepared to withstand hard knocks, to suffer setbacks, to avoid diplomatic booby traps. But we have arrived at the beginning of the end, and only a suicidal disruption of the United Nations can rob us of victory.

T IS EXTREMELY FORTUNATE that the mutual relations of the great powers of Europe are today as nearly cordial as they have been for many years, for the state of the Balkan peninsula is more than ever threatening to the peace of the world.—June 7, 1894.

THE TESTIMONY THUS FAR adduced in the police inquiry has agreed in fixing pretty definitely the rates of Tammany tariff on some forms of vice and other sources of revenue. Thus, the regular rate for a disorderly house is $500 "initiation fee" to the police captain, to be paid whenever a new captain is placed in charge of the district; . . . the regular tariff for admission to the police force is $300.—

THE CURIOUS STATE OF MIND into which the world is getting on the subject of the unemployed is seen again in the new view of the horrible dangers of a general disarmament. Members of the English and French chambers of commerce met in Paris last Friday to discuss that question, and discovered a "consensus of opinion" that such a disarmament would have a most serious effect upon labor, as it would add the 3,750,000 now in European armies to the ranks of the unemployed.—June 28, 1894.

MR. CROKER'S MALARIAL AFFECTION, which started him for Europe so suddenly a few weeks ago, has disappeared, and he is about to return to us again without warning. . . As he will arrive here after the [legislative investigating] committee has adjourned for the summer, and there will be ample opportunity for his ailment to break out again before it resumes its work, this demonstration of "who's afraid?" must be taken for what it is worth.

How Washington Took the News

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 9

OST of the Washington press corps, like most of official Washington, slept peacefully through the early hours of D-Day. The first announcement that the second front had been opened came at 12:37 a.m., long after the usual deadlines of the morning-paper bureaus and long before that of the evenings. The German source of the news and the absence of any confirmation here or in London made bureau chiefs skeptical, and decided them against staff mobilizations. The few who came down town after the German broadcast noted the usual sights—an occasional light in the darkened Navy Department, the lonely sentries before the White House, the couples making love across the way in Lafayette Park. The moon was full, the weather mild.

The Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff had left their offices at 5 p.m. the day before and were safe abed. The big military secret was that Elmer Davis, on leaving the National Press Club at 9:30 that night, had gone back to his office at the OWI. The one exciting place in town was the foreign news bureau of the OWI in the Social Security Building near the Capitol, but in the huge adjoining press room as late as 3 a.m. there were only two reporters waiting for the big news-Libby Donahue of PM and Joe Laitin of the United Press, neither certain that anything would turn up. There was a guard at the door to keep them away from Elmer Davis's office, and a terrific clatter and clang issued from the foreign news room, with its huge battery of tickers, each with a bell that rings when particularly hot news comes over the wires. The bells rang often and the place was a mad scramble of OWI foreign staff members, but as Libby says, "those boys are crazy even on a clear day," and one couldn't be sure. Five minutes before United Nations confirmation of the second front at 3:32 a.m. Miss Donahue was confidentially informed from an authoritative source that she might as well go home as there would be I long delay. She decided, however, to stay.

By the time news of the invasion was confirmed, a Philadelphia Inquirer reporter and an Acme photographer had also arrived, and all were ushered into Elmer Davis's office to hear General Eisenhower's broadcast over short wave. Davis looked tired and dazed but perked up over General Eisenhower's delivery, which was good. "That man could go places on radio when the war's over," Davis said admiringly.

The State Department moved its regular press conference from noon to 11 a.m. on D-Day, perhaps out of a sense of the urgency of the occasion. On the way there we saw a group of curious people, police, and photographers waiting to get a glimpse of the visiting Polish Premier. He had an appointment with Under Secretary Stettinius at 10:30, and the latter, in full protocol. walked across the street to escort Mikolajczyk over, What they said to each other, then or later, remains a secret, but the Soviet Ambassador arrived at the department an hour afterward. In between, the Under Secretary met the press. Hull was away resting at Hershey, Pennsylvania, and as always it was a pleasure to see Stettinius's youthful face and quick smile in his place. The Under Secretary read a prepared statement, "The liberation of Europe has begun . . ."—one of many like it on D-Day from departmental and embassy mimeographs. Then he went on to announce recognition of the new Ecuadorean government, the arrival of the Gripsholm at Jersey City, an agreement by the Japanese government to pick up supplies at Vladivostok for interned Allied nationals.

From embassies and department heads, press releases on the invasion began to appear, but aside from these synthetic reactions there was little excitement in the capital and-significant item-bond sales actually fell off. I. Edgar Hoover called for alertness on the home front, and the War Department asked Congress to establish sixty-nine new national cemeteries. All over town, in government offices as well as in churches, there were special prayer services, and many who do not ordinarily pray joined in them with a sober sense of the struggle on distant beachheads and its human cost. But on Capitol Hill, where some of us seemed to feel prayer was most needed, it had little effect. The galleries were well filled, mostly with visiting service men, but there were only eleven Senators and a scattering of Representatives present when the day's session opened. Minority Leader Martin told the House that "partisan politics . . . disappear as we think of the heroic deeds of our men and women," but this must be put down to poetic license. The Republican-Southern Democratic coalition soon got back to work in both houses with unabated enthusiasm. "I felt humble this morning when advised of the invasion," Majority Leader McCormack said. "A strange feeling came over me." The feeling was not widely shared.

Celler of New York tried to block a resolution to speed up the trial of Kimmel and Short by pointing out that Pearl Harbor was in part due to an attitude of public "indifference and callousness . . . influenced by some of the isolationist remarks made in this very House . . . by the gentlemen who are the sponsors of this bill." Said Celler, "I have due respect for the gentlemen and

I do not charge them with anything . . . they had a perfect right to their opinions." Retorted Dewey Short of Missouri boldly, "We still have them." The House passed his resolution for trial of Kimmel and Short within three months by a vote of 305 to 35, though trial may disrupt military-naval operations. The Senate went ahead on a bill which promises to hamstring the OPA.

The big local event of the day was the President's regular press conference at 4 p.m., which drew a record crowd. Most of the President's official family, from Fala to Judge Rosenman, seemed to be with him in the executive offices, waiting in a kind of holiday mood to watch the old maestro handle the press. The President was happy and confident but tired, and he has aged. His hand shook a little when he lifted it to the same jaunty cigarette holder. He answers questions slowly, looking up at the ceiling, occasionally wiggling his face and scratching his chest between phrases. Our faces must have shown what most of us felt as we came in. For he began, after an extraordinary pause of several minutes in which no questions were asked and we all stood silent, by saying that the correspondents had the same look on their faces that people all over the country must have and that he thought this a very happy conference. I asked him toward the close to tell us what hopes he felt on this great day, and he said to win the war—100 per cent.

I thought the President's prayer that night a gauche affair, addressing God in a familiar, conversational, and explanatory tone, as if it were a fireside chat beamed at heaven. But I am inclined to be charitable when I think of what D-Day means to Franklin D. Roosevelt, of the years since the "quarantine" speech in which he tried to awaken the American people to their danger and to gird them against enemies they so long refused to recognize. How different it would have been could we have gone into France before it fell; how much easier our task. And how different it would have been if the Germans had turned west and south toward Africa and South America instead of east. How poorly prepared we were in 1941 to resist, and how poorly prepared we are even today to understand. D-Day's events in Congress, the slash last Saturday in UNRRA funds, the unseemly and ungrateful uproar over the lend-leasing of a cruiser to the Soviet Union indicate how backward public opinion continues to be, and how formidable is the task the President will face in making the peace. D-Day served to remind us that we are heavily in debt to the man in the White House as well as to the boys on the beachheads.

Montgomery, Master of Attack

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

[Lieutenant Bolté, late of the King's Royal Rifle Corps, is a young American who enlisted in the British army before the United States entered the war. He served in Africa under General Montgomery, now in command of the Allied ground forces in Europe, and was wounded at Alamein.]

ENERAL SIR BERNARD MONTGOMERY, who has soldiered for thirty-five of his fifty-six years with a kind of monkish devotion and single-mindedness, is the ideal field-army commander. His tough, wiry body is matched by his tough, flexible mind; he commands the fullest confidence of his troops; he has studied his enemy thoroughly; and he has mastered the principle of close cooperation between air and ground forces. I emphasize toughness. Viscount Wavell, probably the best British general of this war and one of the great Englishmen of our time, says generals should be made to pass the same test for toughness that field guns used to be put through by the Royal Artillery. The testing officers would drop new gun from a hundred-foot tower and then go down and fire it. If it went off all right, the board would consider it for further tests.

This test might snap the Montgomery body, but I can't believe it would damage the Montgomery mind or the Montgomery character. In the Western Desert Montgomery showed himself to be almost the first Allied commander willing to pay the price of victory. It took a tough mind to carry out General Alexander's plan of attack at Alamein, when desert-weary and defeat-sickened troops were ordered against the stiffest part of the German defenses. Montgomery knew in advance that casualties would run high—75 per cent, in some battalions—but he knew the victory would be worth the price, and his army paid it for him.

I first saw him about a month before the battle, when he reviewed our battalion at Burg el Arab, just behind the lines. In the clean sweep of commanders which followed the June retreat to Alamein, Montgomery had come out from England unknown except for two things: he was keen on spit and polish, and mad about physical training. To the Desert Rats, that most casual, cynical, and business-like of all armies, nothing more damning needed to be known. They were prepared to dislike the little general. The first meeting confirmed their suspicions. He reviewed the entire battalion without saying a word to anyone except the officers, slapped his open palm with a swagger stick as he walked, and stared into every man's face with the brightest and most piercing blue eyes I ever saw.

I was frankly scared of the man and what he might do with us. He looked to me like an old-line general with an infantry-artillery mind: crush 'em and walk through 'em. We moaned quite a lot after he left, and thought him arrogant.

The battle made us stop moaning, although we still thought him arrogant. In the first place, we all knew what was going on: by his order the plan of battle was passed down through the ranks, until the last rifleman knew not only what he was to do but what the divisions on his right and left were to do. Moreover, he knew why he was to do it. That was revolutionary, being taken into a general's confidence, and it made us feel with a kind of excitement that we were going into an adventure that had purpose and direction.

Taken into his confidence, we gave him our own. It was a very bad battle, but no one ran away. The victory strengthened our belief in him. Montgomery knows what makes our kind of men operate in battle, and he has said: "You must give our troops leadership and establish absolute confidence between commanders and soldiers." Then, a little wrily, he added: "The surest method of gaining confidence is success." Successes at Alamein, at Agheila, at Mareth, in Tunisia, Sicily, and Italy gave the Eighth Army so much confidence in Montgomery that they would cheerfully have started for Berlin on any day he issued the order. "You can do anything with an army if its morale is high," he says.

Tough-mindedness gives him the moral strength to pay the price of victory; self-confidence and the knowledge that he has the confidence of his troops give him freedom of choice in making difficult decisions. His profound knowledge of his enemy means that he can be assured of the psychological and tactical correctness of his decisions. Before he ever came to the desert, he saw Rommel's fatal limitation—that he was a brilliant tactician but repeated himself. Knowing what to expect from Rommel, Montgomery could always move in advance to counter him. But he slept with Rommel's picture above his bed, to remind himself what manner of man he had to beat.

As for the German soldier, Montgomery calls him first-class and well-trained, very good technically in the use of his weapons, with a very good eye for ground and a sense of complete obedience. Still—some of them captured in Italy were "not frightfully intelligent." The youngsters, thoroughly indoctrinated with fascism, are "very cockahoop"; the older men, not so well indoctrinated, are not so cockahoop. In short: "The German is a good soldier and he will fight, though I believe it is true that once you get him down he cracks up."

This is important knowledge for a field commander to have. He can prejudge his opponent's reactions; he does not overrate the opposition, but he certainly does not underrate it. Thus forewarned by careful study, Montgomery can utilize his own flexibility of mind. It is always difficult to apportion praise for victory among a commander-in-chief, his chief of staff, and the field commander; nevertheless, I think history will credit Alexander for the African campaign, just as it will credit Eisenhower for the European campaign. Theirs the strategy; but Montgomery's the application of strategy, which is tactics.

Montgomery was one of a little group of forward-looking British officers who began to study and prepare for this war in the '20's, while he was still a comparatively junior officer. He familiarized himself with the mechanics of the war that was to come, especially the two innovations which were to prove most radical in changing the course of warfare—the internal-combustion engine and the two-way radio set, which gave mobility back to the army and gave the commander instantaneous intelligence which enabled him in turn to transmit in stantaneous orders. As the sledge-hammer translating first Alexander's and now Eisenhower's plans into action, Montgomery's flexibility of mind comes out strongly.

Thus at Alamein he reversed accepted desert procedure: instead of fighting a tank battle, he chewed up Rommel's infantry with his own guns and infantry. Rommel had either to counter-attack with his armor to save his infantry or retreat without them. He couldn't retreat because he would have no troops to hold another line to the west; so he was forced to fight a tank battle at Alamein, on ground of Montgomery's choosing. Since Montgomery dictated the time and place of the battle, he could mass his armor and hold it in reserve until Rommel had committed himself. Then the Eighth Army's preponderance of anti-tank guns and its armored superiority—guaranteed by the superb new American Sherman tank-were decisive. The Battle of Africa was won on the ground of Alamein, and Rommel never again made up his armored strength.

Flexibility gained victory at the Mareth Line next spring. Montgomery opened the battle with a frontal attack against the strongest part of the line, as he did at Alamein. The line held, and Montgomery sent a force through the desert around the Germans' right flank. The mere threat of its presence behind him caused Rommel to pull out

Finally, Montgomery has formulated and tested the great principle of modern war: "First you must win the battle of the air. That must come before you start a single land or sea operation." From Alamein to Normandy he has not fought a battle which violates this principle. He and Air Marshal Cunningham, commander of the Desert Air Force, lived side by side throughout the African campaign, and fulfilled Montgomery's precept that the land and air chiefs must be "very great friends." He goes on to say: "Each side must realize the other's difficulties. Air power cannot operate without good landing grounds. The getting of these is always part of the army plan. The air aspect dominates the plan. The airman is very sensitive about air fields." So you have bulldozers landing in the first wave in Normandy, and taking their place beside tanks and guns as prime weapons. The bulldozers clear air strips so the planes can take off and smash enemy resistance so the army can advance and the bulldozers clear more air strips so the planes can take off again, in a cycle that ends at Berlin.

Montgomery believes that each man should command his own force absolutely; but "the army-air have to be so knitted that the two form one entity. The resultant military effort is so great that nothing can stand up against it."

His careful study of the enemy, his understanding of the importance of establishing high morale in his troops, his insistence on gaining air supremacy make him careful. He will not be stampeded. He says: "I always go for certainty. That is why preparation must be complete and without hurry." This time he has the benefit of the most careful preparation ever lavished on a military operation. He goes into battle with troops who believe in him, who admire his cockiness, who like the savor of his orders of the day (he is one of the few generals who can get away with rhetoric). He faces his old antagonist, the bully boy become field marshal, whose daring was so fabulous we coined a verb to describe a hair-raising exploit-"to Rommel." I'm not predicting dates or places, but the Desert Fox will certainly have his brush taken again by the son of the Bishop of Tasmania, whose battle cry was Cromwell's: "Let God arise and let His enemies be scattered."

London on D-Day

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, June 7, by Cable TO ONE in Britain yesterday will ever forget the impact of the news. People seemed to walk about the street with a new spring in their steps. There was a light in their eyes that had not shone for almost four years. In Frenchmen, Poles, Czechs, Russians, Norwegians, Belgians, even the stolid Dutch-in all of them one could see a new radiance, Liberation was beginning. The idea of freedom was no longer a concept bandied about in discussion but a living fact which made the lives of each of us a different and a happier thing. We had waited so long: at last we could hope that we had not waited in vain. Anyone who listened to Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons yesterday must have felt that a new epoch had dawned. He was not excited. Rather he was soberly careful to make it evident that the immense operations upon which we had embarked must be thought of as the first stage in a process at the end of which the dreams of millions would come true.

It was not easy for the House to sit still. It was even difficult for strangers in bus and tube not to speak to one another. Wherever a newsvender appeared, there gathered about him a vast crowd which for the first time in years could not bear to form a queue lest it lose the chance of a paper containing some new detail. I think the two main emotions were of relief and pride—of relief that at last the tradition which goes back so many hundred years in Britain was to secure its vindication, of pride that so massive a feat of organization had a clear prospect of a triumphant end.

What, above all, impressed me yesterday was the fact that the beginning of these gigantic operations has made the United Nations something more than a congeries of peoples. They have been welded, we hope, into a unity, a commonwealth, which has reached the stage where it can meet the enemy as a single being. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that yesterday the peoples of a dozen nations in London were one people, that they knew no difference because they shared a common hope that the backbone of Nazism was about to be broken. Men who had ceased to dream began again to dream.

A Frenchman invited me to dinner in Paris at Christmas; a Dutch professor asked me if I would give some lectures next year at the University of Leyden; a Czech spoke of the thrill that his family, which he had not seen since 1938, would know he shared with them at the same moment of time. It is, I think, literally true that for twelve hours of yesterday there was neither Jew nor Greek, neither bond nor free. All of us in London were part of a great fellowship, the heart of which was on the beaches of the French coast.

We heard the long throbbing drone of the bombers with pride. This time four years ago we were waiting to be invaded; now we were moving to emancipate civilization. We were at grips with the Nazi enemy on European soil. Thousands of ships were taking our men to that rendezvous which, if it bring death to thousands, brings also the life of freedom to posterity. One man said to me in the tube that he had hardly dared even to think of a Europe over which the swastika did not fly, and the tears were in his eyes when he said how proud he was that his boy was among the first group of paratroops.

I saw American soldiers in Oxford Street shake hands with British Tommies whom quite obviously they had never met before. I saw members of Parliament so moved that they could not speak. Everyone I spoke with had about him an air of subdued excitement.

I do not think there is any tendency to underestimate the price we shall have to pay for victory. We know the fury of the rat in the corner. We recognize that these evil men who have the German people in their grip and have tyrannized two-thirds of Europe will stop at nothing if they can thereby save their skins. And many of us who talked together yesterday understood how great are the problems we shall face on the day of the Nazi surrender, realized that the Grand Alliance is easier in its relations as it shapes the victory than it will be when the victory is shaped.

Those of us who have had our doubts and fears of what Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt may intend found that for this day, at least, our worries had vanished. None of us thought of Mr. Churchill as the leader of the Tory Party, even though we may be driven to think of him as that tomorrow. We thought of him as a great Englishman who, with faults as high as the Himalayas, has never lost hope, has always given us encouragement, has never ceased to fortify our resolution. We thought of President Roosevelt as a great and generous ally. Tomorrow, perhaps, we may ask that he define the contours of the New Deal which made him the colleague of Jefferson and Lincoln.

Finally we did not forget that, at long last, the men in the Kremlin can see that our word is as good as our bond. We are on the road to freedom. There will be no turning back.

Public Opinion and the Next President

BY JEROME S. BRUNER

ERY soon we shall be treated to the spectacle of two political conventions. On the platforms of the convention halls and in the lobbies and hotel rooms there will be much talk of what the American people want in the way of a President and an Administration from 1944 to 1948. If our politicians have the same capacity for innocent enjoyment as in happier years, we can count on the usual malarkey, the usual bromides, and the usual assertions about the demands of John Citizen. Neither side will have a monopoly on political shenanigans—especially since the election promises to be closer than it has been in sixteen years.

Before the nominating conventions are here, it might be healthy for liberals to sit back and try to figure out just what this election means to the American people, what their votes will be for and what against. The voters are going to get more excited between now and November, but their basic convictions about what they want from the next Administration are not going to change much. Whether it be Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Dewey, or Mr. Darkhorse who occupies the White House next year, the conduct of the Presidency is going to be judged according to standards which have been long a-growing.

No single public-opinion poll can reveal the "convictions" of the electorate. But taking all the polls together and sifting out the trends, we can learn a good deal about people's views. What have the polls been saying?*

First, we know that the American people right now are not making final commitments, are not lining up politically with the same degree of fervor as in 1940 or 1936. And that isn't because the nominees have not yet been chosen. The fact of the matter is that America is awaiting the outcome of impending events—chiefly the invasion of Europe—before it makes up its mind finally on issues or candidates.

The voters will elect a man to do a job. If the war seems safely over in November, it will be a post-war job. If the sledding is still tough, the job will be to win the war. If we are thinking of a war President, we shall vote one way. If it is a post-war President we are electing, the vote will go another way. Obviously, a change is already setting in. If it is checked, if events prove that there is plenty of war ahead, Roosevelt can win hand-somely. He is the tried war President. Other matters can wait. But if the public has the feeling in November that the Presidency is primarily a post-war job, President Roosevelt will have the hardest fight of his life, assuming the Republicans nominate a strong candidate—and Dewey seems to answer that description.

Does all this add up to the conclusion that the American people are just waiting till the end of the war to reverse the trend of domestic and international progress? Not at all. One mistake to which the left is prone is to assume that a vote for Roosevelt is always a vote for progress. Let us consider what the majority of the country apparently wants—Republicans as well as Democrats—and see whether the victory of a Republican is to be interpreted as a mandate for reaction.

By far the most important post-war problem in the eyes of the people is the matter of jobs and personal security. That doesn't mean that we shall go back on our international commitments. It merely means-as it has always meant—that a job buys the family groceries. Americans want to work in private industry, to be sure; a tamed and fair capitalist system seems to them still the best bet. But they don't want Business with a capital B to be allowed to run rampant. A majority of the voters believe that the government should and can guarantee full employment. The free-enterprise advertisements have not dulled the memory of the Great Depression. Whoever sits in the White House, Democrat or Republican, is committed by our recent history to use the force of the government to prevent or alleviate a depression.

Why, then, does Mr. Roosevelt face such a tough fight in November? Is he not the symbol of our battle against depression? Has he not fought hard and long for the rights of the worker and the little fellow? To the downtrodden the President is still a champion. But not so many feel downtrodden these days. And besides, the glamour of a champion gets slightly tarnished over the years. A man's mistakes always seem to dog him more persistently than his wise deeds. Outweighing gratitude for the President's achievements in combating the depression is a growing weariness with the alleged ineptness of his Administration.

The country is tired of squabbles and the seeming inefficiency of a government which can't make up its mind about what to do on the home front. It dislikes the way strikes have been handled. Americans are not anti-labor; the great majority of them favor unions. But the great majority, thanks largely to the press, also feel that labor is not living up to its "no-strike pledge." And so people want firmer action—or clearer information on the problem. Then there is the bickering with Congress. While the average man simply deplores it, without blaming either side, the voters would certainly welcome a President who got along with Congress. Finally, the confusion in the war agencies is criticized.

The compromises and indecision in man-power and pricecontrol policy have goaded many Americans to the point where they would gladly swap our chaotic liberalism for an orderly conservatism.

But, still, the discontent doesn't add up to reaction.

What else do the voters want? They want an extension of social security. In spite of press comments on the report of the National Resources Planning Board, more than three-quarters of the people were at that time and still are heartily in favor of more comprehensive social insurance. It is significant, however, that in March, 1943, when the report was issued, a majority of voters thought action on it should be postponed till the end of the war. And so even though President Roosevelt gave us our first national social-security law, he may not be the man to extend it. But America now takes social security for granted. There won't be any more disdainful talk about "coddling" the people. The voters know social security for what it is—not charity but good, common-sense thrift.

These facts should answer those prophets of doom who foresee a return to the status quo ante. Social security, full employment, progressive taxation, regulation of harmful business practices—these things are no longer matters of controversy. The new President will be committed to them. If he should abandon his commitments, he would have to look for another job in 1948.

One very practical footnote should be added to this survey of American opinion on domestic issues as it affects the election of a new President. In the past the views of industrial workers have not had the same political weight as those of other groups simply because, as a result of indifference or a change of residence, many workers have failed to register and cast their votes. Now a new and powerful force has come on the scene. The C. I. O. Political Action Committee is concentrating its major effort on getting workers to register, in the fairly well-substantiated belief that they are generally inclined to back the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt in matters of social progress. Early results in the primaries are indicating that the committee's campaign is meeting with success. There is just a chance, however, that the campaign might boomerang if the committee should become identified in the public mind as an unofficial arm of the Administration.

Now let us consider the question of internationalism and whether a vote against Roosevelt means a vote for isolationism. The temper of the American people is internationalist and, barring a fiasco at the "peace conference" in which everybody starts grabbing for his share, is likely to remain internationalist. Isolation has availed us little. Some new form of anti-war insurance is wanted. The polls show that an international organization backed by force is the policy that three-quarters of us are ready to buy. That is President Roosevelt's policy, and Dewey's April speech shows that he, too, is inclined toward it.

But men are not elected President of the United States for their foreign policy. Though foreign policy may be important to the extent that people feel Mr. Roosevelt has had more experience in international affairs, the votes he gets on that appeal will not be decisive in November. An outspoken isolationist probably couldn't be elected President of the United States in 1944. But two shades of internationalism—Dewey's versus Roosevelt's—won't make much of an issue.

Finally, a word about "political cycles" and the 1944 Presidential vote. No man can be President of the United States for twelve years without being forced into unpopular compromises, without stepping on some toes. Figures on the voting cycle collected by Louis Bean and others show that the tide is swinging against the Democrats. The country is getting tired of old faces, old symbols, old controversies. It is not, however, ready to abandon its old ideals. We still want, and believe that the United States should have, jobs, security, and peace through international cooperation.

The next President of the United States will not be a free agent. He can trim and cut a bit, but he can't go against the wishes of the electorate. If he is a politician, he won't try to. And as Charlie Michelson says, there never has been a President who wasn't a politician.

PIETRO NENNI

HE liberation of Rome has also liberated Pietro Nenni, for many years the secretary of the Italian Socialist Party and later splendid fighter in the Italian emigration. Nenni went to Spain at the outbreak of the civil war and became one of the most stalwart defenders of the Spanish Republican cause. He journeyed from one European capital to another, begging his Socialist comrades, whether members of governments like Léon Blum or members of the opposition like Clement Attlee, for arms, support, funds. He tried to convince them that in Spain the last chance to escape disgrace and defeat was being offered to the Socialist parties of Europe. But while attempting to inject life into the Second International, he realized that it was dead, and he resigned with a magnificent letter to its Executive Committee. When war broke out in Europe, he devoted his energies to the organization of Free Italian legion in Paris, but his efforts were sabotaged by the traitors and appeasers at the Quai d'Orsay. He remained in France even after the German occupation, refusing to use a visa obtained for him to permit his entry into the United States. As soon as Mussolini fell, he returned to northern Italy. where he was active in organizing the resistance against the Germans. The Italian people can rejoice that men like Pietro Nenni, in whom intelligence, courage, and honesty are so admirably blended, are now free among them.

In the Wind

THERE ARE IVORY TOWERS in the financial district too. Consider what the New York Journal of Commerce had to say about the refusal of 13,500 Brewster workers to be dismissed without warning: "The Brewster Aeronautical Corporation's employees are making the amazing contention that workers in war plants have a vested interest in their jobs. . . . At the close of hostilities, when wholesale shutdowns of war plants will become necessary, these demands could be satisfied only by heavy government spending programs to provide such jobs, making impossible a balancing of the budget and a return to a sound free-enterprise system."

SEE?—This one is from a recent speech by Eugene Holman, vice-president of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, before the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York: "It is fortunate that the large companies exist so that the small operator can get a fair return on his business by selling it."

HUBERT C. REYNOLDS, Negro teacher in Miami, Florida, and president of the Dade County Colored Teachers' Association, whose suit seeking equal pay for Negro teachers was denied in the Miami federal court last March, has been notified that he will not be reappointed next term.

MEMBERS OF THE ABINGTON, Pennsylvania, public library will not be able to borrow "Strange Fruit." The man who buys books for the library has decided that "Colcorton" has a similar theme and is less controversial. As a matter of fact, the themes of the two books are not at all similar.

THE CONNECTICUT ECONOMIC COUNCIL, a most conservative organization, admits frankly in its current Fortnightly Letter that it will be impossible to maintain full production after the war if we return to the system of "free enterprise." It wants to return nevertheless.

FESTUNG EUROPA: The curfew at Maldeghem, East Flanders, is strictly enforced. Fire alarms at night are sounded on a bugle, and then the firemen rush to the Town Hall, where they are given permits to be on the streets. . . . . A Belgian boy was ordered to report to the Nazi labor service. His uncle, an employee of the local Zoo, suggested a way out: a large chimpanzee had just died, and the boy could wear its skin and take its place until the Gestapo gave up its search for him. The boy jumped at the chance. One day his mother came to the Zoo to visit him, and he showed her some of the tricks he had learned. But alas, while performing on a trapeze he lost his grip and went flying over the bars into a cage of lions. His mother screamed. One of the lions went over to her and said, "Contain yourself, madam. Do you want to give us all away?"

Wallace in Chungking

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

TT ITH the invasion of Europe being vigorously pushed, the Axis will undoubtedly try to gain a victory somewhere else to bolster the morale of its bewildered peoples. There is but one weak spot today in the United Nations line, one spot where an enemy attack could be successful. That is in China. Everything indicates that this attack will be made, and that General Tojo's threat of an audacious offensive which will cut China in two and knock it out of the war is not mere propaganda designed to counteract the effect of bad news from France. If Japan succeeds, as now seems inevitable, in capturing Changsha and opening China's one north-south railway, its position in China will be nearly impregnable. The Allies will be obliged to make a thousand-mile drive to recapture the railroad before they can use China as a base for direct air or land operations against Japan.

How real the danger is that China will be lost to the Allies and what the Allies can do to prevent it are two subjects I have been discussing during the past few days with several experts who have recently returned from China. The particular position these men occupy makes it impossible to give their names here, but I can assure my readers that they are exceptionally well-acquainted with the Chinese situation and are men of truly independent judgment. I present now the substance of our conversations, with special regard to the problems of political war.

The first question on which I found them in absolute agreement was the dominating influence of Chiang Kaishek. In spite of all the internal strife in China, about which so much has been written in the United States, Chiang is still the leader of his nation. Any policy which the Allies may adopt, any step they may take, to help China must be based on recognition of the fact that he is the only figure around whom unity is possible. This fact is of the utmost importance, for it is in the measure that unity can be achieved that China can resist the terrific blows which Japan has in store for it.

Geography cannot be changed. The only route to China open at present is over the Himalayas, and because it is the only route its usefulness is limited. Even the opening of the Burma Road would only relieve not solve the problem of supplies. But if it is not in the power of China or the Allies to change geography, it is necessary to change the internal political situation and end the dissension which for years has impeded China's gallant military effort. China can and must so act that its two heroic armies shall no longer be played one against the other but be used fully against the Japanese. Several hundred thousand of the best government troops, instead of being at the front fighting the Japanese, are kept on the border of the Communist-held territory, as though the war were not between China and Japan but between the Communists and the Kuomintang.

The reasons for this division are grave and old. It is natural that the Communists should not forget the massacre at Shanghai, when Chiang Kai-shek's soldiers killed thousands of Communists, even though they were still officially part of the Kuomintang. Nor can they forget their sufferings on the "long march," when they were forced to move from Kuomintang territory in the southwest and to travel 6,000 miles on foot, with all their belongings, fighting most of the way. They lost half their men on that march.

On the other hand, some of the men surrounding Chiang, particularly various generals, cannot easily overcome their deep-rooted distrust of the men in command of the Communist army. Marshal Yen, in an interview published in the New York Times on June 5, declared that communism must be wiped out. But he added, "In order to make it impossible for Communists to appeal to the masses, we must improve our administration."

Strong prejudices underlie the estrangement. But the reasons for getting together are more immediate and more potent. The two parties realize that a Japanese victory would destroy them both. The Communists and the Kuomintang need each other. The Communists, whose army consists of several hundred thousand men, and who have perhaps an equal number of poorly clad, undernourished guerrilla troops, know very well that their primary aim-to defeat Japan-cannot be accomplished unless they combine forces with the central government. The Kuomintang, on its part, realizes that the Communist army, though badly armed and inferior in numbers, is located in the north, the strategic sector, and that the influence of the Communists is spreading, probably even into Shantung. Their increasing prestige derives from the fact that although they have received no support in the form of arms or money in the last few years, they have continued to fight Japan with great local success. Moreover, they have understood the advantage of organizing the population into effective guerrilla bands.

The ideological gulf between the Communists and

Three Cheers for the Underground!

The first week of the invasion has justified our faith in the underground. No one could ever have doubted its devotion to the cause of freedom. Its courage has never faltered through three terrible years of waiting. Long before the advent of D-Day Fortress Europe had become a battlefield where old and young, men and women, workers and bourgeoisie had learned to kill and to die. All that is known. But to persons who have been unwilling to admit the importance of political war and of the great changes that have taken place in the mood of the peoples of Europe it must have been a revelation to see the underground match beroism with discipline, restraining impatience, leashing enthusiasm, adhering strictly to the directions of General Eisenhower. The underground has given the measure of its political maturity and of its high sense of responsibility. It has proved that it is the foundation on which the democratic Europe of tomorrow must be built.

the Kuomintang is not so wide as to prevent an understanding. The Communists have not set up socialism on the land, have not collectivized the farms. On the contrary, they have left the land in the hands of the peasants as private property. They have not displaced landlords, but have directed their chief effort to establishing reasonable taxes and to preventing money-lenders from bleeding the peasants white, as they did before. They have organized small cooperatives to supply the principal needs of the people, but they have not imposed a policy of collectivization. They have brought self-government to the villages, opened schools for the people, eliminated corruption; and they share all the hardships of the population.

If the Chinese Communist Party is not so red as may be thought abroad, neither is the Kuomintang so black as its detractors would pretend. The Kuomintang Party today is composed of various social groups—landowners, military leaders, financiers, industrialists. Its ideology has changed with its composition. But it still contains democratic elements—today in a minority—and even the conservative members realize the importance of land reform. A measure of land reform has been obtained by the creation of a state-owned bank, which grants loans to farmers for land improvement and furnishes funds with which to buy marginal land for division among the landless peasants, to develop irrigation, and for settlement schemes, like those, for example, in Yunnan and Sinkiang.

Finally, the Generalissimo has never forgotten what happened to him in 1936, when he was kidnaped, not by a Communist, but by General Chang Hsueh-liang, whom he had sent to crush the Communists. Since then Chiang has gradually come to the conclusion that he cannot defeat Japan if he opposes the Communists but only if he fights with them against the common enemy.

The basis for an understanding is therefore present. But without the friendly intervention of a third party the process of unification may take longer than the interest of the war permits. No foreign power is held in greater esteem in China than the United States. And no man, perhaps, among Americans is more trusted than Vice-President Wallace, who is viewed as a staunch opponent of imperialistic exploitation. When I was in Mexico, I saw how Henry Wallace had won the confidence of the peoples of Latin America. The same belief in the sincerity of his convictions prevails in China, according to the authorities with whom I have talked.

Chiang Kai-shek has repeatedly stated that the period of "tutelage" is coming to an end, and that a democratic constitution, under which the Kuomintang Party will not enjoy special privileges, will be introduced after the war. If Vice-President Wallace could convince his Chinese friends that such a step, taken now instead of after the war, would be the best proof of the central government's willingness to cooperate, the end of the crisis would be assured. As a practical measure, Chiang Kaishek could set up a kind of council which would be specially intrusted with the conduct of the war, and give the Communists representation on it.

The Chinese press has indicated what great hopes the country places in Wallace's visit. But even the best-intentioned negotiator cannot achieve his ends if he arrives with empty hands. China needs, immediately, something more than sympathy, good-will, and beautiful words. If geographic factors and the lack of a large port prevent the Allies from sending a great quantity of war materials into China, at least a few thousand planes can be provided. Their receipt would tremendously increase the army's ability to resist the invader and to an equal degree raise the morale of the Chinese people.

On the other subject of our conversations—how great the danger is that Japan will actually knock China out of the war-I did not find the same unanimity of opinion. Some of the people with whom I spoke were frankly pessimistic. Not that they feared that China could be seduced by Japanese diplomacy to make a separate peace. There has been a good deal of talk lately about the "Cliveden set" of Chungking, and appeasers may in fact be active there, as they are in almost every Allied capital, but they can never force a capitulation. No one, not even Chiang Kai-shek, whose prestige is so great, could survive politically a deal with Tokyo. Nor would appeasement serve the interests of big business within the Kuomintang. A peace with Japan would deprive them of the money they expect to make out of the industrialization of their country.

I found disagreement only upon the question of whether the Chinese will be able to carry out their resolve to fight Japan to the bitter end. The final impression I got is that it is not only possible but certain that they will continue to fight even if Japan seizes the Hongkong-Canton railroad, the only important line at the service of the Chinese today. The loss of this railroad would be a terrible blow of course. It would mean that Japan could "bring Manchuria to Canton"; that is to say, it could bring the war resources of Manchuriacoal, steel, iron—to the battle front for a smashing, allout drive into China. "It could mean," some of my informants told me, "the loss of Chungking. We might even witness the creation of a Chinese 'government in exile' somewhere in a remote part of China; but even then it would not mean that China would give up."

Much will depend upon the ability of the United States and its distinguished emissary to unify the resistance and furnish substantial aid. The fate of China must be of the greatest concern to all the United Nations. Events in China in the coming years will influence the history of the world. I was deeply impressed to hear China praised with so much enthusiasm by people who have no concern with the artificialities of propaganda. "A human society living in material poverty but in mental freedom"—so one of my friends characterized China. If China had complete confidence in the sincerity of the great powers, if it did not have the demoralizing example of India at its very door, it would think less of increasing its military strength after the war and more of serving the peace.

Henry Wallace in Chungking will face one of the great tests of his career. If he can help China to emerge from its present crisis, he will have rendered an invaluable service to the United Nations,

Behind the Enemy Line

BY AKGUS

THE employment of foreign workers in Germany is organized in great detail. To enumerate the many classes into which they are divided and to define them precisely would require considerable research. But a new group, which has very recently come to notice, deserves some comment. An announcement published in Hanover in the middle of May refers to them as "foreign workers in brown uniforms" and states that a large number of them "were recently set to work in the heavily damaged industrial districts and along the North Sea coast." They are organized in battalions according to nationality. The battalion in Hanover, for instance, is composed entirely of Frenchmen; there are also Belgian, Dutch, Polish, and Czech formations. Each battalion contains a certain number of men of every trade—bricklayers, carpenters, glaziers, painters, unskilled laborers. The public's attention is called to the fact that they are "volunteers" and that the Supreme Army Command has made special rules for them. "The foreign workers in brown uniform are not subject to the rules which apply, for example, to prisoners of war. They may move about freely in the town, use the trains and buses, and visit the restaurants and movies."

The impression is strong that these brown-uniformed battalions, which are treated in a measure as an aristocracy among the "foreign workers," are genuine volunteers. And although it is not explicitly stated, it appears that they are an "élite" slave group formed as a counterweight to the ordinary foreign slaves, just as the famous Elite Guard of the S. S. was created as a counterweight to the riffraff guard of the S. A.

The Deutsches Aerzteblatt, organ of German physicians, published the following order at the beginning of May:

All kinds of medical equipment must be saved from possible destruction by air raids. Therefore physicians are herewith ordered to carry into the nearest air-raid cellar every evening all pieces that can be moved, such as microscopes, surgical instruments, syringes, sterilizing apparatus, and typewriters.

The order also declared that no physician may leave his home town without permission. Physicians whose offices are destroyed must apply for instructions as to where to move. All physicians must wear arm bands, and all doctor's offices must be marked with a Red Cross flag.

The average German suffers more from the scarcity of soap than from the lack of anything else. Not only is the ration so small that it amounts to practically nothing, but what soap is obtainable is of unbelievably poor quality—the fat has been largely replaced by clay. All the more depressing, therefore, was a laconic decree made public by the official news agency on May 26:

The Reich Commissioner for the chemical industry has ordered that in the future shoe polish, colored or colorless, can be bought only on surrender of the current soap coupon.

Breslau is a city of half a million people. Situated in the most eastern part of the Reich, it is one of the few cities which have so far been spared an air raid. On May 18, however, the following public notice appeared:

The Breslau telephone exchanges are overburdened. During the busiest hours they cannot meet the demands on them. From now on, therefore, a certain number of telephones will be discontinued, in turn, during the busy hours of the day. Subscribers cannot be informed in advance of the days and hours of the interruption.

FAITH, REASON, AND CIVILIZATION: AN ESSAY IN HISTORICAL ANALYSIS. By Harold J. Laski. The Viking Press. $2.50.

ASKI, in this new volume, which is certainly not his best, is looking for a scheme of values adequate for the moral reorientation of modern man. The book is disappointing, primarily, because it lacks consistency. The basic assumption upon which the modern system of values is to rest is variously defined.

In one of the early chapters Laski defines it this way: "If we are to build anew a scheme of values in society . . . we must begin with the assumption that the sole method open to mankind by which we can improve his lot is an increasing mastery of nature." Somewhat later in the volume he insists that "the only working assumption upon which we can proceed . . . is that where the drive of some given society is to make its material circumstances favorable to mass wellbeing, the inner life of its citizens will be shaped toward the realization of happiness." The two propositions are not necessarily incompatible, but the relation between the two is not well thought out. Furthermore, both propositions are questionable. The idea that the mastery of nature is the basis of the good life is not new. It is as old as the eighteenth century at least; and a civilization which is destroying itself by the same technical instruments by which it mastered nature will certainly be forced to question the adequacy of such a basic assumption. The second proposition is even more dubious; it leaves out of account the fact that totalitarian societies might well be devoted to "mass well-being" and yet destroy all the richer values of existence. Mr. Laski thinks his goal would satisfy all but the few "who find fulfilment in that pursuit of the unworldly end which may drive them to poverty or exile or prison or even death."

On the whole, those who are driven to prison or death in a society are not consciously seeking an unworldly end but are devoted to some high end of life which a given society finds incompatible with its particular order. We would, I think, all grant that a society ought to seek the well-being of all its members, but Mr. Laski has given little thought to the tension which must exist between the individual and the community, even if the community achieved ten times as much social justice as we now have.

These preliminary definitions of basic assumptions do not, however, suggest Laski's real thesis, which is that Russia has given us the fundamental reorientation of values. He defines this reorientation variously. On one occasion he calls it the "revision of that attitude which from the dawn of recorded history has looked with contempt upon manual labor." In another case he declares that the "Russian idea is nothing so much as a revival of the faith of the men of Ionia in the sixth century before Christ, that men are saved by the chance of that abundance which comes from the mastery over nature." Again, he thinks that "the central idea of the Russian Revolution [is] that we must as a society plan production for community consumption." Sometimes he goes so far as to assert that "wherever the idea of the Russian Revolution has taken hold it has bred in its exponents a yearning for spiritual salvation; and it is out of that yearning that there is at least the hope that we may recover a philosophy of values."

These various assertions about the Russian Revolution may not all be incompatible, but Laski does not give us a clear statement of the hierarchy of values which he finds in the revolution. He is really contending for the adequacy of a Marxist interpretation of life, history, and our social possibilities. Why he associates this so closely with Russia is difficult to understand, particularly since he is no fellow-traveler spiritually bound to Russia. Russia is of course the great exemplar in history of an accomplished proletarian revolution; politically we shall undoubtedly learn much from it. But we shall be better able to learn our lesson if we do not make Russia the idol of the cause of social revolution.

When confronted with some of the aberrations of Russian politics, Laski responds with curious apologies. He compares the cruelties of the Russian regime with the rudeness of early Christians. He explains the dictatorship as follows: "No one who analyzes the Soviet experiment honestly can look upon its acceptance of a proletarian dictatorship as a permanent feature of the effort they are making. For, first of all, the sheer anarchy of the situation they inherited required a strong government, etc." Of course. No intelligent person would accuse communism of desiring a permanent dictatorship. Communism believes-and, I am convinced, honestly believes-in the provisional character of the dictatorship and in the ultimate "withering away of the state." The important question concerns not the intention of Communist idealists but the validity of the idea that the necessity of political coercion, of the state in short, will disappear on the other side of the revolution. Every fact of history refutes this utopian hope.

Marxism is undoubtedly a perennial resource for the solution of the political and social problems of our era. But it can be the better guide in social politics if we discount its effort to become a total and adequate world view, solving all problems of human existence. It is precisely because the relativities of Russian politics have refuted some of the extravagant overtones of Marxist religious hopes that we must look at Russia critically as well as sympathetically if we are to salvage what is true in Marxist economic thought from what is false in its utopianism.

Nothing but confusion can result from the lyrical identification of Russia with the ideal scheme of values which Mr. Laski would project. He declares, for instance, that "Russian heroism in the two years of struggle against Hitlerism has convinced the common man all over the world that there was a magic in the Revolution of 1917 somehow adaptable to his own concerns." There is a great deal of heroism in this war. The Russian heroism has been superb.

But if we are to judge the quality of a faith by the courage with which it is defended what are we to say of the faith which young Nazis are now defending with desperate courage?

Image of America

AMERICA. By Stephen Vincent Benét, Farrar and Rinehart. $1.50

HERE might have been every reason to look with suspicion on a tract written by even a good poet in response to an invitation by an official body to produce a short volume that would explain America, its history and its essence, to foreigners. But the OWI is not the Gestapo, and the late Stephen Vincent Benét was both a poet and an honest man. It needed a poet to compress the great miscellaneous prose facts of our history into their poetic incidence and meaning. It needed a candid intelligence to communicate our actual and felt virtues as a people without blinking our failures and our follies. The job could scarcely have been better done. It is so well done that one feels its excellence can better be appreciated by Americans themselves, for whom these succinct pages will be weighted with meaning and emotions they cannot have for foreigners who may be hearing of Antietam for the first time. To them the founding of the colonies, the building of the West, the mechanical mastery of a continent, the growth and occasional backslidings of freedom as these took place on American soil-all these things as here recounted must seem more like a catalogue than a succession of poetic images of the greatest themes in our national consciousness.

Perhaps, however, even foreigners, uninformed as to the facts of our history would feel the imaginative force of them as they appear in this brief volume. They would, one suspects, feel at once the passionate love of the writer for his country and his twin sense of its ideals and its lapses.

"It is," writes the author of this 112-page summary, "a queer country in some ways. It is young among the countries of the world. But its system of government has endured for over a century and a half, flexible to changed conditions but without material change. The thirty-second President of the United States now sits in the White House; the seventy-eighth Congress of the United States is in session. They were put there by the will of the people. . . . Always, since the first, American people have had a chance to use their own judgment, make their own mistakes, correct them and go ahead. And the people does not mean a class or a caste or a specially appointed set of men."

This is the statement of an ideal rather than of an unvarnished fact, and Mr. Benét knew it and in his book says so. He does not deny the corruptions that have occurred in our politics, the exploitations in the robber-baron era, the materialism in our lives. He also points out that no one has said this sort of thing more strongly than certain great American writers, like Emerson, say, or Thoreau.

But there is an ideal not defeated by its failures, an aspiration that first began to be embodied at Plymouth Rock and Jamestown. The record is one toward freedom and toward equality. Its chapters are the Revolution, the Constitution, the exploring and settling of the West, the deepening quarrel between the two economies of North and South, and the moral issues that their differences eventually focused. There is the chapter of the Civil War, and the image, almost, of a people's moral mission in Abraham Lincoln. There is the age of industrial expansion, "the age of bronze and lead." There is the "America we know." There were the New Freedom and the New Deal. There is the war for freedom and the struggle for it at home. There is a passionately focused image of what we have been, what we are, what, as a people, we hope to be. To read this little book is to know America better because a rapt but intelligent poet has used his eyes.

Two Books, Three Saints

THE FAGLE AND THE DOVE. By V. Sackville-West. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

CARMELITE AND POET: A FRAMED PORTRAIT OF ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS. By Robert Sencourt. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Linto outer darkness. Sanctity is not an attribute in which the twentieth century, by and large, has any great interest. "In our time," Yeats quotes Thomas Mann as saying, "the destiny of man presents its meaning in political terms." Politicians, economists, warriors, athletes, actors, whether fill or legitimate, even artists—to these we pay some attention. Not to saints; why should we? By us, if I may quote the conversation of an irreverent friend, by us gives no God.

Still, there are signs and portents which might indicate that skepticism is reaching that vanishing point wherein it is skeptical even of itself. We have, for instance, the rather vulgar remark that there are no atheists in fox holes. We have so devout a materialist as Earl Browder breaking down enough to admit, if somewhat archly, that history has many secrets locked in her bosom. We have Somerset Maugham writing plays and stories about saints and mystics as they seem to him. We have the editors of the Partisan Review professing a little worry over a religious trend among the literati. We have Professor Einstein acknowledging that one of the most beautiful things man can experience is the mysterious, and that it is, in fact, the true source of all science and all art. All this might not be so regressive as some people seem to think; it might be the beginning, rather than the failure, of nerve. Where has rationalism got us, halfway, or nearly, through the twentieth century? Hatred, evil, destruction, death assail us from every side; perhaps we need to start developing superrational faculties if we expect to progress toward goodness, life, creation, and love. In other words, toward God.

For those who are interested, as well as those who ought to be, here are three saints in two books, unhappily both I little dry, I little outside their subjects, though the Sackville-West prose is considerably better than the Sencourt. To begin with the saint nearest us in time, we have Thérèse of Lisieux, 1873-97. No sinner, I suppose, should sneer at any saint—though we should also bear in mind that even saints can be sinners at times. But what the life of Thérèse leads us to feel, a little uneasily, is that perhaps, as with governments, societies get the kind of saints they deserve, and if this is the best the French bourgeoisie of the nineteenth century could produce, no wonder France fell, God help us all, and so on. Writing about her, Miss Sackville-West seems, at times, a little embarrassed, more than willing to change the subject and talk about someone more lively and more interesting. She admits that the little way of the little flower can be very exasperating to many temperaments -"treacly dulcification" is not a sympathetic phrase. The ardors of the saints fulfil themselves in many ways; those of Thérèse led her to become not so much the passionate bride of Christ-though her language on this point is at times a little shocking-as His little Ladies' Home Journal housewife. Let those who think this an easy road to sainthood try it sometime; they will not covet her praise.

Teresa of Avila, the eagle of the Sackville-West title, was a character more fiery and rugged. This high-born Spanish lady (1515-1582) was also more than a little high-handed; "a contumacious gadabout female," her enemies called her. She danced before her nuns in the evening to the music of the castanets, hated the Andalusians—it is a consolation, perhaps ignoble, to realize that saints can hate—and walked by the banks of the river telling God the reason He had so few friends was because He treated them so badly. "Deliver me from sullen saints," she said; she did not seem to object to angry ones. She had the reformer's austerity and zeal and, what is rare in combination with those qualities, "Whoever honestly strives for enlightenment and justice should read this book without delay." -ALBERT EINSTEIN A Factual Analysis of Anti-Semitism. by Sigmund Livingston "Here is a calm, reasonable refutation of the evidence usually marshalled against the Jews. The cure for anti-Semitism is chiefly the responsibility of non-Jews. The man who instinctively detests race prejudice can find here the factual basis for his position. The man of bigotry, if he can be induced to read it, will have a hard time thereafter even to state his views. It is a much-needed book." - RAYMOND GRAM SWING.

the wholesome, practical, cleansing common sense that enabled her to take on politicians and intriguers and mop them up. There was something in her of the bounce and vigor that we see, in our time, in a Dorothy Thompson or an Eleanor Roosevelt; she also had what they have not—the mystic vision and a superior literary style.

St. John of the Cross, whom Mr. Sencourt mentions throughout his book as Fray Juan, was a younger contemporary of Teresa of Avila, whose friendship he enjoyed and whose tribulations he shared. Like her a reformer and organizer, he had something less than her knack in rough-andtumble battles with the politicians, and they got him in the end, though their victories were not overwhelming. Mr. Sencourt's book about him is loving, long, and labored: there is a good deal of repetition in it, and it is most interesting when the saint is quoted directly. The quotations, moreover, are generous, and several of the poems are given in the original Spanish. In interpreting the spiritual ideas of St. John of the Cross Mr. Sencourt is painstaking and elaborate: what is needed, beyond what is there, is the sudden flash of illumination, the quick and radiant intuitive phrase; but that is not Mr. Sencourt's way. He mentions so much that it is a little curious, in the chapter entitled What English Literature Explains, to find no mention of T. S. Eliot and the Four Quartets, which are so much beholden to the writings of Fray Juan.

Chesterton's Life of St. Francis, Shaw's drama of St. Joan-either of these books conveys more of the sense of the poetry of saintliness than do the two books at hand. Nevertheless, in spite of their rather prosy ways, both books do more than convey interesting and curious information. They help to correct our notions about the mystic character, our prejudice to the effect that mystics and saints are rapt and moony creatures, unable to distinguish between their elbow and third base. There was nothing the matter with the brains of St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross, nothing the matter with their eyes and ears, their nerves and hearts. If they learned to transcend the use of their senses, their senses were unusually bright to begin with. Diana Trilling, writing recently in The Nation apropos Mr. Maugham's latest interests, observes that "mysticism is bound to be inviting to the person who is afraid of the deep emotions." This, I hope, refers to those who admire mystics from a safe distance, not to the mystics themselves. If their testimony can be believed, the emotions of both St. John of the Cross and St. Teresa were literally terrific. They had intellect and intuition; they were gay, they were vital; they knew the glory of creation and the creator; and of which of us can this much be said? ROLFE HUMPHRIES stance, he branded as wrong the common belief that history is a true mirror of sense and reason, of progress and justice. If there is a relation of cause and effect in the process of history, he declared, this causality usually differs from that other causality which is a post-festum product of the historian's own wishful thinking.

Now, in the midst of our war against the revolutionaries of nihilism, an exiled Central European scholar, in a book of seven hundred pages, challenges the tenets of Lessing without mentioning his name. Kahler visualizes history as the development of homo sapiens, as orderly and consistent evolution toward the Kingdom of Man. If this were not so, history would be "nothing but an incoherent mass of rising and falling powers, growing and dying people and individuals." He warns: "Eternity has no history, and neither has chaos."

The novelty of his approach to history lies in his attempt to write it as the spiritual biography of man, not of menjust as anthropologists have traced man's development from the primate's rough structure to the complicated physique of this generation. He reinterprets history by retelling it from the age of primitive man to the outbreak of the Second World War. Contrary to certain modern philosophers, he believes in the unity of mankind and hence in the unity of history. According to this view, before the rise of the Jewish-Christian concept of man as the image of God, the creator of the universe, there existed no history, but merely a number of chronicles of different tribes. History thus begins with the development of the Jewish-Christian idea of the common origin of all men from the same ancestor and of a common God-given destiny of all men, to use Kahler's terminology, · concept rejected by neo-paganism. The fact that in the era preceding the Renaissance the subject matter of history was not man as a secular entity but the development of the human soul, and that from the Renaissance on, when man discarded religion, the subject matter of history became human reason, or the economic condition of man, does not invalidate the general trend. Only in the pessimistic nineteenth century, when the philosophers decided that man had become neither better nor happier, was the idea of the unity and community of mankind and with it the idea of human development shaken. Kahler strongly resents thinkers like Nietzsche or Spengler who "denied the fundamental values of our civilization: love and brotherhood among men," especially Spengler, who "split human history into isolated cultures rising senselessly and fading away into nothingness."

For Kahler history is "not an accidental conglomerate of events, not a meaningless come-and-go of forces, not the deliberate accomplishment of individuals, but a connected whole, the unified, consistent development of an organic being that is man." And we must defend the view that history is a unity moving, despite all setbacks, in the direction of community and fraternity against fascist nihilism, which recognizes no bonds except those the fascists produce or break, as it pleases them.

This well-written and thoughtful book, which guides the reader through all the "isms" of the past two thousand years, ends with a warning that without human community and fraternity we are lost, and that "man needs goodness as he needs his daily bread."

ALFRED WERNER

Peace Plan

BEYOND VICTORY. By Jerry Voorhis. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

REPRESENTATIVE VOORHIS has patterned his book upon the very sensible idea that the way to discuss lasting peace is first to consider the causes of war in modern society and then to propose steps necessary to get rid of those causes.

In presenting the causes of war he has given most of his attention to the climate of opinion which makes war possible. He achieves a reasonable and on the whole persuasive balance between the economic factors that generate the conditions under which war is likely to occur and the exploitation of those factors by propaganda that whips men up into a mood to fight. His early chapter headings outline the argument: Great Lies; Fear; Religion of the State; Possessions; Young Men Without Hope.

But he returns constantly to the economic maladjustments which must exist before a modern nation is likely to go to war, and the essence of his peace plan is to raise the standard of living throughout the world. His proposals are liberal rather than radical, and most of them should appeal to any reasonable reader who is not too deeply afraid of change. Yet these proposals, modest as they seem against the magnitude and urgency of the problem, provide a discouraging measure of the distance the United States must travel in political thinking before we are ready for full participation in a world order where there can be no more war.

The most striking suggestion, and the most fundamental, is that each nation should guarantee to maintain for its people purchasing power sufficient to absorb all the goods and services it can produce or receive by exchange with other nations. Something of the kind was approved in vague and general terms at the recent conference of the International Labor Office, but Mr. Voorhis makes it specific with an interesting and frankly unorthodox proposal for the handling of money and credit.

In brief, he urges that the United States government, instead of paying interest for money borrowed from banks, should itself create each year enough additional money or credit to pay for that year's increase in gross national product. Almost as an afterthought he suggests that the Treasury might retire money or credit from circulation to avoid inflation in any year when there was a decrease in gross national product, but obviously he believes that if his proposal were adopted, the lean years would be few and far between.

As concomitants of this idea, the author recommends drastic changes in the Federal Reserve System, permanent abolition of the gold standard, and a compulsory balancing of international trade in terms of goods rather than money. He also devotes considerable attention to the evils of monopoly and cartel arrangements.

The principal weakness of the book is that it covers much too much ground to explore thoroughly all the ideas it presents or to answer many of the fairly obvious objections which might be raised to them. Many more subjects are discussed than can even be mentioned in a review of this length.

Nevertheless, Mr. Voorhis has at least partially supplied the need for a critique of world problems which is uninfluenced by preconceived ideas, either conservative or radical. His approach has a fresh quality which comes from willingness to look at the world we live in without fear of any change that might bring improvement, and also without commitment to any plan of change based upon a rigid political or economic formula.

If it were possible to hope that "Beyond Victory" will be widely read and its proposals considered without prejudice by the general public and political and business leaders, the prospects for great social gains immediately following this war would seem much brighter than they do at present. But the author himself recognizes, for example, that monopolies and cartels have been strengthened rather than weakened by the war, and the optimism of his final chapter seems to rest more upon faith than conviction.

At the same time the book contains the basis for I fighting liberal program which is bound to make headway sooner or later, because the economic potentialities of the twentieth century have so clearly outgrown existing institutions. Perhaps more people are ready to recognize that fact than one would guess from the present political campaign. It is certainly encouraging to find a member of Congress who is willing to state it publicly in an election year.

HEN Roger Touhy and his six colleagues broke out of Stateville Penitentiary they managed it, so far as I can make out by the old papers, without outside help. The greenness fewness, and carelessness of the guards -their personnel changed and diminished by the war-seem to have been responsible. In "Roger Touly, Gangster" the mob does get outside help, and it is not indicated that the guards were green, few, or careless. Again, in fact the fugitives knocked over an armored car for $20,000 for a hideout nest egg. In the film no such holdup occurs, and I kept wondering what they were living on. In fact they got draft cards, through a series of holdups, which roughly fitted their descriptions. In the film they get draft cards by holdups, but nothing is done about the effort of the men, which must have been awful, comic, and cinematically promising, to single out victims who bore them a reasonable resemblance. In fact they comforted themselves abundantly with women and liquor. In the film there are no women around their hideouts and most of them stay sober as judges. In fact they lived in such excruciating claustrophobia, plus agoraphobia, plus mutual mistrust, plus general terror and anxiety, that as time wore on they became all but incapable of swallowing solid food; they seem to have lived largely on whiskey and coffee. In the film you get only the mildest idea of this physical and psychic misery. Ten to fifteen years ago the makers of such a film would have had a natural, vigorous feeling for the value of such detail. They would never have allowed it to be by-passed-or, if this or that in it seemed libelous or censorable, they would have invented some tougher equivalent which was not. "Touhy" has some fairly exciting and intelligent things in it, and anyone who loves the best of the old gangster films will get some nostalgic pleasure out of it; but it is a long way short even of the ordinary ones in immediacy, drive, tension, and imagination.

Seeing the screen version of "The Hairy Ape" I wonder whether it was really such a very good play in the first place. In any case it is hardly worth seeing as it stands here. The obsessed stoker is sincerely played by William Bendix, but Bendix is not a man to inspire the sort of fear or the sort of pity that is needed; and the character, robbed of all biological-political meaning and of the best of his talk, and glossed over with sub-comedy, could inspire neither emotion even if Bendix could. Susan Hayward, as the loathsome girl who makes him trouble, is more interesting. She is of the wrong social wave length to carry this particular role; but there are roles, not yet invented so far as I know, in which she could do a paralyzingly good job on one important kind of vivacious American woman. Who would be left in the audience is harder to imagine. JAMES AGEE

RECORDS

OLUMBIA has managed to produce an impressive list for June. To begin with it has issued a new set (547; $3.50) of Haydn's Symphony No. 103 ("Drumroll"). This is one of the last group of symphonies that Haydn composed for his London visits, and one of the finest of the lot—with the spontaneity and richness of invention, the mischievous surprises, the breathtaking audacities of the Haydn process operating at incandescence. As for the performance, the English companies make mistakes (the Pro Arte Quartet performances of Haydn and Mozart, the Busch Quartet performances of Beethoven), and this is one of them. Heward's performance of the symphony with the Hallé Orchestra may be better than the Golschmann-St. Louis Symphony version that has been available until now; but it is no better than a performance of a first-rate work by considerably less than first-rate musician can be. Heward starts without any feeling for right tempo; and he continues with a fondness for coy retardations. The recorded sound of the performance is good, except that the treble is not strong enough for the bass. And the surfaces of my copy are a little gritty.

Then there is a set (X-241; $2.50) of Debussy's "En blanc et noir," three pieces for two pianos. Constant Lambert includes them among the late works that he ranks with the "Images" for orchestra as the culmination of Debussy's style. He certainly is right about the "Images" as examples of Debussy's fully developed orchestral style: each new hearing of "Rondes de printemps" (which Victor issued a few months ago) leaves me newly overwhelmed by it and newly convinced that it is one of the most wonderful of Debussy's achievements. And Lambert may be right about the two-piano caprices as examples of the fully developed piano style: the style itself is fascinating at once; and further hearing may increase and widen the fascination-though I imagine only for the person with a taste for Debussy's piano music. The performance by Bartlett and Robertson seems good; its recorded sound is lifelike, but unresonant, steely at times, and rattly at others; and the surfaces of my copy are very noisy.

On a single disc (71577-D; $1) are Zerlina's arias Batti, batti and Vedrai, carino from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" -lovely music, beautifully sung by Bidu Sayao with an orchestra conducted by Leinsdorf. And on another (71582-D; $1) is a Sonata in E minor for violin and figured bass by Bach that I don't recall hearing before (it is identified as Peters Series 3, Vol. VII, No. 2), with a highly impressive first movement, but with subsequent movements which I find uninteresting. The violinist of the performance is Busch, whose playing is in every way superb; and Artur Balsam at the piano makes it a fine ensemble performance (though my ear tells me what is hard to believe-that several of Balsam's bass-notes in the opening Allegro are not in time with the violin). The recorded sound of voice and violin on these two single discs is a little brash: but the surfaces of my copies are admirably quiet.

Together with these new releases Columbia features not one but two of its older recordings. One is Franck's Symphony performed by Beecham with the London Philharmonic (Set 479: $5.50); and the work being as inflated in feeling and structure as it is, I like the simplicity and directness of Beecham's statement of it, the refinement of its recorded sound, preferring them to Monteux's more expansive treatment of the music, which is recorded with more expansive gorgeousness of sound in the Victor set (surfaces in my copy are gritty and noisy). The other (Set X-115; $2.50) is part of the delightful Offenbach music used in Massine's ballet "Gaité parisienne," which is performed well enough by the London Philharmonic under Kurtz, and recorded with a brilliance that is made brash and noisy at times by reverberance (surfaces are good).

Answering the question whether the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe was worth seeing, Mr. Denby ended by saying: "And of course no dance-lover will want to miss seeing Danilova, You-to the Men in the Armed Forces skevitch, or Franklin." One goes to the ballet, that is, to see great dancers. True, one goes also to see fine ballets; but even then one goes to see them performed by great dancers. One went to the Ballet Theater, then, to see Markova, only to discover that she was not dancing-which meant that one saw "Les Sylphides," but with Gollner and with Chase dancing the Prelude, or "Romeo and Juliet," but with Kaye's Juliet. Also there were evenings when Markova did appear but was unmistakably in less than her best form-which of course was still quite wonderful. But the last week she gave several memorable performances, of which I saw only onethe last Juliet, in which there were not merely the flashing miracles of movement and motionless pose in space but expressive gesture and attitude that left no doubt that one was watching not only the greatest dancer but the greatest dramatic artist there is to see on the stage today. And the entire company rose to the occasion with an incandescent performance of the work-one in which everything fitted together with timing and placing and emphasis that produced extraordinary clarity and coherence in the progression of movement, and in which this progression seemed to flow out of the similarly clear and coherent progression of the music as it was conducted by Beecham.

No dance-lover, it seems to me, would want to miss seeing Massine in "The Three-Cornered Hat" and "Capriccio espagnol"-for the unique gifts of style and wit that he has as a dancer, and the qualities that he has through long exercise of these gifts: the authority and power of presence and projection that make him a great stage personality. In these two ballets one sees some of his best work not only as a dancer but as a choreographer; and this time I noticed how much they have in common: the marvelous finale of "Capriccio" might be a new and more brilliant climax for "The Three-Cornered Hat." Its brilliance is diminished somewhat nowadays by the dancing of Romanoff in the part that was done first by Eglevsky and later by Lazovsky.

There is no space in which to discuss the other fine performances and ballets; but I can get in my opinion that the dancing of Argentinita and her associates requires a smaller auditorium than the Metropolitan, and that its style does not lend itself to the expressive purposes of a choreographic scenario. That would be my comment on "El Amor bruio." B. H. HAGGIN

A Few Suggestions

Dear Sirs: I have read with the greatest interest the article by J. Alvarez del Vayo entitled Mexico's War-time Boom which appeared in The Nation of May 27. This will be of very real interest to those who genuinely care about being good neighbors with our nearest Latin American neighbor.

As one who shares Mr. del Vayo's views about the importance of maintaining and extending the cordial relationship which has been developed in recent years between our countries, I should like to make the following suggestions based on my own experiences in Mexico and a fairly intimate knowledge of the views of many Americans, particularly men engaged in business enterprises

1. Mexico is the natural playground for the United States. In my judgment the tourist trade could produce for Mexico a revenue of between $100,-000,000 and $200,000,000 annually. It does not produce such a revenue because tourists coming to the country cannot find adequate accommodations or proper food. A tourist who has had experience with dysentery in Mexico is not likely to repeat a "pleasure trip" there, however enchanting the country may be. Certainly it should be possible for the authorities to take the steps which would remedy this situation. It has been done in other countries. It can be done in Mexico.

2. Mexico is a natural replacement market for notions which formerly were manufactured by Japan and Germany. It has failed to become such a replacement market owing primarily, I believe, to the lack of uniformity in manufacture. By this I mean that an American client may place an order for notions based on a sample submitted; the finished product, however, very often is so far afield that it becomes embarrassing to the purchaser. This, too, is matter which with a little application may be adjusted to the benefit of Mexican industry and the American market,

3. There is another matter which is delicate but which ought to be faced frankly. If there is to be confidence in our Mexican neighbor, then it is absolutely indispensable that the present financial corruption prevalent in the country should be eliminated. As long as the current situation exists, the distrust which it engenders will act as a very strong deterring factor in the development of economic relations. This is a problem which many countries have faced and successfully solved. It is a problem which the Mexican government must face and solve if it wishes to spur the development of the country.

4. In line with this there is a final suggestion, and that is that a mean be found to enforce the income-tax laws of the country. At the present time the statutes remain on the books and the taxes in the pockets of the rich. What is involved here is really even more fundamental than providing the necessary revenue. What is involved is establishing the authority of the government in a fashion which will make for stability at home and confidence abroad.

WILLIAM ROSENBLATT

Poland and Russia

Dear Sirs: It hardly reflects objective liberal journalism, let alone fair play, to publish such an article as that in The Nation of May 20 by Eric Estorick, entitled Polish American Politics. In a typical Stalinist amalgam, this author attempts to smear the coming Buffalo meeting of the Polish American Congress by devoting three-fourths of his article to a stale exposure of Ignacy Matuszewski, the fascist columnist of the New York daily Nowy Swiat, whose views in regard to Russian expansionism happen to coincide with those of Poles of all political factions except Stalinist studziks like Leo Krzycki, Professor Lange, and the phony Union of Polish Patriots.

The influence of M. F. Wegrzynek, publisher of Nowy Swiat, is exaggerated to an extent that will amuse Polish American readers. In reality Wegrzynek and the other Polish publishers are about as chummy as Colonel McCormick and Marshall Field. But on the question of the acceptance of the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop line as a future boundary between Poland and the Soviet Union there can only be one honest Polish opinion. Ten Soviet divisions would have to be permanently garrisoned in Warsaw to protect any Polish government which would accept Stalin's present demands.

Strong criticism can be made against the Polish government in London for not calling for the creation of a free United States of Europe with a socialist economy such as must some day inevitably be established. However, such a free Continental federation of states is the last thing desired by Churchill or Roosevelt, Stalin or the Pope. Nor, in a country where every new "liberal" or "labor" party indorses the capitalist system and its imperialist wars, can it be expected that the petit-bourgeois leaders of Polish American organizations will advocate anything approaching the manifesto of Polish exiles away back in 1836, which won the praise of both Karl Marx and Robert Owen for its forthright avowal of the principles of the French Revolution and its farsighted predictions that "only through the complete abolition of all class privileges and the establishment of real equality for all the people of whatever race or religion" would there be any hope for the future not only of Poland but of Europe itself.

JOHN SWITALSKI

Chicago, May 24

[Reports of the speeches delivered and the resolutions passed at the recent Buffalo convention of the American Polish Congress appear to have fully borne out Mr. Estorick's analysis. According to the report in the New York Times, among the new vice-presidents elected were Maximilian Wegrzynek, publisher of Nowy Swiat, and Frank Januszewski, publisher of the Detroit Polish Daily News.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Unity-but Not for Reaction

Dear Sirs: Thanks are due The Nation for bringing out into the open two facts that have too long been subject to "Hush, hush!" tactics: that Churchill is no man on whom democratic-minded people can pin their faith, and that appeasement of reaction is merely unity for reaction and disruption of all liberal and general efforts.

For over two years the writer has been saying to his friends that Churchill's record, both before and during this war, shows no trace of toleration for democracy, and only admiration for ruthless force, whenever this does not seem to threaten the British Empire. Such comments were often branded as subversive of unity with England in the war. But unity with England ought to mean unity with the liberal elements in a war against fascism, and our uncritical acceptance of Churchill's attitude toward India, toward the De Gaullist forces, toward King George of Greece, and now toward Franco has only dismayed liberal elements in England and strengthened the reactionary elements not only in England but in our own State Department, just as Churchill's commendation of Franco has propped the tottering power of that stupid sadist. We might have strengthened the hands of those Englishmen who know Churchill better than we do, but we chose to appease Churchill and his Tory crowd we have appeased so many reactionary elements in other lands.

The cries for "unity" with reaction are easy to understand when they come from reactionaries. But some of the most insistent "Hush, hush!" talk has come from people who must detest all for which Churchill stands. They apporently cannot understand that unity is of value only when it is with people moving in the same direction we are going, and that unity with anybody else is a drag that may lead to utter defeat. If we win this war and follow Churchill's ideas of the peace to follow, we might just about as well not have fought the war at all. ERIC A. STARBUCK Cambridge, Mass., June 2

The Shape of Things

THE LONG-AWAITED PACIFIC OFFENSIVE HAS begun on a scale that a year ago would have been regarded as utterly fantastic. As a powerful American force launched its attack on the advanced Japanese base at Saipan, B-29 Superfortresses struck at the great steel works at Yawata in the industrial heart of Japan, Liberators carried out bombing attacks of unprecedented fury against Truk, Yap, and Palau, and a carrier-based force hit the Bonin Islands, 650 miles southeast of Tokyo. On the days immediately preceding the Saipan landing, all the more important islands in the Mariana group were subjected to heavy air and sea attacks. and another naval task force bombarded Paramushiru. Shimushu, and Matsua in the Kuriles, 1,000 miles north of the Japanese capital. At the same time other Allied bombers delivered exceptionally heavy blows against Japanese bases at Rabaul and Bougainville and along the New Guinea coast. While some of these coordinated attacks merely represented the necessary softening up for so ambitious an enterprise as a penetration into the heart of the Marianas, the scale of the operations indicated that further and perhaps even more sensational steps may be expected in the immediate future. With Saipan and Biak in our hands, an attack on the Philippines becomes possible, and the promised drive to the China coast may materialize before the end of 1944.

TWO WEEKS AFTER INVASION THE AMERICAN contribution to the UNRRA is still to be appropriated by Congress. Our share has been set at $800,000,000, of which $450,000,000 is to be an outright grant and the remainder in the form of lend-lease credit. Both items have already been approved by the Senate, but the House has voted only the first. Unless it now concurs in the Senate action, the appropriation bill may be delayed still longer by wranglings in conference. Yet with the invasion progressing there is urgent need for the UNRRA to buy stocks of food and clothing and make other preparations. The task facing it is already formidable; it will certainly be enlarged by wholesale destruction during the final phases of the Battle of Europe. Nor is this fact to be gainsaid because certain correspondents have described Normandy as a "land of plenty." It is easy to believe that local supplies of food in the neighborhood of our beachheads are ample for the population that remains there, but this provides no clue to general conditions in France. Normandy is the Wisconsin of France, producing large surpluses of butter, cheese, meat, and other farm products for export. With its communications with the rest of the country smashed, a local backing up of supplies is only to be expected. Moreover, there is a temporary glut of meat owing to the slaughter of livestock by shells and bombs. This in turn suggests that even Normandy may be short of food in the near future. And while, as a Reuter correspondent reports, a few country-houses may have full wardrobes, the inhabitants of towns like Caen, which the Germans are defending house by house, are faced with the total loss of their homes and possessions. They are in dire need of the assistance of the UNRRA.

ON THE SOIL OF YUGOSLAVIA LIBERATED by the armies of Marshal Tito an accord has been reached between King Peter's exiled government and the National Liberation Committee. The representative sent out by the London government was the liberal Dr. Ivan Subasich, whose appointment to ministerial rank some weeks ago coincided with the dropping of Mihailovich from the Cabinet. Although pressure was undoubtedly applied to King Peter by the British government, the greatest credit must go to the unconquered Yugoslav people, who, fighting for the freedom of their country, demanded full recognition of those leaders in whom they have put their trust. The accord will almost certainly bring into closer coincidence the military and political aims of the forces of liberation of Southeastern Europe. An almost forgotten footnote to the larger issue is the inevitable elimination of Constantin Fotich from his post as Yugoslav Ambassador in Washington. As Bogdan Raditsa pointed out in The Nation for January 9, ever since the Mihailovich-Tito rift appeared in the open Fotich has acted frankly as one-man propaganda bureau for Mihailovich and attacked the Partisans as Communist bands. He turned openly anti-British after Churchill's recognition of Tito and worked with the most reactionary Poles in attacking Russia. Fotich represented a fiction which finally fell apart but which for a time fooled our State Department and thus controlled American policy. Now it becomes clear that the strength of Yugoslavia is not in a small nationalist ruling class but in the people.

THE PLAN FOR WORLD ORGANIZATION which has been advanced with the President's blessing closely conforms to the principles suggested several weeks ago by Secretary Hull and Prime Minister Churchill. So far as the plan goes, there is little to which either an isolationist or an ardent believer in collective security can take exception. The crucial question of how the organization's decisions are to be enforced is left largely to the imagination. Mr. Roosevelt's rather extreme language in rejecting "a super-state with its own police force and other paraphernalia of coercive power" strongly suggests, however, that no real effort is being made to create machinery strong enough to cope with disputes between the major powers. It is generally understood that collective military force will be employed against a potential aggressor only when the "Big Four" are in complete agreement. Such a program has the virtue of being based on the realities of existing cooperation among the United Nations. It probably represents the most that can be hoped for in the immediate postwar period. But as a permanent plan for the preservation of peace its weaknesses should be obvious to anyone who lived through the tragic 1930's, when short-range national interests prevented any of the powers from accepting the responsibility of checking aggression.

THE SWEEPING SUCCESS OF THE C. C. F. IN THE Saskatchewan election leaves no doubt as to the destination of this remarkable Canadian movement. Now, for the first time, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will form the government of an important Canadian province. Tomorrow it will put in its challenge to become the government of Canada, Opposed by one of the most powerful Liberal Party machines in the country, the C. C. F. captured forty-three out of fifty-two seats, allowing the Liberals only five, with four seats still in doubt. The Progressive Conservatives did not take a single seat of the thirty-eight they contested. In popular vote the C. C. F. polled considerably more than the other two parties combined. The outcome of this election is a striking confirmation of the article, Canada Swings Left, by David Lewis in The Nation of June 10, and proves that the agrarian West more than matches the industrial East in popular insistence upon an advanced program of social planning. The new government will be led by the capable forty-year-old T. C. Douglas, since 1935 a member of the Canadian House of Commons. There is perhaps an omen in the fact that the C. C. F. captured the Prince Albert constituency which is represented in the Canadian Parliament by Prime Minister Mackenzie King. American liberals, in congratulating the C. C. F., will find in its magnificent victory inspiration for their own struggle for economic and social progress.

VICE-PRESIDENT WALLACE'S READERS OF challenging new pamphlet, "Our Job in the Pacific," will readily understand why he was chosen for the difficult mission to Chungking. The pamphlet, just published by the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, shows that the Vice-President has an extraordinary grasp of the fundamental forces that are shaping the Asia of tomorrow. He explodes the myth that Asia may become a dangerous competitor-pointing out that industry must continue to play a subordinate role for years to come, and that the primary task of the immediate post-war period must be a substantial increase in agricultural production. He warns us that efforts to push either industrialization or public-health measures too rapidly would intensify Asia's difficulties unless they were accompanied by improvements in agriculture. He then goes on to show how closely the economic problems of the East are intertwined with the colonial problem, and reveals great sympathy for the struggle of all Asiatic peoples for political and economic freedom. Since Asia's greatest economic need in the post-war years will be for large-scale projects for developing agriculture, transportation, and industry, America must think in terms of governmental aid rather than a system of uncontrolled private investments such as has already been repudiated by China.

AN OUTLINE OF A POST-WAR PROGRAM HAS finally been submitted to the Senate by the Economic Policy and Planning Committee headed by Senator George. Although the committee's report is hardly more than a checklist of important items that must be considered in shaping post-war policy, its reactionary outlook is unmistakable. Its proposals for encouraging the creation of jobs by private enterprise consist mostly of admonitions to the government to keep hands off and not change the "rules of the game." It suggests, however, further investigation to find out what changes in corporate taxes should be made "to make ownership and equity investment more attractive," together with a study to discover "how much can be taxed away from the purchasing power of low-income groups." On the constructive side the committee has little to offer. It expects to report later on "home-building programs," but says nothing about urban reconstruction or public housing. Although approving in principle the idea of planning useful post-war public works, it recommends a post-war budget "to eliminate unnecessary expenditures." Not a word is to be found about the need for extending educational facilities or providing better medical care for the American people. Although the report illustrates the folly of expecting a Congressional committee to provide leadership in matters involving a high degree of technical information, its inadequacy must not be allowed to serve as an excuse for inaction.

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S SOLDIER-VOTE RECORD deserves considerably more attention than it has received throughout the country. A survey recently made in four of the key Eastern states—Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York—reveals that under Mr.

Dewey's "simple and workable" plan a much smaller number of service men are being qualified in New York than in the other states. As a result of a house-to-house canvass Pennsylvania expects to send a ballot to every one of its 1,000,000 men and women in service. New Jersey has already qualified 337,000 of its 375,000 service men and women. In Massachusetts it is estimated that at least 50 per cent of those in service will receive state ballots, But in New York, despite an extensive campaign by the C. I. O. to encourage service men to file their applications with the War Ballot Commission, only about 65,000 out of a prospective 1,000,000 voters have qualified. In New York City, where the larger part of the applications have been received, the Board of Elections is so shorthanded that it has been unable to process all applications that have come in. In spite of the difficulties of voting on the New York ballot, Mr. Dewey has consistently refused to accept the federal ballot for overseas soldiers, although the Republican governors of neighboring New Jersey, Massachusetts, and Vermont-who are not Presidential candidateshave agreed to count the federal ballots, Governor Dewey's stiff-necked rejection of any of the many proposals for facilitating service voting in New York can only be explained logically by the assumption that he expects little support from those who are risking their lives for their country. And if he persists in his present course, he will doubtless be proved right.

CREDIT GOES TO CHARLES M. LAFOLLETTE, liberal Representative from Indiana, for his vigorous stand against any tie-up between the Indiana Republican Party and remnants of the Ku Klux Klan, once a powerful factor in state politics. In demanding the resignation of Robert M. Lyons, former state treasurer of the Klan, from his post of national committeeman, LaFollette said that he was "opposed to the domination of the Republican Party by anyone who has made a profit out of peddling racial and religious intolerance." Popular protest backed LaFollette, and Lyons resigned. Something more added to the good record of an excellent Congressman.

WE WELCOME CHARLES G. BOLTE AS REGULAR contributor on military affairs. Beginning July 1, his critical reviews of special aspects of the military situation will appear frequently. Nation readers will recall his excellent article on General Montgomery in the issue of June 17. Mr. Bolté enlisted in the British army some months before the United States entered the war, served with the King's Royal Rifle Corps in the North African campaign, and was wounded at El Alamein. A student of military science, he has been serving for the past ten months on the military desk of the OWI.

Who Is Out of Step?

N JUNE 14 General Charles de Gaulle returned to French shores to receive a rapturous ovation from the conservative Normans. Earlier the same day, the A. P. had sent out a highly tendentious account of the French leader's cancelation of the orders of several hundred French officers scheduled to accompany the invasion. This report was dated not from General Eisenhower's headquarters but from Washington, and it was ascribed to high military officials in that city.

Dispatches from London soon proved the story incomplete and inaccurate: the mission had been planned as part of a civil and military agreement between the French Provisional Government and General Eisenhower—an agreement which the French, at least, had believed would surely precede invasion. But when D-Day came without any provision for civil administration in France by the French, De Gaulle decided that he could not allow the employment of French officers who would have no responsibility to his government. He was willing to lend interpreters and liaison officers, but if the AMG was going to rule the liberated areas it could not expect to do so under a false cloak of French authority.

Unhappily the explanation of his not unreasonable stand cannot obliterate the damage done by the original story. "De Gaulle refuses to cooperate" does not make a pretty headline, and now the General is being called "untrustworthy" and accused of disloyalty to the Allies. In the same way his refusal to indorse the "invasion francs" which the Allied command is issuing is being held against him: he is, it is alleged, making difficulties by instilling distrust of this money among the French people. But how can he authorize this currency when his authority as head of the French Provisional Government is not recognized? We cannot have it both ways. We cannot expect at one and the same time to disparage De Gaulle's leadership and to obtain full value from it.

The aid which our invasion forces are receiving from the French underground groups, the vast majority of which are closely linked to the Algiers government, has been praised by General Eisenhower. In a special communiqué issued June 17 he declared that in the past two weeks "the army of the French forces of the interior has increased both in size and in the scope of its activities." Sabotage of communications, he said, effectively coordinated with Allied operations, has considerably delayed the movement of German reserves. In other places the maquis are fighting openly. This is risky work undertaken by poorly armed men who, if captured, must expect to be shot. Can we afford to dampen their enthusiasm by slighting their acknowledged leader and leaving our plans for France open to misinterpretation?

There is only one way out of the present mess, as almost everyone but Mr. Roosevelt now seems to realize -recognition of the French Provisional Government and its assignment to the task of civil administration in the liberated areas. Four of the governments in exile have expressed their feelings on the matter by granting such recognition. The British press seems almost unanimous on the question. Pleading for indulgence of the House of Commons, which was pressing him for a definite statement on the situation, Mr. Churchill said it was necessary to consider the United States and its relations with the French committee and suggested that any discussion would merely "emphasize any differences which may exist." Could he have said any more plainly that his hands were tied by Washington? General Eisenhower himself, it has frequently been asserted, is anxious to come to terms with De Gaulle but cannot exceed his instructions from the Commander-in-Chief, E. C. Wilson, our representative at Algiers, is said to have resigned because he was thwarted in his attempts to reach an understanding with the French. Is, then, everyone out of step except Mr. Roosevelt?

Invasion—First Round

THE first three crises of the Allied landing in Normandy have been met and passed successfully. As this is written, the Cotentin Peninsula has been cut off, the deep-water port of Cherbourg is within the Allied grasp, and the fourth crisis—the enemy's strategic counter-attack—has still not developed. When it has been successfully met, we shall know that the Allied team is in Western Europe to stay.

The first crisis, the actual landing and the breaching of the Atlantic Wall, was passed with a good deal less difficulty than the Allied commanders had apparently expected. The scare talk about blood baths has proved unfounded, as so much of the scare talk in this war has previously proved: casualties so far announced are certainly not what many of us feared from this most difficult of all military operations.

The second crisis was passed quickly when the beach-heads were consolidated into a single eighty-mile foot-hold and the enemy's local forces were defeated. In the face of terrible weather and determined opposition this was a signal achievement; and it was recognized as such by the German radio, which began to talk about the "decisive battle" of Europe being fought west of the Rhine—a damaging admission.

The third crisis was successfully passed last week when the enemy's tactical reserves were repulsed. Counterattacks were violent and widespread all the way from Troarn on the extreme left flank to Montebourg on the extreme right flank. But when this phase developed, it again was in no such strength as had been anticipated, in that no really decisive and carefully mounted offensive was made; and the pattern of these counter-attacks revealed two very serious errors on the enemy's part bad intelligence and bad handling of the available force.

First, the enemy mistook the main line of the Allied drive, apparently thinking it was aimed through Caen on the left. Actually Caen proved the pivot of a great wheeling movement through the Cerisy Forest in the center and the base of the Cotentin Peninsula on the right; Caen was merely a holding action. The Germans then had to whistle up reserves from Brittany to make a stand on the west coast of the peninsula, too late.

Second, the error in intelligence was compounded when the enemy tried to hold us all along the perimeter of our foothold, which was and is steadily expanding. Elements of four panzer divisions were thrown into action between Caen and Villers-Bocage. Thus the German armor, which alone could have broken through to the sea and split our position in two, was committed piecemeal and rendered incapable of striking a decisive blow. Once committed, it could not be withdrawn and reformed for a concentrated attack because the enemy lacked sufficient infantry to hold ground and cover the armored preparation.

Thus the enemy lost his first and best chance to throw the Allies into the sea—actually lost it by default. Tactically, this phase is very revealing: it seems to show that Rommel's over-impetuosity is again serving the Allied cause as it did in Africa. Strategically, it reveals the fear of the Germans that Eisenhower had not yet thrown his real punch; so that they were unwilling to rush too many troops to Normandy lest another landing elsewhere find them uncovered.

By the time this appears in print the strategic counterattack will probably have started. The great Allied success in weathering the first three crises of the landing gives solid ground for confidence in the outcome of this fourth critical phase in Europe's beginning liberation.

Insurance Is Commerce

THE Supreme Court's decision in the fire-insurance case has been grossly oversimplified and badly misconstrued not only by the press but by so distinguished a legal historian as Charles Warren. The decision permitting the Department of Justice to proceed against a fire-insurance combination under the anti-trust laws was rendered four to three, Roberts and Reed abstaining. Mr. Warren in an article for the New York Times has learnedly demonstrated that this is the first time the court has departed from a rule established in 1834 under Marshall, a rule that the court will not decide a constitutional case except by majority vote. It is true that the decision was concurred in by only four justices, but a closer reading shows that on the constitutional point involved—whether Congress has power to regulate insurance under the commerce clause—the seven participating justices were unanimous. The split came not on a constitutional question, the right of Congress to regulate, but on a question of statutory interpretation, the question of whether the Sherman Act applies to insurance companies.

The dissenters in the fire-insurance case were the Chief Justice and Justices Frankfurter and Jackson. The press would not have gone so far astray if it had noted that on the very same day that the fire-insurance decision was handed down, the entire court, speaking through Frankfurter, with only Roberts abstaining, held that an insurance company was sufficiently in interstate commerce to be subject to the authority of the National Labor Relations Board. The combination alleged by the Department of Justice in the fire-insurance case constitutes a far heavier obstruction to interstate commerce than any conceivable labor dispute in an insurance-company office. The minority in the fire-insurance case did not question the power of Congress to regulate insurance and was as prepared as the majority to reverse the seventy-fiveyear-old decision in Paul v. Virginia that the issuance of an insurance policy "is not a transaction of commerce." The minority's dissent was based on the view (1) that Congress did not intend the anti-trust laws to cover insurance; (2) that their extension to insurance companies is a question of policy, to be decided by legislation, not by judicial decision; and (3) that as a practical matter it is unwise to upset state regulation of insurance at a time when the only available federal weapon is the blunderbuss of the Sherman Act. In our opinion, the first argument is factually correct, the second theoretically sound, the third rather dubious.

The necessarily broad dicta of the earlier Supreme Court decisions now haunting us were handed down in an effort to prevent the insurance companies from escaping state regulation. Forty years ago insurance companies were proposing federal regulation as a means of evading supervision by the states, and liberals like Brandeis were fighting it. But today state regulation has become extraordinarily weak and frequently corrupt. Given the more flexible and realistic conception of federal-state relations which obtains in the courts, the solution is both to strengthen state regulation and to supplement it with federal, as we do in dealing with public utilities. Though the anti-trust laws are hardly suited to the complex job of regulating insurance companies, they may be a valuable weapon in combating such extortionate combinations as the one alleged in this case of the Southeastern Underwriters' Association. Some may deplore the Black majority decision as judicial legislation, but it will be a blow to the powerful and unscrupulous insurance lobby in Washington and provide a basis for correcting some long-standing abuses.

Mr. Willkie's Challenge

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

ITH a young candidate in prospect, the Republicans as they converge on Chicago are advertising themselves as the party of youth. Rejoicing at the signs of disintegration and decay in the Democratic ranks, they suggest that an old and weary Administration will prove a pushover for a G. O. P. that is as spry as ever it was.

Mr. Willkie does not agree. In the course of a series of articles outlining his ideas for the Republican 1944 platform he indicates his belief that the G. O. P., far from showing signs of renewed youth, is in fact exhibiting the symptoms of second childhood. It is, he implies, deaf to the call of today and blind to the vision of tomorrow. And dipping into the discarded black bag of Dr. New Deal (retired), he has produced a prescription for Republican rejuvenation.

I am aware that Mr. Willkie would probably protest this description of his medicine. He might point to his many differences with the Administration in regard to foreign policy, to his criticisms of Mr. Roosevelt's administrative techniques, to his own emphasis on the role of private enterprise. It is, of course, a little difficult to define the New Deal with any exactitude. Born in a crisis and developed as a series of improvisations, it was a trend in thinking, an approach to social and political problems, rather than a set program. Whatever its enemies may say, it was never hostile to free enterprise as such. But attempting to enlarge the freedom of the many, it inevitably curtailed some of the freedoms of the few. By protecting the right of workers to combine and contract, it shrank the former liberty of employers to set their own labor standards; by regulating the security exchanges and providing that stockholders be given more information about their own property, it hampered the enterprise of speculators and promoters. Consequently, those whose freedom had been limited attacked the New Deal as the enemy of private business and labeled it as collectivist or even Communist. Mr. Willkie, to judge by these articles, has adopted the New Deal approach. He also is seeking to enlarge the boundaries and opportunities of the many, and by so doing he endangers vested interests. He is thus inviting the same kind of attack from the same quarters that the New Dealers have experienced. I hope he will not let it discourage him.

I can best illustrate the kind of "dangerous thinking" that Mr. Willkie has been indulging in by referring to his proposals for social security and labor. Demolishing the popular conservative argument that security undermines initiative, he declares that we need both. Since a free economy involves risks, these risks, he asserts, should be spread by means of a social-security system that provides universal protection against old age, illness, and unemployment. Criticizing the present law as inequitable and unduly complicated, and going far beyond the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, he advocates complete medical care, uniform federalized unemployment insurance, and, without using the expression, family allowances. It is not hard to imagine how orthodox Republicans will gag when asked to drink this "Beveridge."

Nor are they likely to swallow cheerfully a proposal that the Republican platform be furnished with a labor plank including an improved wage-and-hour law and repeal of the Smith-Connally Act. Mr. Willkie deplores the fact that the G. O. P. has allowed itself "to be put on the spot on the labor question" by its failure to appreciate that freedom in today's industrial society must include some control by the workers of the circumstances which dictate their means of livelihood. He urges that our post-war economy be built on a high wage level and favors an annual wage for seasonal trades—a proposal greeted with horror in industrial circles when recently put forward by the Steel Workers' Union.

Mr. Willkie's plans for combating post-war depression are less impressive. He recognizes that the demand for full employment cannot be dodged, and cannot be answered "by merely passing resolutions in favor of 'free enterprise." But his suggestion that a "cooperative mechanism" in which industry, labor, and government should participate could prove an important factor in ironing out trade cycles must be catalogued under the heading of wishful thinking, unless he is able and willing to reduce it to more concrete terms. Nor do I find very convincing his assertion that the "basic answer to our problems of a demobilization economy . . . lies in our great productive ability." No one denies that, but we have learned by bitter experience that capacity to produce and production are not the same thing. Again, while Mr. Willkie properly denounces monopoly as "the Trojan horse of the free-enterprise system," he leaves us without any definite proposals for disarming the animal. It is only fair, however, to recognize in his very forthright program for tariff reduction one exceedingly effective method of attacking monopolistic prices.

In this instance Mr. Willkie is calling upon the Republicans to turn their backs on a cherished tradition. In his article on the Negro question—perhaps the best in the series—he reminds them of their historical mission in the abolition of slavery. It is strange, he says, that the party should yield year after year to the states'-rights argument against federal protection of Negro rights, and he urges the Chicago convention to "commit itself unequivocally to federal anti-poll-tax and anti-lynching statutes." I shall be surprised if his fellow-Republicans heed this plea. They are interested in retaining states' rights as a weapon against federal economic controls; they are anxious to continue their covert alliance with the reactionary Southern Democrats: these considerations are likely to outweigh their need of the Northern Negro vote, which they hope to capture in any case by Democratic default.

The G. O. P. also seems certain to muff the opportunity which Mr. Willkie dangles before it of seizing the internationalist banner half relinquished by Mr. Roosevelt. The Administration, he charges, "has made many protestations of noble aims in foreign policy, but when the moment came to act on them" it has resorted to measures of expediency which have "produced little but dislike, distrust, and loss of prestige for the United States." He therefore calls upon the Republicans to frame "a foreign policy that will recapture America's lost leadership" and to restate our war aims as a fight for freedom, not only at home, but everywhere in the world. Unfortunately, the tendency of most Republicans has been to attack Mr. Roosevelt's international ideals while supporting, openly or tacitly, his practical expedients. Still more than the President, they are haunted by fear of democracy and horror of social revolution. Liberal critics of the Administration's foreign policy can expect no help from this source.

I do not think that Mr. Willkie expects the G. O. P. to swallow this or any other of his proffered aids to rejuvenation. He knows too well that, as a party, it has no desire to recapture its lost youth and go forward to a new age; all it wants is to return to a dead past, What, then, is his purpose in drawing up this progressive program which, released through the major news agencies, has reached millions of citizens? One motive, perhaps, is a desire to provide a yardstick by which the shortcomings of the Chicago platform can be measured. But beyond that, I suspect, Mr. Willkie is anticipating a fluid political situation after the war. The reactionaries have tight control of the Republican machine; the New Deal grip on the Democratic Party is weakening. Yet inside and outside both organizations there is a huge body of progressive opinion that will seek increasingly to express itself. Mr. Willkie's program could be a bid for the leadership of that politically homeless multitude.

Beachheads for Victory

BY ALFRED VAGTS

Popular support for the defense measures adopted before this and the First World War was based chiefly on a widespread anxiety about invasion, especially invasion from overseas. "Well-engineered scares," one of the highest British defense officials once confessed, won funds for armies and navies, for coastal fortifications, and for other assurances against a hostile landing. Most clearly affected were the great maritime powers with their isolationism—literally, islandism. The Monroe Doctrine as a defense policy was deeply rooted in the idea that America, or the Americas, was an island continent menaced by invasion from Europe or Asia. As late as 1898 Bostonians could believe that a Spanish Armada was on its way to attack them.

Yet though the fear of invasion was acute, and often artificially heightened, there was remarkably slight interest in or preparation for amphibious warfare on the part of military or naval men in any country. None of the great military or naval theorists did justice to the subject. Clausewitz had little more to say about landings than that they might be useful diversions and were mostle apt to succeed when they took place in a province hostile to its own government. Jomini hardly rose above that, perhaps because he was impressed by Napoleon's two great failures—Egypt and Boulogne. Mahan, among the naval writers, was even more crassly one-sided in outlook. About Wolfe at Quebec he said merely that "all his operations were based upon the fleet. . . . The landing which led to the decisive action was made directly from the ships. . . . In a word, the possession of Canada depended upon sea power"—not, apparently, upon soldiers, too, and quite a number of other things. "Decisive" might easily be a word for service egotism. It was the exceptionally good cooperation of the two services that was actually "decisive" at Quebec.

Until the present war teachers of tactics in the various national forces remained almost as little concerned with the potentialities of amphibious undertakings as the theoreticians. For the British the failure at the Dardanelles was the ghastly result. The teachers of the pre-1914 German army, von der Goltz and Balck, considered landings by one great power on another's coast a "chimera" rather than "a serious danger." Later, General von Seeckt, carrying World War experiences over into German post-war schemes, wrote that "America cannot be attacked as far as we are concerned, and until technology has produced new weapons, neither can England. She is more vulnerable in her limbs than in her heart. For that reason we must clear the road to Asia." To a certain extent the bound-by-precedent warnings of such authorities against landings remained influential with the Germans; possibly they kept Hitler from making an attempt against the Festung England when it was weakest, immediately after the fall of its bastion, France.

During the First World War there were, aside from Gallipoli, only two minor amphibious enterprises—the German capture of the Baltic islands at the entrance to the Gulf of Riga in October, 1917, and the blocking of Zeebrugge by the British in April, 1918. Gallipoli was the concept of civilian war-makers who were unable to break down the narrow specialized attitudes of the services and achieve the tactical cooperation necessary to an amphibious undertaking of such scope; the failure of the attempt acted as a new deterrent to military thinking in that direction.

Total war abrogated the old prohibition, subconscious or not, against amphibious, or three-element, war. Despite German hopes that a decision could be won on land, by tanks at a blitz pace, or at sea by submarines, or, as the adherents of Douhet thought, by air power alone, war could no longer be kept departmentalized. It was not by sea power, by land power, or by air power, but by power of all kinds brought from air and sea to land, that decision could be forced. The Axis powers began to try landings even before 1939, their admirals admitting that "combined operations represent the most effective form of naval warfare" (Admiral Dr. Groos, "Seekriegslehren"). Italy's Abyssinian expedition was an experiment in large-scale military transportation. Troops were landed in Spain from the air. In China the Japanese used for the first time the modern type of landing craft -motor-driven steel barges with unloading facilities.

After the disasters of Dunkirk and Greece, when England evacuated the European continent, and after Pearl Harbor, which forced a withdrawal of the United States from Asia, the problem of landing on hostile shores could no longer be shirked by the political, military, and naval leaders of the United Nations. In a large measure both Germany and Japan were beyond the reach of blockade, and amphibious warfare was thus forced on the Allies (it was also required by the second-front expectations of Soviet Russia). Since they had little or no practical or theoretical preparation for this kind of warfare, the British and Americans had to experiment, using points along the German-controlled Atlantic coast, the Pacific islands, North Africa, Sicily, and Italy as testing grounds and laboratories for the coming D-Day.

The Japanese were perhaps the first to bring army-navy-air cooperation to some degree of perfection, as if to disprove the all too common assumption in the West that conflicts between the rival services are inevitable. Organizational cooperation had been won by the Germans in the second half of the 1930's when they set up unified over-all command, not merely a constitutional commander-in-chief but a Supreme Command for the three component parts of the armed forces, an Oberkommando der Wehrmacht, with an overarching staff for planning, intelligence work, inter-service communications, war economy, public relations, and so on. Such arrangements are imperative not only for the attacker but for the defendant in amphibious warfare; they were wanting at Pearl Harbor on the receiving end,

The essentially new development in modern amphibious warfare is the supplementary landing, made subsequent to the original invasion and in the enemy's rear. Once a front has been established, with one or more wings resting on the sea, the invader, as in Sicily, or the defender, like Russia in the Far North and the Caspian region, may land troops behind the enemy's line. It is now evident that air power has robbed the coastline of importance by being able to fly over it and deposit parachute or glider-borne troops and material at crucial points. This has revolutionized coastal defenses, which was formerly assured by works unprotected in the rear, and has also given immediate depth to fighting on the seashore. While from the nature of their task many of the air-borne troops must be considered "forlorn hopes," one man behind a line of coastal strong points may be worth ten in front of them.

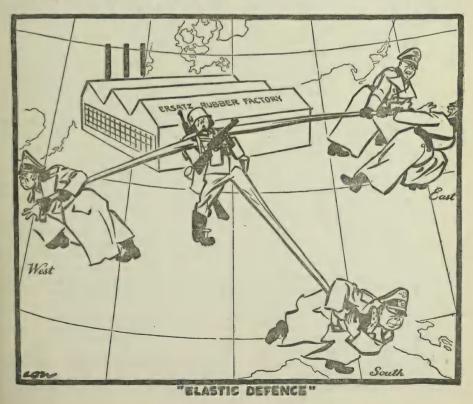

The strategic advantages in landing operations may be with the attacker, but most of the tactical ones are with the defender. These tactical advantages have to be overcome by the most minute planning against contingencies and the gathering of immense quantities of data on such features as tides, depth of coastal waters, weather, and terrain. Of all operations none are more dependent on weather. Luckily, in the present invasion of France the Allies have the advantage of being closer to the regions from which come the "highs" and "lows" that make the weather.

The difficulty of the operation makes it necessary for the invader to employ superior troops, specially equipped and trained and familiar with all the three elements in which they may have to fight or through which they are brought to battle. The troops should also be instructed about the conditions and perhaps the language in the strange country they are invading. As their artillery support may for some time have to come from naval guns or from bombers, communications with which may be hard to maintain, they must be prepared for great independence of action. Thus in its latest developments amphibious warfare calls for extreme specialization in various techniques, such as loading and convoying, for great independence and mobility on the part of individual units, and for the utmost elaboration in timetables and planning, all to be combined under small staffs, with perfect unity of command. Above all, it calls for secrecy.

Every operation of modern war demands surprise statement which seems less of a truism if we compare modern combat conditions with the openly drawn-up battle arrays of earlier times—but none more than a landing. Of the three forms of landings, the raid, the diversion, and the full-scale invasion, the first depends most upon surprise: it is a hit-and-run affair using tactics similar to those of infantry shock troops, based on minute reconnaissance, and undertaken with small forces to test the enemy's strength, as at Dieppe, or to destroy special installations like the U-boat lairs at St. Nazaire. The diversion is intended to mislead the enemy or tie down his forces and is less dependent on surprise. The full-scale invasion must be prepared to force its way into enemy territory despite resistance; both sea and air supremacy are required for its initial advance and the maintenance of its communications. Only in operations of a restricted nature will supremacy in a single element, air or sea, suffice: in the German conquest of Crete the air-borne invasion was successful while the water-borne attempt was repulsed with heavy losses by the British fleet, which still preserved a remnant of supremacy. In the giant invasion the attacker races with time to land both men and material before the enemy has gathered his strength for the counter-attack.

Contrary to common belief, the first landing is not usually the most difficult thing. The history of invasion by sea shows that at this stage of the enterprise many more landings have been successful than otherwise; in the majority of cases surprise did operate at least at first. Not the reaching of the coast is hard but the maintenance and widening out of the beachhead and its use for victory. The so-called Atlantic Wall of the Germans is of course not an unbroken fortified line co-extensive with the coastline, but blocks of fortifications designed to dominate likely invasion areas by flanking fire and to prevent the use of desirable permanent harbor installations. Whether it will prove a worth-while investment of steel, cement, and human strength for the Germans the next few weeks will show. Psychologically the Atlantic Wall is a high-tension line loaded with the highest possible expectations through that old charging station Goebbels's Propaganda Ministry. A break in its continuity may have enormous consequences. Unlike the slow loss of terrain in trench warfare, the landing of a hostile force in Festung Europa will have repercussions on the German people recalling older popular fears of water-borne invasion. The collapse of Italy when its mere periphery was penetrated shows how powerful is the impact of invasion on the mass imagination-shows that a military reality can be based on an ancient nightmare.

Nye—a Lost Leader

BY HOWARD G. WILLIAMS

HEN Gerald P. Nye, senior Senator from North Dakota, goes before the voters in the Republican primary on June 27, he will meet the opposition of the very forces that elected him in each of his previous campaigns. In former days Nye was a progressive leader in a progressive state. The subtle changes that carried him from association with men like Norris and Wagner to the side of Vandenberg and Fish spell one of the tragedies of American politics.

North Dakota has a great progressive record. Shortly after the last war the Non-Partisan League captured control of the Republican Party, elected the governor and a majority of the legislature, and launched a program of reform. It set up a state bank in which all municipal, county, and state funds are deposited; with these resources it buys its own bonds, saving millions of dollars in interest charges. It organized a state insurance plan; during the depression a loan of $1,000,000 from this fund paid teachers' salaries—at a time when the unpaid teachers of Chicago were storming the office of Charles G. Dawes. The state operates a grain elevator and a flour mill, whose prices encourage operators to keep their own prices within reason. All this has paid well.

It was the Non-Partisan League that first sponsored Gerald P. Nye and that elected him to the Senate in 1926. Time after time it has rallied to his support. Now it is against him. During recent years the League has grown more conservative, and many of its younger farmer members have turned from it to the Farmers' Union and the cooperative movement. But whatever their political and economic divergences, all three groups are now united in their opposition to Nye and in their support of Usher L. Burdick, one of the state's two Representatives.

It is the reactionary, not the liberal, camp that is split in this election. While the main contest is between Nye and Burdick, two other candidates will get some votes. A. C. Townley, one of the founders of the Non-Partisan League, can count on the support of a few old-timers who cling to him out of personal loyalty, but his vote will not be large. Lynn U. Stambaugh, a Fargo attorney and a former national commander of the American Legion, has a good record on international matters but on domestic policies is reactionary and anti-labor. The leaders of the Legion, not the rank and file, are behind him, and he has been receiving substantial aid for an extensive advertising campaign from the business men of Fargo, Grand Forks, and Bismarck. On account of his conservative record, he is likely to steal votes from Nye and not from Burdick. Stambaugh has so far failed to attack Nye's isolationism.

Nye is receiving his main support from the Republican Organizing Committee, the successor to the Independent Voters' Association, which for years has operated as the anti-League wing of the Republican Party. The I. V. A, has always put up a slate of its own and when defeated in the primaries has often joined hands with the Democrats in the elections. The present Democratic governor, John Moses, was elected in this way. Besides backing Nye officially for reelection to the Senate—although many of its members are privately supporting Stambaugh—the Republican Organizing Committee is behind Bill Lemke, a "funny money" man who was Father Coughlin's candidate for President in 1936. His presence on the ticket as a candidate for Congress will be of little help to either Nye or Stambaugh.

Usher L. Burdick has the solid backing of the Non-Partisan League, the Farmers' Union, and the cooperatives. The Leader, the League paper, with a circulation of 100,000 in the rural areas, is giving substantial aid, and the League's organizers have been active arranging meetings, forming local committees, and doing house-to-house and store-to-store canvassing. In addition to the support of the League and the farmers' organizations. Burdick has received the indorsement of the North Dakota Federation of Labor, the railroad brotherhoods, and the few local C. I. O. unions. In every city of the state where labor is organized, committees have been formed by union members to help defeat Nye and work for Burdick. There is complete union cooperation—in spite of William Green's indorsement of Nye.

Burdick stands an excellent chance of victory. The people in the state have believed in him from the depression days, when as president of the Farm Holiday Association he fought an effective battle against mortgage foreclosure and brought pressure on the state and federal governments to relieve the plight of the distressed farmers and workers. People say that in those days only the collections of pennies, nickels, and dimes taken up at his organization meetings kept Burdick himself off relief.

He had been prominent in the public life of the state before then. In 1905 he was graduated in law from the University of Minnesota, where he had been an all-American football player. Three years later, at the age of twenty-nine, he was elected speaker of the state House of Representatives—the youngest man to hold the office. Two years later he became lieutenant governor, again the youngest in the state's history. As a rancher and a breeder of pure-bred cattle and horses he became closely identified with the farmers of the state.

In 1931 Burdick was appointed United States District Attorney. In 1933 he was elected to Congress and has been there ever since. His record on domestic issues has been good. Though a Republican, he has supported the reform program of the New Deal. He helped elect Roosevelt in 1940. He was an isolationist before Pearl Harbor, but his views reflected the sentiment of the state as a whole. Immediately after Pearl Harbor he had the courage to declare publicly that he had been wrong and that henceforth he would support the Administration fully in its conduct of the war. He has kept his pledge.

Before the party conventions Nye did some active campaigning in the state. He attacked the book "Under Cover" and spoke darkly of revealing the Eastern forces which were raising huge sums of money to defeat him. But thus far there have been no revelations. He has taken no part in the campaign in recent weeks; in fact, he has been out of the state. His henchmen have been making use of seven-minute recorded speeches of Senators Wheeler, Vandenberg, Shipstead, Bushfield, and Bridges, which are broadcast on local radio programs throughout the state. They call attention to Nye's nine years of service and point out that he might become chairman of the Appropriations Committee if the Republicans obtain a majority in the Senate.

If Burdick wins the Republican nomination he will face Governor Moses as the Democratic candidate. Moses has no opposition in his own party. He is not a New Dealer, but he is not likely to get many Republican votes. North Dakota Republicans are not in the habit of crossing the party line in an election for national office. On the other hand, thousands of former Democrats have registered as Republicans this year and are supporting Burdick in the primary. It is probable that they will carry on their support into the election.

There is just a possibility that if Nye is not too badly beaten in the primary he may run as an independent in the election. This would complicate matters, but it would hardly affect the outcome.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

Levery DAY MAKES it more clearly evident that we do not even yet know the worst about the "peace treaty" that was handed to the Germans to sign. Not one substantial reason has been given for withholding from the public the full text, which, it is stated, reposes safely in the files of the State Department.—June 7, 1919.

THAT THERE IS a measure of revolution behind the Canadian strike situation would now seem to be beyond question. . . . The strike committee in Winnipeg seems to be ruling the town; and since we undoubtedly should have been given the news of any disorders had they occurred the absence of such news would seem to indicate the same element of self-control there which is the characteristic feature of this general strike everywhere.—June 7, 1919.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE through Congress at last; one must rub one's eyes not to believe oneself dreaming.... All honor to the women who won the fight, in whatever camp, of whatever faith.—June 14, 1919.

A YEAR AGO it looked as if, owing to the economic disarrangements of the conflict, the Negroes would profit much by it. . . . But with the return of the colored soldiers from France and the ending of the war boom, the hopeful note has faded out of the news from the South, and it has taken on a sinister aspect. . . The Ku Klux have begun to ride again. On a single morning recently they burned in Putnam County, Georgia, five Negro churches, two schools, and a lodge hall.—June 14, 1919.

WASHINGTON, JUNE 7—The sensation of the week in the capital—namely, the disclosure in the Senate that copies of the peace treaty are in the hands of financial interests in New York—has been at once amusing, discouraging, and alarming. . . How does it happen that such a scandalous accusation can pass unchallenged—that it unquestionably is true? How did financial interests get advance copies of the treaty? . . . How deeply involved are they in the negotiations at Paris? What are they planning to do with the world?—LINCOLN COLCORD, June 14, 1919.

PARIS, MAY 30—There is no new spirit at Paris. The same Big Four who have dominated the situation thus far still dominate it, and the forces upon which they rely for support are still solidly behind them. There is among them no more of generosity or of genuine regard for the people than there has been all along, and the only concessions will be such as may be deemed expedient, not to right essential wrongs, but to prevent too open a manifestation of discontent.—WILLIAM MACDONALD, June 21, 1919.

THE FALL OF ORLANDO marks the beginning of the disappearance of the Big Five who have done such mischief to the world in Paris. The next to go will probably be Clemenceau. . . . No one can even guess whether there will be a revolution, and if so when it will come.—June 28, 1919.

Tory Eyes on Quebec

BY EDMOND TURCOTTE

A GOES Maine, so goes the nation; as goes Quebec, so goes Canada. But in the latter case the barometer has to be read with colored glasses and a logarithmic table. Quebec is not a sign of Canadian trends, nor does it start them; it checks and sometimes guides them by throwing its weight one way or the other.

The French-speaking province is always something of an enigma to the rest of the country. With language differences acting as a barrier to understanding, distorted or erroneous notions circulate widely in English-speaking Canada, and Quebec is both disliked and feared—besides being courted by all parties.

This is election year in the Old Province. All eyes in Canada are turned toward it. What panel of men and what set of ideas will Quebec support? Will it favor the nation-wide Liberal Party and vote for Mackenzie King and "national unity" at Ottawa, and for Adélard Godbout, Liberal reform, and a full war effort at Quebec? Or will it back Maurice Duplessis, the province's antiwar leader who engineered a regrouping of demagogic conservative forces in 1935 under the name of Union Nationale, captured the government in August, 1936, and went down to ignominious defeat in October, 1939? Or can it be that French Canada will turn to the Bloc Populaire Canadien, a parafascist movement launched in October, 1942, along much the same lines as Pétain's Vichy government? Even the Empire Loyalist Tories, led since December, 1942, by John Bracken, a progressive farmer who for twenty years was Prime Minister of Manitoba, seem to think that a profitable alliance can be made in Quebec this year-with the anti-loyalist Union Nationale!

The Bloc Populaire Canadien is a crystallization of various isolationist, anti-British, socially reactionary, profascist, and nationalist trends in French Canada. It is a greater threat to the Union Nationale than to the Liberal Party because it carries the Union Nationale's demagoguery several steps farther. Launched by the Liberal members of the Ottawa House of Commons who opposed their own party on all war issues, the Bloc is led by the austere and single-minded Maxime Raymond. Its rankand-file support in the Old Province is based chiefly on the ever-present and never-successful nationalist sentiment. The Bloc is rent by personal jealousies and factional bickerings over petty dogma. For that reason it is not a great political force, but it is a disturbing factor of considerable importance.

The C. C. F. (Cooperative Commonwealth Federation) has made astounding gains in Ontario and the Western Provinces and has become a dangerous rival of the orthodox parties, but its progress is extremely slow in French Canada because the church still frowns on any hint of socialism. Indeed, if French Canadians are ever headstrong enough to ignore the taboos of their church with regard to socialism, they will as likely as not go to the extreme of traveling with the Communists, now the Labor Progressives. Neither the C. C. F. nor the Labor Progessives are at present a political factor of real weight in Quebec. Socialism is exerting a very subtle influence on French Canadian ideas but not on Quebec practical politics.

Last but not least as a locally important figure is Camillien Houde, stormy petrel of Quebec politics, once provincial leader of the Conservative Party and many times Mayor of Montreal. Houde was interned in July, 1940, under Defense of Canada Regulations because he publicly advised the people against compliance with the war-time National Registration Act. He is a powerful mob orator and has a fanatical following in Montreal working-class quarters, but no one knows which way he will turn when he secures his freedom, which he is likely to do before election day. The deciding factor may be his undying personal feud with Maurice Duplessis.

A natural line of cleavage between progressive and reactionary forces has developed in Quebec as a result of the terrific blow struck at the power trust by Premier Godbout. Legislation to socialize Montreal Light, Heat, and Power Consolidated, a $70,000,000 corporation, was introduced on March 22 in the Legislative Assembly at Quebec. Three weeks later full possession of all the company's properties required for the generation and distribution of gas and electricity, wholesale and retail, was taken by the newly created Quebec Hydroelectric Commission, known as Hydro-Quebec.

From the partisan political angle it is significant that this government move was opposed at every step, in both houses of the legislature, by the Union Nationale and its leader, Maurice Duplessis, although in the critical election years of 1935 and 1936 the overthrow of Premier Taschereau's long-lived Liberal regime had been brought about partly by the inflammatory speeches of Duplessis and his followers against the power trust. Since that time it has been revealed by Duplessis's quondam ally, Edouard Lacroix, a big lumberman with pulp interests in Maine as well as in southern Quebec, that agents of the power trust contributed $150,000 to the Union Nationale's campaign funds at the very time Duplessis was inveighing against Montreal Power. Lacroix's revelation, never openly denied by Duplessis, would explain why the latter, when he became Premier, evaded execution of his campaign promises to destroy the power trust. Instead, he undertook to build in the remote and sparsely inhabited mining district of Temiskaming, in the Far North, a so-called yardstick power plant which operated actually for the exclusive benefit of Noranda Mines, one of the big Canadian mining corporations. Even the Tory Montreal Gazette has described this project as "excessively costly and uneconomic."

The socialization of Montreal Light, Heat, and Power brings to a climax one phase of the people's struggle against what French Canadians call la dictature économique. This struggle began over a century ago against an oligarchy of English colonial administrators and big landholders known as the Family Compact; in our generation it has taken the form of a fight against les trusts, with the power trust the symbol of all the others.

The anti-trust upsurge in French Canada is powerfully reinforced by racial and cultural antagonisms. Big business all over North America speaks English, which gives "economic dictatorship" an added odium in the eyes of the average French Canadian. Even T. D. Bouchard, the first president of Hydro-Quebec and long a tenacious and very practical leader in Quebec's fight against the power trust, based part of his strategy on the people's desire to shake off "foreign "domination, though he has been himself a life-long critic of narrow French Canadian nationalism.

A traditional reform Liberal, Bouchard has long been regarded as a dangerous radical by fellow Quebec Liberals, most of whom succumbed to the dry rot of conservatism after the Laurier era. Undeterred by their defection, the short, burly, and square-shouldered Bouchard, a visible symbol of physical and moral strength, carried on the fight for his reforms, one of which was the creation of a socialized hydroelectric system like that in the neighboring province of Ontario.

Bouchard brought together the various currents of opposition to the power trust, and finally, in 1934, the Liberal Premier of Quebec, aristocratic Alexandre Taschereau, yielding to popular clamor, appointed a commission of three, presided over by French Canada's elder statesman Ernest Lapointe, to make a thorough study of the question. Bouchard appeared before the commission with facts and arguments completely mobilized for the assault. He spoke for eighteen hours in all. And he was so effective that a high official of Montreal Power called him aside during a recess and made this diplomatic approach: "Splendid! Do you know how much a man of your ability would be worth to us? Half a million dollars!" Bouchard smiled incredulously and shook his head. Montreal Power's diplomatic agent tried again: "No? Well, maybe one million dollars." The matter went no farther. Honi soit qui mal y pense!

When Taschereau admitted Bouchard to his Cabinet in 1935, it was too late. The forty-year-old Liberal regime was tottering with the ills of nepotism, sluggishness, and old age. Duplessis and his Union Nationale made reckless accusations of fraud, embezzlement, and outright theft, not a single one of which Duplessis could prove after he became Premier and Attorney General. The Liberal regime, however, had permitted itself the usual carclessness with public funds, and this gave verisimilitude to the cry of "scandal." In the summer of 1936 Maurice Duplessis's motley Union Nationale took power, ridding the crest of a popular wave against les trusts. But in October, 1939, Duplessis in turn had to yield to a revamped Liberal Party under the progressive leadership of Adélard Godbout and T. D. Bouchard.

Godbout, prudent but resolute, slowly built around Montreal Power a subtle ring of Public Service Board inquiries and then suddenly sprang the dramatic announcement that a bill to socialize the corporation would be introduced at the spring session of 1944. An intensive campaign in defense of Montreal Power was immediately launched in the Tory and financial press, over the radio, and in boards of trade. The case was linked with the preservation of free enterprise. Every device of propaganda and press relationship was used. But Godbout was adamant. The act to establish the Quebec Hydroelectric Commission was given royal assent, and on April 15 the new government-created body took possession of Montreal Power and of its subsidiary, Beauharnois Light, Heat, and Power, a large generating development astride the Canada-United States hydroelectric and canalization projects on the St. Lawrence above Montreal.

The immense significance of the power policy inaugurated by the Godbout government is better understood when one knows that Quebec, with countless streams and waterfalls, possesses 50 per cent of Canada's hydroelectric developments, and that Montreal Power was by far the largest power company in Quebec.

In the act creating Hydro-Quebec no amount was set as compensation for the expropriated assets. The act stipulates in essence that the indemnity eventually to be paid shall be the capital sum which the Public Service Board recognizes as legitimate for the fixing of rates. Throughout the debate Montreal Power has maneuvered to be expropriated, if matters came to the worst, at its own estimation of its overcapitalized value—$114,000,000—as against the figure of $70,000,000 arrived at by the Public Service Board.

In a letter of February 7, 1944, to Montreal Power's chief counsel, Aimé Geoffrion, Premier Godbout quoted Justice Douglas of the United States Supreme Court to the effect that "the value of the going enterprise depends on earnings under whatever rates may be anticipated." Spokesmen for Godbout in the Liberal press also made use of the United States Federal Power Commission's order of November 8, 1943, to the Public Service Electric and Gas Company of New Jersey, requiring it to show cause why its plant accounts should not be reduced by $67,893,000.

Premier Godbout's term of office is running out. He will have to call elections before the snow flies. If he were to be judged solely by his policies, he would again sweep the province. His creation of Hydro-Quebec is only one of many progressive accomplishments of, for Quebec, an almost revolutionary character. But the Union Nationale and the Bloc Populaire will make the most of surviving isolationist sentiment in French Canada and of the war fatigue.

When war broke out and Canada entered the struggle at Great Britain's side in September, 1939, Premier Duplessis, whose government was in dire financial straits, made an issue of Canada's participation in a war for "foreign" interests. He was roundly repudiated at the polls, his party obtaining only sixteen out of eighty-six seats. His English-speaking Tory followers in Montreal and elsewhere turned against him in droves. Loyalty to the British tie has always run high among them, and in the fall of 1939 it was a stronger bond than Conservative Party fealty.

Now that the United Nations have passed the crest of military preparation and that victory appears to be only a matter of time, the henchmen of big business, grouped in the Progressive Conservative Party—a December, 1942, label for a very old Tory bottle—are willing to pass over the memory of their hurt British loyalties. They think they can safely risk a new horse trade with the unsavory Duplessis ("he's so un-British, you know!") for the sake of free enterprise and political success in the national field—no political party can hope to gain power in Ottawa, save by a miracle, unless it can rely on at least substantial minority support from Quebec, where about 30 per cent of Canada's population lives.

If a combination of Tories and the Union Nationale should win in Quebec, there would be dark days ahead for Canada during the aftermath of the war, for Quebec looms large in the Canadian picture. At this writing, however, uneasiness is fast receding. The legislature has made a $10,000,000 provision for rural electrification, and Hydro-Quebec has announced general rate reductions of $2,210,000—an average of 19 per cent for domestic consumers—and a $300,000 salary increase for its employees. The Godbout Liberals are again enjoying a high tide of popularity, and it does not seem that French-speaking Canadians will play, even unwittingly, the Tory hand.

TRUSTWORTHY FREE FRENCH SOURCES reveal that Léon Blum is in prison in southern Germany, with his wife. His health, it is reported, is good, his morale excellent, although he is permitted little intellectual activity or social intercourse. He is allowed to see only Georges Mandel and Mme Mandel, who are in the same prison. He may send two letters a month to his son, a prisoner of war elsewhere in Germany, but may correspond with no one else. No word has been received in Algiers concerning Léon Jouhoux, who is believed to be in a German prison for Aryans, along with Reynaud and Gamelin.

WASHINGTON ADAMS, Washington correspondent of Leon de Aryan's Broom, suggests a constitutional amendment which would provide, among other things, that "no person may become President who has within five years previous to appointment or election been a resident or citizen of New York City, or resided within one hundred miles of said city's incorporate (sic) limits."

THE X-RAY, ANOTHER SHEET with fascist sympathies, has this to say about public education: "One wonders if the old-time private school is about to reappear. We could, in such schools, keep out the red rat, communistic doctrines, and English propaganda from contaminating the minds of the children." And no doubt English grammar too.

Recovery in Russia

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

RECONSTRUCTION is the first item on Russia's agenda after the war, and there is reason to believe that we shall see an industrial miracle comparable to the military miracle we have already witnessed in that country.

Russia's victories have not been cheaply bought. No other country has suffered such terrible wounds. In addition to its military losses, which have been the largest in the war thus far, it has lost millions of civilians to the barbarism of the German occupation authorities; and the destruction of its industries and agriculture has been greater than that in any other country the Nazis have visited.

Modern war is industrial war. The Russians have understood this from the beginning. Ever since June 22, 1941, the day the Nazi armies marched into Russia without a declaration of war, the Soviet authorities have acted in the knowledge that every factory, every machine, that fell into the enemy's hands would increase his military strength. Their scorched-earth policy consisted of two kinds of measures: (1) the evacuation of industries and all qualified workers from the regions immediately threatened by the Nazis, and (2) where evacuation was impossible for technical reasons, as in the case of the dam at Dniepropetrovsk and of coal mines everywhere, the destruction of everything that could help the enemy either directly or indirectly. The Germans restored some of these industries, but when they withdrew they tried to leave nothing behind them. They destroyed not only factories and machinery but houses and buildings of all kinds. In some cases their retreat was so rapid that they had no time for complete destruction, but according to the Moscow correspondent of the New York Times, "not a single enterprise in South Russia's iron and steel industry has escaped damage. . . . To cripple the area where before the war two-thirds of Russia's iron and steel industry was situated, the Germans created a special demolition school in a Donbas city. . . . Winding machinery and cranes at the mines were cut so thoroughly with oxygen torches that their rebuilding is judged impossible."

In some Russian provinces which changed hands several times in the course of the fighting the decline in production is estimated at 75 per cent; in many others it exceeds 50 per cent. Of course this does not mean that the total Russian production has declined by 50 per cent. The Russians evacuated a considerable portion of their industries, and they have vastly expanded their production in the eastern regions and in Soviet Asia. Taking all these factors into consideration, it may be estimated that even in the most difficult months of the war Russian production did not fall below 50 per cent of the prewar total. Today it has risen probably to two-thirds of that figure, if not higher.

The work of reconstruction is already under way in the midst of war. In order to take the offensive, for example, the Russians were forced to repair their transportation equipment. Naturally, only the most urgent repairs could be made, but the rapid advance of the Soviet armies in recent months shows that by and large they succeeded in putting the Russian rail network back into working order. A large proportion of the arms factories in the newly retaken territory are already producing again. But these feats could be accomplished only because Russian civilians made the severest personal sacrifices. Living standards continue to be extraordinarily low.

One gets a certain insight into the present low level of Russian consumption, and its probable level throughout 1944, from the budget report of M. Zverev, Commissar of Finance, to the most recent joint session of the two chambers of the Supreme Soviet. This report is the first official statement on war finances which has been published in Russia since the beginning of the war. One of the most important sources of revenue is the turnover tax, applied at the point of production on all manufactured articles. In 1941 this tax brought into the public coffers 124,500,000,000 rubles; in 1944 it will bring in only 80,200,000,000, despite the fact that the rate has been doubled since 1941. The London Economist comments thus on the budget:

If the revenue from the turnover tax is taken as a rough index of consumption in Russia—and it is a pretty accurate index for consumption in the towns—then the conclusion seems to be that in 1943 about two-thirds of Russia's normal population consumed only one-third of the total quantity of goods consumed in Russia immediately before the war. Consumption during the war appears to have been halved—and the comparison is with 1940, a year of relative underconsumption.

Russian agriculture has suffered especially heavy losses. The Nazis looted most of the collective farms, slaughtered much of the livestock, carried off tractors and other machinery, and burned provisions which they could not

Salute to Russia

In three years of epic struggle Soviet Russia has astonished everyone: not only by the heroism of its armies but by the strategic genius of its generals; not only by the iron determination of Stalingrad to withstand the assault but by the swift rebuilding of the city as soon as the siege was lifted; not only by Russian audacity in attack but by Russian ingenuity in laying, in the midst of war, the basis of reconstruction. On the third anniversary of the Soviet Union's entry into the war we hail its accomplishments in a spirit of deepest admiration for the world's great proletarian state.

take along when they retreated. It is true that the Russians had evacuated much of their cattle and farm machinery and are now bringing them back; but Russian resources, already overtaxed for war purposes, simply cannot fill all needs at once. The meager extent to which the returned animals will meet the needs of the liberated areas can be judged by the following table, which shows the present animal population of certain provinces as a percentage of the pre-war figure. It was compiled by the London Economist on the basis of official Russian statements:

	Horned	Sheep
Province	Cattle	and Goats	Horses
Kalinin	3.5	2.5	2.0
Smolensk	6.0	3.0	2.0
Kursk	. 0.3	0.9	0.3
Orel	. 2.5	5.0	2.0
Rostov	. 5.0	10.0	8.5
Stalingrad	. 1.5	3.0	1.0

The figures we have today are not and need not be final; but even if they should double they would still show with cruel clarity the terrible decline in Soviet agricultural production and indicate the difficulty of reconstruction.

While the war is on, the Russians are rebuilding only what is absolutely necessary, but plans are already in the making for the complete reconstruction of Soviet industry and agriculture. The outlook in this respect is much better than it was at the end of World War I. At that time the civil war and the general disorganization of the country made it impossible to start the actual work of rebuilding until 1921, but now the Russians are beginning the work before the end of the war. Moreover, today they have millions of skilled workers; their technical advance from 1921 to 1941 was unmatched by any other country in the world. And there is one other factor: after the last war they financed the rebuilding chiefly with their own funds; this time there will be considerable assistance from other countries.

After the war it is probable that the United States and Britain will occupy the western half of Germany and Russia the eastern half. Thus far the eastern half has been bombed least of all, its production is far above peace-time levels, and even after the war there will probably be a great deal of industrial activity there. Thus it is not too optimistic to assume that the Russians will be able to use at least part of the industry of eastern Germany to repair some of the havoc wrought by the German armies. And there are indications that the United States will help substantially with supplies.

What Russia needs primarily is capital goods to set its industrial system in motion again—locomotives, railroad cars, machines, machine tools, electrical apparatus, motors, tractors. It is in this field that American productive capacity, which, as we know, has grown more rapidly during this war than at any other period in the country's history, shows the most striking increase. Production today is 50 per cent greater than it was in 1940, the best year before the war. If after the war American production declines to the level of 1940 there will be unprecedented unemployment. The Department of Commerce study, "Markets After the War," analyzes the situation as follows:

It seems almost certain that post-war output must exceed the best pre-war year. If it should be no more than in 1940 there would be the nine million who were unemployed in 1940, plus the two and a half million added to the civilian labor force between 1940 and 1946, plus eight million who would be replaced by improvements in efficiency over the six years, a total of over nineteen million unemployed. Even with an average work week five hours shorter than in 1940 there would be more unemployed than the thirteen million in 1932.

If large-scale unemployment is to be prevented after the war, expansion of foreign trade is essential. In this connection a statement by W. Averell Harriman, American ambassador to Russia, is noteworthy. The New York Times quotes Harriman to the effect that "he and other members of the American embassy staff planned to give the greatest possible consideration immediately to the assistance the United States can give the Soviet Union in the rehabilitation of devastated areas and the repairing of other war-caused dislocations." Certainly the Soviet Union will offer a big market for American manufactured products. Harry Hopkins has estimated that American exports to Russia will amount to some $750,000,000 annually.

Taking all factors into consideration—Russia's technical progress, its millions of skilled workers, the contribution German industry may have to make, and the probable assistance of the United States—one can conclude that after this war Russia's reconstruction will be much more rapid than it was after World War I.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

A FTER a few years we shall know in what respects the German army command was surprised by the invasion. The publicity and propaganda officials were certainly thoroughly prepared for it. The civil and military authorities of the Reich must have agreed on their line weeks before H-hour.

About purely military events they must have decided to give out swift, accurate, and fairly detailed news. The early Allied communiqués were intentionally laconic and indefinite, but the Germans gave many details and names. In fact, at first German announcements almost filled the American press, and they were proved later to have been in large part correct. It is clear that in the matter of military news the Germans had resolved to establish a reputation for trustworthiness both among their own people and abroad.

The way the events announced were colored and interpreted is another story. From the very first the German domestic radio was flooded with commentaries and speeches sounding a hundred variations on a few themes and apparently in large part written beforehand. Prominent among these was the assurance that the High Command had not "allowed itself to be surprised at any point." Everything had been exactly foreseen and even publicly predicted—including the fact that the Allies would win a few narrow beachheads. This possibility, indeed, was very prudently emphasized by German propaganda for some weeks before the invasion.

Another favorite theme, incessantly repeated, was that "the Anglo-Americans are not acting on their own initiative in attacking Europe; they are merely carrying out Stalin's orders"—a distinction which must have elicited from Germans mentally the German equivalent of "And so what?" One note that was harped on constantly was a reference to "Europe's" enthusiastic solidarity before the attack of non-Europeans. Even the French were represented as furiously hostile to the invaders. The Wilhelmstrasse spokesman, Dr. Schmidt, in his first press conference went so far as to say that when Allied prisoners were marched through French cities they "were scoffed at and mocked by the population."

But the principal theme was and is: Fortunately our waiting is now at an end and the war is at last nearing a decision. "The hour has come," said the ace radio commentator Hans Fritzsche, "for which the German command, the German soldier, and the German people have prayed, for which they have long prepared, for which they have long prepared, for which they have worked, suffered, and fought." This time, "in repulsing the last danger threatening us we shall secure once and for all our freedom and our right to live." And why is this the "phase of decision"? Is it because Germany has lost the war if the Allies win this phase? Quite the contrary—it is because the Allies have lost the war if they do not win this phase. That is the center of gravity of the whole German propaganda effort. By every means at its disposal, by mysticism and mystification, it is trying to engender in the public the feeling that not the Third Reich but England and the United States are playing their last card on the northern coast of France. If during the coming weeks the invasion is stopped at the coast, German propaganda reiterates, the Anglo-Americans will be incapable of making another move. They will be through, beaten to their knees, and the Reich will have its foot on their neck.

All neutral correspondents still in Germany describe the repressed excitement of the people. "As one walks through the streets one gets the impression that the war has just begun. The man in the street has the most intense interest in every detail of the great landing operations; he discusses and judges them expertly. Every radio broadcast is listened to; every newspaper is snatched from the vender's hands." "In Berlin the people form small groups at street corners and in restaurants and discuss the news." But while the correspondent of the Stockholm Aftonbladet gained the impression that the reaction of the German home front to the landings could "best be described as solemn," it seemed considerably more prosaic to his colleague on the Nya Daglight Allehanda. "The question most discussed," he said, "is whether with the Allied forces so occupied in the west the home front may not be spared further bombings."

Spain and the Invasion

NOWHERE did German propaganda about the impregnable Atlantic Wall find a more trusting audience than in Madrid. The invasion has therefore been a terrible blow. The Phalangist press and radio are obliged to acknowledge Allied advances, but they cannot hide their impatience for the expected German counter-attack. They place all their hopes in the ability of the German High Command to drive the Anglo-American forces back into the sea.

Twice in public, when addressing the officers of the Spanish army, Franco has developed his theories of the war. In private conversations he has been even more outspoken about the role he would like eventually to play. He sees himself, together with the Vatican, as the chief agent for a negotiated peace. Since the end of 1943 he has hoped that the Germans would halt the Soviet armies at a safe distance from the East Prussian frontier, at whatever sacrifice of troops, and then launch a tremendous counter-offensive in the west which would cost the Allies dearly in men and material. In other words, he has counted upon a stalemate, which would mean the reestablishment of Germany's defensive position and the creation of propitious circumstances for a negotiated peace. Every new Allied thrust into Normandy stabs at his heart.

Vanity, Justice, and Falstaff

THE FORTUNES OF FALSTAFF. By J. Dover Wilson. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

OVER WILSON'S latest book, "The Fortunes of Falstaff," is worthy of its subject. It is his most entertaining venture. By now everyone realizes that Wilson is a creative artist, a critic who regards a drama of Shakespeare's as material for the free play of his imagination. Fortunately such liberties as he takes with the plain facts are never expressions of subjectivism run rampant. Nor are they products of "pure" aesthetic criticism, like that which pours from the transcendental mind of Wilson Knight. Dover Wilson conscientiously tries to base his interpretation upon a careful reading of the text and to submit his conjectures to scholarly discipline. Yet he must be followed warily, for he is at his ingratiating best when taking the most precarious positions.

It should be said that he begins his study impeccably. He rejects with some scorn the Falstaff myth born in the eighteenth century and given wide currency by the late A. C. Bradley. This interpretation assumes that Shakespeare's plans for the treatment of his comic hero miscarried. According to Bradley, the dramatist intended that Prince Hal's rejection of Sir John should serve as triumphant proof of the young man's reform. But he unwittingly made Falstaff so captivating a fellow that almost everyone today regards his final banishment as the heartless deed of a calculating politician. This view Wilson brands as pure sentimentalism. Yet he has no more sympathy with Stoll's "realistic" notion that Falstaff is nothing more than a familiar Plautine braggart. To mediate between Bradley and Stoll, Wilson tries to take Dr. Johnson's sturdy common-sense view of Falstaff.

However, Wilson at the outset of his journey makes . characteristically precise conjecture that should prepare us for his new interpretation. Shakespeare, he supposes, intended the second part of "Henry IV" to follow the first part "by not more than twenty-four hours." So he assumes that Shakespeare from the first planned the two plays as a carefully unified and integrated single drama. They were to form a glorified morality play presenting an irrepressible conflict between Government and Vanity. In Part I, Wilson goes on to say, Prince Hal, representing Chivalry or Prowess in the field, triumphs over Riot, impersonated by Falstaff; in Part II Justice is victor over a still lower form of Profligacy. Most critics have long been agreed that the two "Henry IV" dramas form a rough equivalent of a typical prodigal-son play and that one of Falstaff's many forbears was the joyous tippler who haunted the tavern where the prodigal son wasted his substance. But few possess an active enough imagination to discern in the merry saga of Falstaff and the Prince traces of a stiff morality pattern.

This hypothesis does not prevent Wilson from taking honest delight in Falstaff's early triumphs. He easily disposes of the foolish question of Falstaff's cowardice, Shakespeare made him a coward in action only that the heroism of his wit might shine the brighter. For in the realm of wit, Wilson says, Falstaff is no coward; his impudence is a form of daring. But our critic surely exaggerates the speed of Falstaff's mind when he imagines that from the first moment of his meeting with the Prince and Poins after the Gadshill robbery he divines that these two were his assailants. Since Shakespeare's lines do not make this clear, Wilson is certain that the actor playing the part did so by sundry winks and nods to the audience, the meaning of which the intelligent spectators easily caught. The scene is thus reduced to a private joke between the actor and a few cleverlings in his audience. These favored few would lose all the swift surprise of Falstaff's witty escape from the Prince's trap: "Was it for me to kill the heir-apparent?" "I was now a coward on instinct."

The Falstaff of Part II suffers a strange metamorphosis at Wilson's hands largely because the critic makes the extraordinary assumption that all England believes the Prince's tale that it was Sir John who slew Douglas. This fiction has gained the rogue a "European reputation" for bravery, an imposture that works like wine in his brain. Finding his old role of "mock-maudlin highwayman" beneath his new dignity, he now blossoms out into a "complete courtier," "the preposterous, self-satisfied pink of gentility."

To make this conception plausible, Wilson tries not to laugh much at any of Falstaff's doings in Part II. He finds, for example, little to amuse him in Sir John's two interviews with the Chief Justice. He sees in them only Shakespeare's purpose to show how absurdly inept Vanity appears when she attempts to fence with Justice. But a reader ridden by no such theory rejoices in these absurd encounters. Falstaff's success in thawing the Justice's severity into mirth is proof sufficient that Sir John has lost none of his ability to drown gravity in laughter. Wilson is also resolutely not amused at Falstaff's "overreaching of Shallow," insisting that Shakespeare expected us to regard this episode with only "tolerant amusement."

Now it is undoubtedly true that Shakespeare made some effort to win approval for the Prince's rejection of his disreputable companion. By presenting in the early scenes of the second part of "Henry IV" a Falstaff who is morally debased, the dramatist weans us from our affection for the rascal. Sir John is sent to Boar's Head Tavern, not as of old to give his wit a holiday, but to fondle the foul-mouthed whore Doll Tearsheet. Such conduct is calculated to make the rogue sink low in our esteem. But when Falstaff meets Justice Shallow he again devises matter "to keep the world in continued laughter." Then we realize that our aesthetic delight in him is as strong as ever. Thus to the very end of his double drama Shakespeare holds the artistic balance so evenly between Falstaff and the Prince that the rascal's vices never affect us like actual evil-doing. To turn from them with moral aversion is deliberately to close our eyes to Falstaff's continuing charm and to twist Shakespeare's artistic pattern completely out of shape.

But it is ungracious to dwell on the blemishes of Dover Wilson's brilliant volume. Only when his craving for critical adventure carries him beyond the reach of Shakespeare's text is he dangerous to follow. Most of the time he sends us back to the plays with renewed curiosity and with an enriched understanding of the Fortunes of Falstaff.

WAR BELOW ZERO: THE BATTLE FOR GREEN-LAND. By Colonel Bernt Balchen, Major Corey Ford, and Major Oliver La Farge, Houghton Mifflin Company, $2.

OUR HIDDEN FRONT. By William Gilman. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

G—FOR GENEVIEVE. By Lieutenant J. M. Herbert. Roy Publishers. $2.50.

HIS business of making war in the sky has so many facets that there are innumerable good tales to be told, given reasonable amount of imagination in the telling. In "War Below Zero" we have the cooperation of two expert story-tellers. Oliver La Farge and Corey Ford, who include in their team one of the most admirable of the pioneer fliers, Bernt Balchen, commander of the Greenland army air base. Major La Farge is historical officer of the Air Transport Command; his job is to assemble the full chronicle of the A. T. C., much of which must be kept secret until after the war. Major Ford is assigned by the army to write about flying men. Colonel Balchen is the large, calm man who has looked down on more ice than any other air pilot in the world. The three of them came together in Greenland, fascinated by this weird land of frozen death which suddenly became one of the vital junctions of modern North Atlantic travel.

In Greenland the horizon frequently is erased by the blending of snow and sky, so that an expecienced flier may make a perfect landing—fifty feet up in the air; or may make a landing involuntarily when he thinks he is flying. The latter happened to a Flying Fortress being ferried over the ice cap on November 9, 1942. It was not until five months later that eight men finally were rescued; meanwhile three of their rescuers had been killed. Major La Farge tells about The Long Wait in the sixty-three-page middle section of the book, and surely this must rank among the classic stories of the Far North in the aviation age.

Having so many authors makes "War Below Zero," like the Greenland ice cap, choppy. Nevertheless, one gets the feel of this land where "a deep breath will shrivel your lungs" and where the heroism of men like Balchen has kept open the ferry route to England against incredible odds.

The fliers fighting the Japanese in the Aleutians were not so near the top of the world, but they were near enough so that they, too, learned how to roast a plane's motor to make it fly after being out in a fifty-below-zero blizzard. Their main problem, described in "Our Hidden Front," was the unnatural combination of blinding fog and the eighty-mile-an-hour williwaw wind. The bomber pilots complained that the clouds had too many rocks in them; but they said it wasn't so bad as long as the pilot still could see the co-pilot.

Mr. Gilman devotes only part of his book to fliers, for he is concerned primarily with writing as much of the history as can now be disclosed of the Alaska-Aleutian campaign. He blames our armed forces for having been inexcusably unprepared for war in that area-so much so that the Japanese could have walked right through Alaska into Canada at the beginning; he even suggests that the army for a time expected to lose Alaska. Mr. Gilman was the first newspaper correspondent to reach Alaska after Pearl Harbor, and he stayed there the longest of any, two winters, devoting a goodly portion of his energies to battling a censorship that made Singapore look like an open forum. Perhaps he is too enthusiastic in accepting Billy Mitchell's thesis that America could dominate the world by air power based on Alaska. Even if we don't want to dominate the world, however, the development of short-line global transportation across the Arctic by way of Alaska and Greenland may turn out to be one of the most significant achievements of these war years.

"G—for Genevieve," a thoroughly beguiling book, should be read for entertainment rather than for information. The author, who writes under a pseudonym, was an ancient (last war) Polish fighter pilot who fled to internment in Rumania, then sneaked out to France hoping to kill Germans, then went to England for the same purpose, and finally wangled a highly unsafe job as a rear gunner in a night has written a new novel that reveals the enduring human values behind man's flight from tyranny bomber, Genevieve, which was manned and serviced by Poles, all bent on killing Germans.

Lieutenant Herbert yields to none in his pride in being a Pole, but he looks at his countrymen with loving amusement. They feel that there is no race of man that can equal Poles. The Rumanians were unspeakably dumb and disorderly. Didn't they allow thousands of Poles to outwit them and escape to freedom, thanks largely to the ingenuity of the author and his fabulous ex-chauffeur, Pryszcyck? As for the French, Lieutenant Herbert speaks of them "without anger and without pain, rather with a sense of compassion." The English were not so bad, except for their lack of imagination, their need of enlivenment, and the fact that their island wasn't situated in Poland. Reading this book, one begins to think the Polish braggadocio has a certain justification in fact, not to mention a rich background of humon.

CAMILLE PISSARRO: LETTERS TO HIS SON LUCIEN.

Edited by John Rewald with the Assistance of Lucien Pissarro. Translated from the French by Lionel Abel.
Pantheon Books. $6.50.

PISSARRO wrote to his son Lucien in 1896: "We are on the right track, be faithful to your sensations." During the twenty years (1883 to 1903) covered by these hundreds of letters the old painter changed his mind more than once. But to "nature" and his "sensations" he remained true from first to last. His shifts of attitude in other respects came not from a vacillating temperament but from humility and an ineradicable hope, derived from analogies with science, of finding the Method.

Painting had begun to move fast in Pissarro's day, faster than it had in three hundred years; he in particular must keep pace with it. The Method, if discovered, would consummate and at the same time stop the development of art, just as the fulfilment of socialism would, according to Marx, stop history. Pissarro believed in the possibility of the Method because he believed in the nineteenth century. He was naive and optimistic, a complete materialist in philosophy, a Proudhonian anarchist in politics. The countermomantic fifties and sixties had made him, and he remained immune to the aestheticism and mysticism which came into style during the later decades of his life. Aestheticism he characterized as "a kind of romanticism more or less combined with trickery." Nature was too productive to be comprehended within it: "There must be an element of nature in my canvases which hurts certain aesthetes." Of the neo-Catholicism with which aesthetic London tempted Lucien in the nineties he wrote; "It is philosophically outside the ideas of our time." "The ideas of our time"—this was the way Pissarro liked to express himself.

With the exception of Seurat, all the neo-impressionists, among whom Pissarro belonged for a time, professed anarchism. Pissarro's, however, was of earlier date and less an avant-garde gesture—the anarchism of an artisan rather than of an artist. He was the only one of the original impressionists to concern himself with revolutionary politics, Degas was a reactionary, Cézanne a conservative, while Renoir, Manet, Monet, and Sisley seem to have been more or less indifferent. The neo-impressionists-who were the most positive agents of the so-called classical reaction in French painting during the eighteen eighties, insisting on prescribed techniques and the primacy of objective laws over individual humors-were the first after Courbet to join avant-gardism to radical politics. By their time the opposition of intrenched society to advanced art had become an established fact from which political conclusions were to be drawn. But later on, when the market for advanced art began to expand, the avant-garde again turned away from politics, and all it concluded from its experience was that bourgeois society was ugly and crass, yet could be circumvented in private life. Hence aestheticism and religiositywhile the generation of artists and writers that rose in Paris after 1900 occupied itself with neither politics nor religion but went in for experience, that is, bohemianism, when it went in for anything at all besides the practice of art.

None of the original impressionists was bohemian in his actual way of life, least of all Pissarro, a family man with seven children. He was the only notable advanced painter of his time to attempt to support a family on the proceeds of his work, even before its market appeal had been assured. This happened relatively late-later than in the cases of Renoir and Monet, who waited for financial success before acquiring families. The trials of Pissarro's course are reflected in his constant complaining about money and difficult relations with his dealers. Again and again he had to run to Paris and peddle his work to raise money. But he loved Paris, and he does not seem to have lived badly, and there may be some exaggeration in his complaints. Certainly he would fall into that rhetorical paranoia so habitual with the French, and talk of "enemies," "plots," "machinations," and so forth. But it was little more than rhetoric, and the old man usually doubted his own suspicions.

In himself he was one of the most decent persons ever to have won renown in art. Degas—who was anti-Semitic, while Pissarro was a Jew—Cézanne, and others have testified to that. He never dramatized himself as an artist, his humility was utterly sincere, and, rarest of all in a painter, he was seldom jealous, or grudging in his praise of contemporaries. The evidence is in these letters.

Pissarro's lack of egotism was responsible perhaps for certain shortcomings of his art-its tendency toward monotony, its frequent lack of incisiveness and motion. He sacrificed too much of his temperament to whatever method he happened to be practicing. He was greatly concerned about the "synthesis," the harmony or unity of a work of art, and rightly so, for a painting, like a living organism, exists by the simultaneous relation of its parts. But the total final effect of the flat rectangle was often a paralyzing obsession for him. He allowed his perception of the free atmospheric diffusion of light to hush and merge all salient features, was too egalitarian in his treatment of the canvas-like another materialist. Courbet-and would mistake uniformity for unity. Yet his virtues redeem and more than redeem his faults. He could be a great draftsman, as his work in black and white shows. And he had a certain innocence of eye which permitted him to love phenomena the way no other painter of his time could. His relish of the pictorial, his fresh sense of what a picture does and how it relates to that which it pictures, gained him some of the qualities of primitive art without its liabilities. Pissarro was simple but not poor. He had a wealth of his beloved sensations, and could not have had that wealth without being learned in his art. Only someone who has experienced painting as a world in which it is possible to immerse as well as divert oneself can appreciate the inflections of Pissarro's painting. Shock and immediate effects are sacrificed for the sake of subtleties, passages, modulations, the mediation of contrasts. And little masterpieces are to be found complete in themselves in the dozen or so brushstrokes with which such a detail as a cab is indicated. It was only Pissarro's inhibiting preconception of unity that prevented him from treating the whole canvas in the same manner.

He was one of the few professionals to write professionally about art-from the inside, without high-flown verbiage or spectacular paradoxes. Everything is to the point -the authentic shorthand which even the layman will recognize as such. Pissarro was addressing himself to his son, upon whose equal familiarity with craft problems he could rely. The milieu and the period were under intense critical pressure, created, as is usually the case, by competing activity in the exploration of new possibilities rather than by the words of the critics. The monolithic opposition to the new painting was in itself valuable because the writers who embodied the opposition-not the academic painters-were often learned and really interested in painting. Unlike the advanced artists of the period after 1918, when the reputation of being advanced was a goal in itself and meant eventual rewards, Pissarro and his fellows had little to encourage them except the excitement of discovery. Judgment could be exercised with relative purity and was unwarped by issues accidental to art. Whatever came out of the studios aroused an immediate, keen, and uncompromising response. Comparatively few of the judgments of Pissarro and his friends have needed posterity's correction; they knew how to value Cézanne and Gauguin; and Pissarro's own work was during his lifetime put to as searching and intelligent a criticism as any it has received since. All this appears in these letters, which form one of the most fertile of all sources of insights

Fiction in Review

U SUALLY where there is a low degree of emotional tension in a novel, we expect to find false feelings, and when a story is told as easily as James Norman Hall tells his new story, "Lost Island" (Little, Brown, $2), we are unprepared for any serious content. But the conjunction of technical smoothness with false emotions or the lack of ideas is by no means inevitable. As a matter of fact, in fiction, and even more in the movies, a great many of the smooth commercial jobs strike me as having more validity than the knotty "art" jobs. Nowadays, a display of seriousness is likely to be only a display of our newest emptiness; emotional tension has itself become a slick commercial trick.

Certainly "Lost Island" has the mark on it of a hand practiced in writing for a large unselected audience. (You will recall Mr. Hall as half of the famous "Mutiny on the Bounty" duo.) I find it much more serious, however, than such a patently "serious" novel about the war as, say, John Hersey's "A Bell for Adano." It is more thoughtful, and it seems to me to spring from deeper feelings. The story is simple: it is the brief account of the life and death of a South Sea island. We need the island for a Pacific air base; in a week we destroy the fruit of generations of peaceful living. Yet obviously, if the United States didn't take the island, Japan probably would; and as between America and Japan, or as between democracy and fascism, there is no question in Mr. Hall's mind. On the other hand, there is the island itself, with its beautiful quiet life. It has not only one of the few indigenous cultures left in the world, but it is inhabited by people who are incapable of understanding the issues for which they are sacrificed; they don't even understand the world on a map. The fact that they are victims in a cause bigger than themselves scarcely makes them any the less victims.

I think Mr. Hall makes it clear that the tragedy of his island is perhaps only a small tragedy. But it is an absolute one, and it implies a very large tragedy. For what "Lost Island" is saying—and strongly, too, though its voice is so politely pitched—is that it is a strange world we have contrived in which we have to destroy civilization in order to try to preserve it.

IN BRIEF

AUSTRALIA AND THE PACIFIC.

By Members of the Australian Institute of International Affairs. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

This little book reprints papers prepared for the Institute of Pacific Relations conference held at Mont Tremblant, Ouebec, in December, 1942. It does not, therefore, take account of such . major development in Australian policy as the Australian-New Zealand agreement signed on January 21, 1944. Nevertheless, it provides a good deal of sound and valuable background information which helps to make the agreement understandable and generally illuminates the Australian international position. The Commonwealth in international affairs can best be understood by remembering that it is a small nation, member of the British Commonwealth, and a Pacific power. From these three facts, plus a knowledge of the national psychology, most of the particular policies proposed or followed can be deduced. It is the merit of these papers that they clarify understanding of each aspect of the Australian position. American readers will be particularly interested to note that it is as a Pacific power that Australia approaches the United States, but the other two facts about it deeply condition the attitudes taken up. They will also be interested in the difficulty the authors all have in defining the relative strength of the traditional close imperial ties and the rising sense of national destiny in policy formation. And, finally, they will be fascinated by the effort to measure the impact of the United States on Australia's destiny.

FILMS

If AS a civilian, you feel the importance of experiencing what little you can about the war, you had better avoid practically every foot of fiction film which we have made about it, and you had of course better see all the newsreels and war-record films you can. At their weakest they have things to show which no non-record war films, not even the greatest that might be made, could ever hope to show. The latest and best of these films are "Attack!—the Invasion of New Britain," the first invasion newsreels, and, I am reliably told, the newsreels about the fall of Cassino. The great things in such films are nearly always single shots. The good things, which sometimes approach and could attain greatness, are the cutting, the sound, the quality of the text and voice of the commentary. But even the weakest shots, and even some of the prepared or posed ones, seem to me to have great power and wonder. In "Attack!" there are morning shots, getting men and matériel ashore in the not quite misty. sober light, which overwhelmed me with their doubleness of beauty, almost sublimity, and their almost fragrant immediacy, which made me doubt my right to be aware of the beauty at all; and these were very intelligently, restrainedly enhanced by the rather quiet sounds of metal and motors-sounds which seemed as if stopped-down by the foliage and by the quality of the light and air.

The same petrifying immediacy turns up in the newsreel of a landing barge under fire off the Normandy coast, crowded with the crouched soldierstheir almost smiling officer standing -who soon leave its protection, the housetops of the French shore standing insanely near and distinct above the end of the barge, and abruptly disclosed full-length as by the rise (or fall) of a theater curtain, as the barge opens and the men begin their hip-deep wade ashore. But fully as moving and worthy of watching, over and over, were the shots of men receiving medical pellets and their last Communion before battle, in "Attack!"; or those of Eisenhower on the first day of invasion, grinning as uncontrollably and sympathetically as an eight-year-old; or of a disconsolate young German prisoner getting his wrist bandaged.

Such material could be used still more powerfully, I think, if we daredand knew how-to make the central intention that of communicating war to civilians and did not stop with recording it. Stop-shots, slow-motion repetitions, and blow-ups of especially significant faces or images or bits of action, with or without comment or sound, would be one device; unrehearsed interviews would be another; still more intrusive use of the camera in places where cameras are most unwelcome might, I uneasily believe, be a third; since the reaction of those who resent the prying would react in turn upon the consciousness and conscience of the audience. I regret tinges of slightly complacent "American" stuff in the "Attack!" commentary; this far from complacent film is well above the need for any such help. The newsreel commentary is more straightforward and less morally and psychologically appalling than it used to be but, as ought not to have to be expected, is still rather a mixture of parochial orotundity and sports-announcing. I regret still more the failure, in the invasion newsreels, to use at least one good long stretch of the extraordinary shots which were made from strafing planes; these were chopped down barely short of their most catastrophically effective few seconds. The principle is as misguided in films as it would be in music. I wish I might see a newsreel or longer film which first presented its images in the most powerful order and weaving possible, without word of explanation: then got down, with diagrams and with recapitulated shots, to explanation. I am interested in explanations, but a thousand times more interested that an image have its full power. On the whole, however, the invasion films are well organized, well cut, and free of the affectations into which the use of more adventurous cutting might dangerously lead.

We could be getting still better record films of war if, like the British, our men were supplied with Cunningham Combat cameras instead of Eyemoes (the standard-and dislikedequipment); if, like the Germans and Russians, we had a much larger supply of telescopic lenses and more men trained to use them; and if we and the British used, per day, more than an average of 500 feet of film and assigned, per division, more than two movie camera men, plus two still camera men and two drivers. The invasion of Europe is being covered more thoroughly, we are told, than any other military operation in history; I am glad of that. But after all, the inadequate coverage of the Second Punic War hardly justifies any present complacency. It would be hard to conceive how many good camera men, with how many good cameras and how much film, would begin to be enough. As for the recording of sound and speech, both calibrated with moving images and for its own sake, that seems still to be in the mere JAMES AGEB novelty stage.

MUSIC

HE attitude of the New Friends of Music seems to be that if I point out the discrepancies between its pretensions and its performances it doesn't want me at its concerts. That held for the three Schnabel recitals of Beethoven's music which the New Friends sponsored after the end of its chamber music series; and so I didn't hear the first recital, at which, I was reliably informed. Schnabel's playing betrayed the fact that he was very ill and should not have played at all, or the second, at which he was in his best form. But through someone's kindness I did hear the third.

I arrived at Carnegie Hall too late for the first work, one of the Sonatas Opus 2, but in time for Opus 81a ("Les Adieux"). As I listened with anticipation based on recollection I was struck, literally, by the unpleasantness of the sounds that came out of the piano. True, I was sitting on the right-center aisle, and on that side a piano is likely to sound hard and clangy in Carnegie Hall. But I had sat there before for Schnabel's performances; and though in the past there had been moments when fortissimos had been pushed beyond the capacity of the instrument, I had never before heard such consistent insensitive attack of the piano, and such consistent harsh, jangling sounds as this treatment of the instrument produced.

But at least the performance was one in which the outlines of the work were perceptible. Not so the performance of the "Diabelli" Variations that followed. I had heard Schnabel play them at least twice in Carnegie Hall; and his H.M.V. recording had made me intimately familiar with both the formidable work and his wonderfully clarifying performance. But this time variation after variation was hurled out as jumble after jumble of jangling sounds in which I was unable to discover any outline, any rhythm—which is to say, any musical sense.

Schnabel's playing always has been uneven: one moment the music has been marvelously inflected, integrated, shaped, and clarified; the next moment—it might be the next work, or even the next movement of the same work—it has been distorted, torn, confused. One moment, I would say, his musicality has been allowed to operate by mental and emotional equilibrium; the next moment it has been swamped by excessive emotional intensity or pomp-ousness, with the result that he has taken a finale too fast for clarity, or has loaded the phrases of a slow movement with more significance than they could carry. When calm, moreover, he has produced ravishingly beautiful sounds from the piano; when excited he has driven fortissimos beyond the limits of agreeable sound. And in the playing I heard recently the bad tendencies were merely worse.

After the second recital Virgil Thomson wrote a general statement of what he thought was wrong with Schnabel's playing of Beethoven. It was the fact that Schnabel played as a late nineteenth-century romantic the music of "a child of the late eighteenth." Specifically, "Mr. Schnabel plays as if he did not admit any difference between the expressive functions of melody and of passage work. The neutral material of music-scales, arpeggiated basses, accompanying figures, ostinato chordal backgrounds, formal cadences-he plays as if they were an intense communication, as if they were saying something as important as the main thematic material," when they serve rather "as amplification, as underpinning, frequently as mere acoustical brilliance." This robs "the melodic material, the expressive phrases, of their singing power," and makes "Beethoven sound sometimes a little meretricious as a composer. His large-scale forms include, of necessity, a large amount of material that has structural rather than a directly expressive function. Emphasizing all this as if it were phrase by phrase of the deepest emotional portent . . . blows up the commonplaces of musical rhetoric into a form of bombast that"-and here note the two results-"makes Beethoven's early sonatas, which have many formal observances in them, sound empty of meaning, and the later ones, which sometimes skip formal transitions, sound like the improvisations of a talented youth.'

The criticism would have force if only the music and the playing were what Thomson describes. He makes Beethoven a child of the late eighteenth century so that the scales and arpeggiated basses and so on may have the purely structural function in his music that they have in Mozart's; but actually I can find even in the earliest of Beethoven's sonatas very little of this material that Beethoven does not give some expressive function. And listening to Schnabel's recordings of them I find that he plays this material with no more than the expressivity that is implicit in it—not "as if it were phrase by phrase of the deepest emotional import."

Thomson evidently does not like Schnabel's playing; and I would suspect that a man who likes the French pianists' way of rattling off Mozart would not like the sharp contours and powerful tensions of Schnabel's way. I can only surmise; since Thomson himself has yet to state what he does not like in Schnabel's playing as it exists. What he has done has been to say what he does not like in Schnabel's playing of Beethoven's music as he imagines both. And in this speculation divorced from reality there is, in the end, not even logical coherence, but only arbitrary verbalization. Writing about Schnabel's playing of all Beethoven he must make his analysis apply to the performances of the late sonatas; and he does. But logically the tendency to blow up the purely formal material that he says exists in the early sonatas cannot produce any bad result in the late sonatas which, as he says, omit formal transitions; and what he says is the result of that tendency in those late sonatas has no relation to it that I can see, but is merely tacked on to it by arbitrary assertion-this in addition to its having no relation to fact, to the actual performances, which do not make the works "sound like the improvisations of a talented youth."

And further evidence of the remoteness and arbitrariness of this train of thought comes when Thomson gets down to writing about the actual performances of that second recital and tells us how good the performance of Opus 111 was. True, his way of putting it is that it "suffered least from the disproportionate emphasizing of secondary material." But then it appears that Schnabel "achieved a more convincing relation in the first movement than one currently hears between the declamatory and the lyrical subjects," and that "in the finale he produced for us that beatific tranquility that was a characteristic part of Beethoven's mature expression and that had been noticeably wanting, though there were plenty of occasions for it, in the earlier part of the evening." That is one way of dealing with one of the greatest interpretative achievements of our time.

No Unity with Fascism

[We print here the replies of a group of political observers who were asked to comment on Alvarez del Vayo's article. No Unity with Fascists, which appeared in The Nation of June 3. Other comments will be printed next week.]

Oppose All Compromise

Dear Sirs: Liberals can but admire the candor of our friend Del Vayo and praise him for it at a time when the political reasons for this universal war are being obscured, and the aims of victory systematically thrown on the scrap pile.

I was, alas, a good analyst when I wrote in your magazine of February 13, 1943, in an article on what I called the neo-legitimist policy, that this policy was based on the following tenet: all solutions, however they may vary to fit individual situations, must have one purpose—to forestall revolution in nations now dominated by fascism.

Events have proved that I was right. After the real social-appeasement contract drawn up, for reasons said to be of "military expediency," in North Africa with Giraud and Dubreuil, an attempt was made in Italy to save the House of Savoy and its associates, all second-ranking Fascists. British protection of the vacillating Spanish Catholic fascism brought further proof of the general plan. In the latter case, no military reason can be put forward. A flick of the wrist would suffice to liberate the Spanish people from the Caudillo without endangering the security of the Allied forces.

We are now in the midst of an unbelievably tragic imbroglio caused by Allied unwillingness to recognize the authority of the French National Committee of Liberation, presided over by General de Gaulle. This refusal of recognition is but a new expression of the grand strategy of social conservatism. The historic situation created by De Gaulle is a revolutionary situation, though the hero was certainly not conscious of this at first. The business international, however, has been fully aware of it.

We are now arriving at the most difficult stage in the struggle for a true victory of democracy—when convinced liberals will be made to collaborate with the life-saving operations of traditional society through fear of communism. This same fear is now being used in an astonishing manner by Soviet diplomacy.

What can, or should, disconcerted, perhaps even desperate, democrats do in such a situation? Oppose all compromises, as Del Vayo says, with all those who collaborated closely or even vaguely or only flirted with fascism, and let Soviet diplomacy play its own sometimes devilish game, of which the effective tactics are always to break up from within the resistances which it cannot put an end to by direct, classic diplomatic action.

Some of us, being deeply devoted to the cause of economic and political democracy, have always supported Soviet Russia's actions and are fearful of having to oppose certain of its latest maneuvers. We should lay aside our scruples. We need not be afraid of being violently attacked by the Communists, our allies in the common fight against fascism, when we are opposing a policy which the U. S. S. R. also disapproves but cannot modify, and of which it is consequently making Machiavellian use.

It is only by remaining firm on principles, and by making individuals responsible for their personal opportunistic actions, which are frequently so necessary in practical politics, that we can keep the esteem of our Soviet friends. Only this is important for the future.

LUCIEN VOCEL

New York, June 12

Ambiguous Operation

Dear Sirs: In the military field we are soon going to witness, as Mr. Churchill puts it, "the greatest amphibious operation of all times." What we have been witnessing in the political arena is the greatest ambiguous operation of all times. Stripped of ideological trappings, World War II advances frankly toward the attainment of its goal: which is not to make the world safe for democracy as World War I so naively proposed, but to make the world safe for the democracies-at the expense of democracy. Stalin, at the other end, has not been remiss in learning and improving a lesson for which he was seemingly well prepared. Systematically, one after the other, he has been dismantling all the ideological and universal implications of the October Revolution. His agents and loud speakers the world over have been instructed to tune in accordingly—and to dub the tune United Front. If the circle of the Russian evolution were ever to be rounded we should witness finally—even though not the renewal of the pact between German National Socialism and Russian National Communism—at least a wholesale embrace pressing to the breast of Russia Demofascism as embodied in the whole Darlan-Badoglio brood.

It is a common mistake to identify the "people's revolution" with the nation or country where one of its phases happened to culminate. Castlereagh's England did not act as a trustee of England's seventeenth-century revolutions; Theodore Roosevelt's apostleship did not rhyme with Thomas Paine's; Bonaparte had forgotten Mirabeau. To what extent Stalin is still a revolutionist on the line of Lenin and to what extent he has become a Thermidorian and nationalist counter-revolutionist is a matter of speculation. The morrow only can give the answer. It is likely that he has not yet made his ultimate choice. It is possible that the next phase of the "people's revolution" after Hitler's fall will culminate not in Russia again but in Europe west of Russia.

Be it as it may, our critique of the "expediencies" in Downing Street and State Department would become disingenuous and factious if we chose at the same time conformism, even by silence only, to whatever expediency Stalin may contrive or indorse. Undisturbed by chorus scribblers and scarlet dervishes, while spurning any invitation to join any anti-Russian or red-baiting united front, we shall remember Mr. del Vayo's warning. Its gist, if we read him correctly, is that Stalin's Russia must be judged on its political performance, not on its revolutionary label. G. A. BORGESE

Chicago, June 8

Not Alarmed

Dear Sirs: Throughout the war I have shared all of Del Vayo's beliefs and most of his anxieties, but in the case he now poses I am not alarmed. I believe that my friend's anxiety is due to excessive simplification of the problem, wrong and even forgetful formulation of tactics, and a mistaken opinion concerning the Communist Party's conduct. On the whole it has done a good job, as has the U. S. S. R., in both the French and Italian problems, in which principles identical with those used in Yugoslavia have been applied.

First, concerning excessive simplification. The Darlan-Giraud history and the total failure of British and American liberalism to produce any real modification of Anglo-American policy are facts of prime importance. The Communists were quite right in taking our ineffectiveness into account. In that situation they counseled an "acceptance" that was in no sense "appeasement." Giraud is not yet finally removed, but the pro-fascists and defeatists and counter-revolutionaries who clustered around him have been in great measure dispersed and he himself reduced, perhaps only temporarily, in importance. I cannot believe that total refusal to "accept" the American candidate would have had better political results, while it certainly would have been disastrous for the rebuilding of a democratic French army.

Developments were quicker in Yugoslavia, but not dissimilar. At one time the Communists, principal leaders of the Partisans, were willing to work with Mihailovich. Even after the latter's disgraceful conduct, they still tried to patch up relations with the monarchy, in the hope of keeping the broadest possible political front in Yugoslavia. When overwhelming popular support was given them, the monarchy was dispensed with as far as possible. British foreign policy with regard to Yugoslavia is in striking contrast with London's attitude toward Spain. That is largely due to the correct policies worked out by the Yugoslav Communists and their allies. It is, that is to say, an oversimplification to suppose that the anti-fascist front can be built solely on the conditions which we old-time anti-fascists stipulate.

As to wrong tactics, what I mean can easily be extracted from the above. Since Britain and America were obdurate about Badoglio and the King, and since we were getting nowhere without music, there was no democratic profit in further delay. The Soviet recognition of Badoglio seems to me to have cut at least one Gordian knot. Once Badoglio was accepted, the French pattern was repeated, the ducisti were attacked.

It is therefore not a question of "appeasing the right at the cost of the left." There is no proof that the "pro-fascist" right has been appeased, and most of the effective left went in at once, with clarity, if with regrets.

To be sure there is danger. But Del Vayo does not seem to realize quite where that danger lies. He says that in the resistance groups "the owner of a factory has united with the local labor leaders . . . the aristocratic landowner has united with his peasants. . . . But the resistance movement has not united anti-fascists with fascists." That factory owner and that landowner, taken as symbols and like as not as persons, were aiders and abettors of fascism. Their classes were supporters of fascism. Again, the danger for creative socialist democracy (and Del Vayo and I are both Socialists) of working with Churchill in the present setup is obvious, and colossal. It lies in the whole line we are bound to follow, and it cannot be exorcised, or our tactics simplified, to accord with criteria that passionately honest dissenters might propose.

Using for the first time a polemical word with Del Vayo, I said he was "forgetful." I mean this: Back in July or August, 1941, The Nation and the Daily Worker both published Negrin's first public speech during the war. I remember it well for I was the translator. There were many things in it that caused me much anxiety. I remember Dr. Negrin's national front invited people who were actually working in the present regime's administration. It invited, I seem to remember, repentant supporters of Franco. (Exactly as the Free Germany Committee in Moscow invites "renegade" Hitlerites to come over.) At that time I found that a hard saying. But I have always assumed Del Vayo to be in agreement with his former chief.

RALPH BATES

New York, June 8

A Dangerous Line

Dear Sirs: Replying to your invitation for comment on the article by J. Alvarez del Vayo, I must say that the line of policy there presented seems to me very dangerous. What it amounts to is an ultimatum that until Churchill and Roosevelt force Badoglio out of the Italian government and Franco out of the Spanish government further support of the war will be withheld. Frankly I cannot agree that this is a course toward victory over fascism of any sort. In fact, I can think of nothing that would bring more joy to Hitler than for any considerable part of the American and British public to adopt such a policy. For this is a policy of halting the war against Hitler until every secondary problem has been solved to the satisfaction of the most advanced ideological currentsmost advanced, that is, in a sense from which the necessity of war has been abstracted.

I hope and believe that Mr. del Vayo and his friends will not carry this line of thinking to its logical conclusion. But they must think fast, or they will soon find themselves in the position of withdrawing from the war effort under the slogan of "no unity with fascists."

It so happens that my record includes uncompromising struggle against Badoglio and Franco, including the most practical phases of that struggle. But when Churchill and Roosevelt agree that Badoglio must continue in the Italian government until the people of Italy have a chance to choose their own leaders, I absolutely refuse to allow a difference of opinion with them as to the wisdom of that decision to be made a stumbling-block to the further progress of the war. I find it just as easy to stomach a Badoglio who operates under British-American occupation troops and with a six-party Cabinet as to stomach the pro-fascist Lord Rennell of Rodd as head of AMG-and to be fully frank, I find it even a quite a bit easier. And to bring the discussion closer home, I am sure that Badoglio will do less harm in Italy than will our own ineffable Luigi Antonini, who hopes to arrive soon in Italy for the express purpose of splitting up the six-party democratic coalition.

If all this frankness is repugnant to your readers, I will understand it if you do not publish this solicited comment. EARL BROWDER

New York, June 6

TWe would urge our readers to read once more, as we have done, the article by Mr. del Vayo to see if they can discover any hint that under any consideration support should be withheld from the war effort. Mr. Browder's suggestion that criticism of national leadership on matters of important policy is tantamount to a threat of withdrawing support is preposterous and reveals a curiously distorted conception of the democratic process. For it implies that the national leader is, during war, in a position of absolute authority and does not derive his power from the mandate of the people. This may be true of Joseph Stalin; it is certainly not true of either Mr. Churchill or Mr. Roosevelt, despite the enormous prestige and executive authority each enjoys in his own country. It is safe to say that in England and the United States the mighty power of the democratic war effort would be appreciably weakened
